Q.—State fully your opinion as to the capacity of the colored people, as a class, for self-support? A.—I believe can they exercise the rights of freemen? Are they willing and seeking to work without compulsion, receiving a kind treatment and fair wages; and state what in your judgment is the best course to pursue in reference to these people? A.—The colored race, like all other races, have different degrees of intelligence and capacity. In New Orleans, where colored people are better treated than in any other portion of the United States, there is an excellent colored society, and a very high degree of refinement exists in it. Many of them have left the city and into the State of Louisiana, and find the colored man about as ignorant as it is possible for any human being to be. The freedmen, so far as I am informed, have a great desire to learn; I am not any whether they learn rapidly or not. I believe they are willing to work, because their necessities compel them to do so; in this they are like all other races; I never have known a white or a black man to say he was perfectly satisfied with his lot in life. I believe that the best thing that Congress or States can do is to legislate as little as possible in reference to the colored man beyond giving him security in his person and property. His social status will be worked out by the logic of the necessity for his labor. It is the only labor to be obtained in the South for some time to come.

Q.—These make such suggestions as occur to your mind as to the most judicious and efficient remedies for the evils that exist in your Department, growing out of the late rebellion? A.—The feeling and sentiment of those within the limits of my command is good, perhaps, as could be expected, still not satisfactory. The people of Louisiana are very poor, and to the rest of my State although many escape exist upon, perhaps, the majority of the plantations in the State for debts contracted since the war. In many instances the plantations will fall into the hands of Northern people, who will require a certain time, which, for a very distant period, control Louisiana, even in sentiment. Having this opportunity to speak, as it is not certifying that a spirit of bitterness and discord should exist. I believe that a majority of the people are truly loyal to the General Government, and, in fact, earnestly desire to be restored to the full rights and privileges of our other States. Still, sufficient time has not yet elapsed to efface the recollection of their having been in rebellion, and measures are limited means—the charging of being conquered, and to submerge the feeling of disloyalty and animosity. The restrictions. This latter idea and its consequence prevails to so great an extent that I am of the opinion that the military in Louisiana for some time as necessary for the security of the Freedmen and loyal men. Florida is not poor from old debts and havoc of war like Louisiana; and the tone and sentiment of the people is very fair, and a great desire is manifested to be restored to a perfect union. Texas is somewhat similar to that of the rebellion. Among the best people there is a very good feeling toward the General Government, and a desire for restoration; there, however, which this sentiment does not control, and which can not be controlled by the military. The sentiment also in this State will not change from the influence of Northern emigration and capital, as in the State of Louisiana. It is essential that the military in considerable force be maintained in the Department of Texas.

NEWS ITEMS.

Antolos Probst has made a full confession to his priest of all the murders he has been being family, committing with Cornelius Carey, the hired boy. He had no accomplice in his flight to the Pacific coast, and would have confessed to all the murders before, but he feared that if he did so he would be executed by the mob.

The demand for petroleum in Europe alone for the year 1866 is estimated at 80,000,000 gallons. The consumption in 1865 was 40,000,000 gallons; against 10,000,000 in 1862. In 1864 was 40,000,000 gallons; against 10,000,000 in 1862. There is also a brisk demand for it in every country in the world that has not the natural value of artificial light and of machinery.

The Georgia Scotia Legislature has voted $2000 to the widow of Dr. Slayton, who died by cholera while employed in attending on the sufferers from that scourge.

A serious riot occurred at Memphis, Tennessee, on the 1st inst., between a band of defeated and negro soldiers, growing out of an attempt of the police officers to arrest a white man whom the negroes undertook to protect. The Governor of Georgia, Georgia, have forbidden the freedmen from strewing flowers on the graves of the Confederate soldiers. The colored people assembled recently at one of their school-houses near the cemetery, for the above purpose, and proceeded with flowers, wreaths, and banners. Their teachers, white and black, accompanied them, and they marched to spend their offerings upon the graves of the nation's dead. The procession was met at the gate of the cemetery by the Mayor of the city and a strong force of police, and despite the entreaties of the teachers and friends of the poor negroes, was strewing refused admission.

The Methodist Episcopal Church (South), now in Conference at the Capital, has changed its name to Episcopal Methodist. This has been done to make a Union with the Methodist Episcopal Church impossible.

The ladies of Columbus, Mississippi, recently decorated the graves of the Confederate dead in the cemetery of that city. They also paid the same mark of respect to the graves of soldiers of the United States buried near by. This act elicits the approval of the press of that city, which claims that the slanderous charge ever has been made to the disunited heroes of opposite sides.

Mrs. Jefferson Davis was permitted to visit her husband at Fortress Monroe last week.

The Texas Constitutional Convention up by the late Convention, will be submitted to the people on the fourth Monday in June. It formally abolishes slavery, and places the freedmen on an equality with white before the law.

The corner-stone of the monument to be erected over the graves of the Confederate dead will be laid at some time during the month of May or June; and the Trustees have made the matter of invitation to President Johnson, Seward, Secretary of State, to be the center of the occasion.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Reform Bill has passed the British House of Commons by a majority of five votes.

The German quarrel has not advanced either toward a peaceful or a pronounced hostile issue. If Count Bismarck is passionate upon war, he will not be strongly supported either at home or by the minor States. A meeting of the princes of the Middle and Southern districts of Berlin was held at Berlin April 18, when the following resolution, supported by several of the Princes of the Confederation, was adopted: "That a war for the annexation of the Duchies was unjustifiable, and that Prussia should be held responsible as Count Bismarck to ground the interests of Germany and to ward off danger. Italy's friendly Government promising the confidence of the people would be strong enough to solve this question without bloodshed and also that of a reform of the Federal Constitution." Popular meetings have been held at Dijon and Nancy, at which the making of the opposition to the war was expressed.

Austria will not hold with the stronger position at present. The Austrian reply to the dispatch of Earl Russell, urging the maintenance of peace, says: "Austria is formally bound to uphold the rights of the inhabitants of the Duchies, and she would not without serious surrender to the dominion of Prussia. The Duchies should be united under an independent sovereign, and she will in the population respected. The decision of the majority of the Diet April 30, should be considered as binding. The Austrian and Prussian armies ought to withdraw from the Duchies, and the contingent under the federal contingent of the Federal Diet. Three months after the withdrawal of the Austrian and Prussian troops the people would choose their own form of government. Austria accepts Russia's proposition to which the people may agree, even should it be in favor of annexation to Prussia."

In France the election of a deputy to the Corps Legislatif for the department of the Bas-Rhin has resulted in the return of M. Frederic Baudrimont, the Government candidate, by 19,000 votes. M. Laboulaye, the Opposition candidate, obtained 9,000 votes.

JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, Proprietors.

We clip the following from the Chicago Evening Journal of April 28th:

A WORD ABOUT GIFT CONCERTS.—When hundreds are investing in gift concerts every day, and thousands of others are intending to do so, a word about their respective claims may be of some importance. We advise all our readers to govern themselves by the following facts.

1st. The National Gift Concert is the only one owned and controlled by a party of responsible business reputation and ability. Martin O'Brien, the proprietor, carries on a large patronage wholesale and retail business apart from this enterprise and of ten times more value. Indeed, this concert is owned by him merely to advertise his regular business, and not as a means of making money. In this account he is placed in a position to insure that the proprietors of other concerts must retain for their profits.

2d. Mr. O'Brien is the only party who is vitally interested in making a success of the scheme, and therefore the fair and honest. His success in using it for an advertising medium, and indeed, his entire future business depend upon making his concert satisfactory to every ticket-holder.

His past experience as a merchant fits him in the best manner for the future. Of the thousands of customers already served by him, there are few who have not heard a word of dissatisfaction. In every instance the prizes were ready for delivery before the drawing, and were sent to any and all delivered as fast as called for. And he is the only one who has never postponed the time of drawing.

3d. Mr. O'Brien is the only proprietor of the gift concerts who gives a full list of his prizes completely numbered, and who gives a full and satisfactory explanation of the manner in which the prizes will be drawn and delivered. This he does in a neatly-bound book, which, besides this, contains many valuable statistics, and is sent free of charge with every ticket.

4th. Mr. O'Brien's concerts offers better inducements than any other concert or gift enterprise in existence.

It gives a larger number of prizes in proportion than any other.

It is the only one whose small prizes are not made up of cheap jewelry or other worthless articles.

It is the only one that gives its patrons besides the privilege of exchanging their prizes for other goods.

It is the only one that is conducted and sustained by the citizens of Chicago.

5th. If you are not satisfied of these facts, and that O'Brien's is the place to buy tickets, we would suggest that you call on some friend, or to any other citizen, public merchant, banker, or editor in Chicago, with instructions to invest in the most reliable one, without naming any. In ninety-nine cases in a hundred they will buy at O'Brien's.

5th. There is no danger of losing money in sending by mail. Address plainly, M. O'BRIEN, 123 Dearborn Street, Chicago, Illinois, and receive tickets and book by return mail.

Read the advertisement on the last page.

Remember the drawing takes place May 31st, and the tickets are nearly all sold already.

CONSTITUTION

LIFE SYRUP,

COMPOSED OF

IODIDE POTASSIUM,

WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS.

PREPARED BY

WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,

Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the Blackwell's Island Hospitals, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Depots, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup

HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigations of the liberal-minded and scientific to cases which have no parallel at the present day.

During the past five years we have contended with obstacles, and overcome opposition, as heretofore, as were ever encountered by any reformer.

BEAUTY OF CURE

Some say, "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their permanence, and think that diseases can only be cured by the long, tedious, expensive, old method.

This is our reply: In health the body, like a well-balanced scale, is in a state of Equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effect of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all Chronicdiary) Diseases transmitted from Parent to Child.

PARALYSIS.

It is so universally admitted that Constitution Life Syrup is the most effective means of restoration in the various forms of Paralysis, that we need not reiterate that it is emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA.

Indigestion, Weight at stomach, Flatulence, Liver Complaint, Loss of Appetite, Bad Breath, Constipation, Biliousness.

SCROFULA.

Sirsima, King's Evil, Glandular Swellings, Rheumatism, Ulceration, Salt Rheum.

This taint (hereditary and acquired), filling life with untold misery, is by all usual medical remedies, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.

Lasthritis), Lumbago, Pleuralgia, Sciatica, Gout, Tic Douloureux.

If there is any disease in which the Constitution Life Syrup is a specific, it is Rheumatism and its kindred affections. The most intense pains are almost instantly alleviated,—sometimes swellings are reduced in a night, chronic or vicarious, of twenty or thirty years' standing, have been cured by one bottle.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of Mercury, removing the bad Breath, and curing the Weak Joints and Rheumatic Pains which the use of Calomel is sure to produce. It harduces Spongy Gums, and secures the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Eradicates, rost and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Skin, like

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

And all other affections of this kind, which so much disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases,

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Scalp, no remedy has ever proved its equal.

Both Pustules upon the female face, depending upon a diseased action of the Liver, are very unpleasant to the young wife and mother. A few bottles of Constitution Life Syrup will correct the action, and restore the appearance, which is directly under the skin.

Diseases of the Liver, giving rise to Languor, Dizziness, Indigestion, Weak Stomach, or an alarmed or concerned condition of that organ, accompanied with burning or chronic unpleasant symptoms will be relieved by the use of Constitution Life Syrup.

As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the Life Syrup stands unrivaled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR

Are liable to the same diseases. Nature and Science have made the Constitution Life Syrup for the benefit of all.

PURE BLOOD

Produces healthy and Warm Skin; and if the constitution is neglected in youth, disease and early death is the result. In old delay when the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S BLESSING.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. X.—No. 491.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE MEMPHIS RIOTS.

THERE was in Memphis, on the first two days of May, an excitement unequaled since the close of the war. The origin of the disturbance between the whites and negroes of that city was highly discreditable to the colored soldiers, and the riotous proceedings which followed were a disgrace to civilization. For the riot the lower class of white citizens were as responsible as were the soldiers of the Third United States Colored Infantry for the original difficulty. This regiment, whose reputation has been a bad one, had been mustered out, since which they had frequented whisky-shops in the southern part of the city, and had been guilty of excesses and disorderly conduct. On the evening of May 1 some drunken members of the regiment were on South Street, talking noisily, when in an insolent manner they were ordered by two policemen to cease their noise and disperse. Words ensued, followed by blows, throwing of missiles, and firing of revolvers.

To understand what followed it must be remembered that the police force of Memphis is composed mostly of Irishmen, whose violent prejudice against negroes was so shamefully displayed in the New York riots of 1863. The Times correspondent thus described the riot:

Word was sent to police head-quarters, and the whole force at once proceeded to the scene of the fray, being joined on the way thither by armed and excited citizens. Meanwhile the firing had brought other negroes to the spot, some armed with clubs and some with revolvers, so that by the time the police force came up the two parties were about equal in number. The negroes held the original position, and, upon the approach of the police, showing no determination to abandon it, were fired upon by the police and citizens who accompanied them. This fire was returned, and for a while both parties busied themselves in discharging their revolvers as rapidly as possible. Meanwhile word was sent to General Swayzeas, who promptly dispatched to the scene of action a company of Regulars (whites), where the negroes were quickly dispersed and driven in every direction.

During the evening the wildest and most exaggerated reports were spread throughout the city. Every communication of the incidences of the fight told a different story, and the highest excitement prevailed. Each rumor placed a worse aspect upon the affair than the preceding one, and only served to develop the pent-up prejudices against the negro. Soon after dark this excitement and prejudice found vent. Large numbers of armed citizens repaired to the scene of the fight and commenced firing upon every negro who made himself visible. One negro upon South Street, a quiet, inoffensive laborer, was shot down almost in front of his own cabin, and after life was extinct his body was fired into, cut and beat in a most horrible manner. In all parts of the city, wherever they could be seen, negroes were fired upon by policemen as well as citizens. They were shot while driving hacks, and quietly walking in the streets about their business. The police seemed to make it their special business to shoot every negro they could see, no matter where he was or what he was doing. The result was that by 9 o'clock the colored population were in close hunting with wild alarm. How many negroes were killed during the night it is impossible to ascertain, as firing was constantly heard during the earlier hours in all parts of the city. It is estimated that from 15 to 20 were killed. So far as I have been able to learn, not a white man was fired upon by a negro during the whole night.

After the fight of Tuesday evening the negro soldiers and most of the colored population residing in the vicinity of the fight fled to the fort for security. They were perfectly quiet—in fact, were terribly frightened for their own safety. At eight early hour yesterday morning every thing in the neighborhood of the late fight was quiet and peaceable. Few, indeed, were the persons to be seen in the vicinity. The boldest of even those killed the evening before lay unburied where they fell, to some caste horribly mutilated and disfigured. Before the hour of 9 citizens, armed with revolvers, sticks, and muskets, with a squad of policemen, regulated the firing upon every they reached the place they encountered firing upon every negro in sight. It was said that negroes had shot two white men who were grimly passing along in that vicinity in the morning, but this was doubtless one of those wild and unfounded rumors called out by the excitement and offended rumors called out by the unjust prejudices elements of the occasion. Certain it is that the greater part of the unrepentant rebels against the Government of the bullets were fired, and could thus be the communication reliable source. Immediately upon the first firing, the negroes fring by the negroes, and by the rapidity with which the city that the fight had been renewed, and a large force of citizens and police, with a number of United States fire-guns, and ordered to the field of battle. By 10 o'clock, a large force, collected in the vicinity, who dealt out destruction to every colored man who came in their way. Several negro women and children were shot, in several instances from eight to ten bullets hitting them. As far as I can see, there were no armed negroes in the whole neighborhood, and I have the testimony of many respectable men, citizens and gentlemen to the same effect. The negro soldiers, and many not soldiers, stood trembling in the rear, with their side-arms unbuckled, and beyond even the range of shot-guns of those who were engaged in shooting down the crowd. Of a helpless men, women, and children. The arrival of a company of rangers upon the ground restored quiet, and the citizens and police gradually retired. How many negroes were killed in this vicinity during the morning will not known. The amount, however, was considerable. During the entire day they were shot down as they met the party in the city. But one white man was killed in the entire day, and he was shot by another white man for the single reason that he stood talking with an old negro acquaintance. Such familiarity could not be tolerated. A negro, after carefully inquiry, failed to find a single instance where a white man was shot at during the 3d that he was a negro.

SCENES IN MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE, DURING THE RIOT—BURNING A FREEDMEN'S SCHOOL-HOUSE.
[SKETCHED BY A. R. W.]

Soon after dark the red glare of fire shot up in the southern part of the town, then the flames burst into the eastern part, and then they rolled up in the northern portion of the city. Seventy-eight houses, occupied by negroes, every school-house for colored children, and even the building of worship for the freedmen were given to the devouring element. Lincoln Chapel, costing $12,000, was one of the what the negroes had generously destroyed, being the church of the city—a large edifice, lately occupied by the corner of Main and Overton streets, and capable of seating the five-dozen rebel army into a heap of blackened and charred ruins. And while the fire rolled on and up, drunkenness and rapine were unrestrained and approved. At this writing no estimate of the damage caused by the fire can be made, so great is the confusion and excitement.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1866.

THE TRIAL OF THE GOVERNMENT.

It seems to us they greatly mistake the temper of the loyal majority of the American people who suppose that because there are differences among them upon certain points of policy, they will, therefore, from sheer impatience, grow careless of securing the victory they have won. If the correspondent of the London Times reply, even the President himself makes the mistake of considering the loyal majority as aiming merely at a party advantage and not at public welfare. He forgets that he could be as easily accused of holding his course merely with a design to secure his own re-election. Indeed the freedom with which the President assails the motives of those who decline to receive his views as the perfection of statesmanship is one of the unpleasantest episodes of his interesting tune.

The truth is, that, with the utmost magnanimity and a cordial desire of restoring the Union to its normal condition, there is no conceivable number of faithful Union men in the country who believe that the late rebel States should be restored to their national relations without further conditions. Those who hold that they should be, are the late rebels, their Copperhead allies, and a very few who have hitherto acted with the Union party, and of whom Senator COWAN, of Pennsylvania, is a representative. These all believe with ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, that as Congress did not consent to Secession or to calling States lost it consequently right to resume all their relations with the Union at their pleasure. There is no middle ground between this preposterous proposition and the position of the faithful citizens who sustained the war and elected Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. JOHNSON. As Mr. JOHN L. THOMAS, Jun., of Maryland, said, in his manly and admirable speech of the 21st of April, the late rebels "are either to be consulted as to what conditions will best please them, or we are to impose such guarantees as Congress in its wisdom may deem best for the public good."

In determining these guarantees there is no limit to the authority of the Government for its own discretion. The rebel forces have surrendered, but the Government has not laid down its arms, and General SHERIDAN assures us that it will be long before they can be safely relinquished. The right to defend its own existence against armed assailants, which is inherent in the Constitution and in the nature of things, emanent itself authorized the Government to wage war against the rebels, and the authority to maintain its security by exacting guarantees of defeated rebels is a necessary part of the same inherent right. There was no express verbal provision of the Constitution for emancipation or for any other measure of war, nor for the appointment of Provisional Governors by the President. But the power of the Government is not limited by its enemies. Its rightful action is not subject to their discretion. Because they lay down their arms, they can not compel the Government to connive at its own subversion. The Union is restored, and the rights of the States are resumed, not when ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS and the Copperheads say so, but when the loyal people of the United States in Congress assembled are content to declare it.

That declaration should be made only after the most careful investigation and reflection. It is not surprising that the late insurgents should desire to soothe with angry passions. It was to be expected that Union men would still be hated and maltreated. It is natural that men like HENRY A. WISE should continue to rave and swear at the Union which, although they have so long plotted and acclaimed. It is not strange that conspicuous rebels should be unanimously elected to the highest local offices, and that men whose hands are still trembling with the effort to overthrow the Government should demand with pronounce those who have maintained it at the most costly sacrifice as enemies of the Constitution. It was above all to be expected that the freedmen, whose fidelity to the Union has been proved, should be the victims of those whose war for slavery has ended in emancipation.

All these things are natural phenomena of the situation. There was no thoughtful man who did not anticipate them, and only the foolish are disappointed now that they are so overwhelmingly apparent. But these phenomena are contemplated without anger as without surprise. They serve to admonish us all that the conditions imposed upon the rebels in a spirit may resume their national relations must be determined with great sagacity and prudence. Great risks are of course to be taken. That is the inevitable law of the situation. "Bring us back!" sneered LOUIS WIGFALL in the dark days of 1860, when the Senate chamber, to which his constituents had sent a secession, rang with the contemptuous fury of secession: "When you undertake that, and have accomplished it, you may be like the man who purchased the elephant—you will find it rather difficult to decide what you will do with the animal." None of us supposed that the end of the war would solve all problems. The question to be decided would plainly then be the one which we are now reaching, whether, the attempt of forcible secession having failed, and the rebel States having accepted their relations upon prescribed conditions, the controlling majority of the American people would still maintain the Government of the Union was for the constitutional forms, or permit it to be subverted.

We have now, therefore, to decide under what conditions that form of political experiment shall be tried. Sooner or later the normal condition of the country must be restored, and there is no conceivable method of doing it the strain and friction of the trial that will follow can be avoided. Certain conditions we may see at once would be useless. General disfranchisement, for instance, would postpone the experiment. Holding the suspended States as conquered provinces, also, prolongs and complicates, but does not obviate the peril. Only rational solution of the problem is to confide the experiment of a popular government to its principle in such a way that it shall have a fair trial. Whether it will fail or not is for human nature which is responsible. If the lawfully-expressed will of the people of the United States is that this Union shall end and the Government be lost, there is no further alternative or appeal. But to ascertain this will, to satisfy the conditions of the trial, the whole ground must be occupied. It will not do to follow JAMES M. MASON's advice to Virginia, and hang or shoot every man who votes in a certain way, or CLINGMAN's promise that the North Carolina Union men should be hunted by "the swift attention of Vigilance Committees."

The risk that we undertook when we fought to defend the Government and save the Union was not, if we succeeded, to govern half of the country as a subjugated province or colony without consent of the governed, nominally, but it was to trust the Union to the people of the Union, some of whom hated it and had fought against it, and would still oppose it and vote against it, and delay in the trial the better; for delay endangers a just decision by breeding impatience among loyal citizens anxious to renew their old relations with the States lately in arms. The important element of the experiment was thus evident. It was the late slave population. The war had made them freemen and citizens. If the old order of the national system were restored, and they were not consulted, and the Government were embarressed or ruined by an alliance of Republicans and Copperheads, the experiment of a popular government would be as far from satisfactory solution as ever. It can be satisfactorily tried only by an equality of electoral rights over the whole population. The experiment is not satisfactorily tried evidently if 631,000 citizens, as in North Carolina, are invested with political power to the exclusion of 331,000 who have the same qualifications except color; or if, as in Virginia, 719,000 have 490,000; or, as in Alabama, 596,000 may exclude 437,000; or, in Georgia, 591,000 may exclude 465,000; or, in Louisiana, 357,000 may exclude 350,000; or, in Mississippi, 353,000 may exclude 436,000; or, in South Carolina, 291,000 may exclude 411,000.

Under the circumstances of the case, as we have defined them, this electoral equality may be secured either directly or indirectly. Congress may, as a measure of national security, determine that it shall vote, either by express specification or by sanctioning the provisions of a State Constitution, and guarding against its unfair operation. This is obviously a measure of exceptional measure. In the normal operation of our system the regulation of suffrage is left to the States, and it would be touched by the National Government in this instance for the the same reason that property in slaves was touched —for the public safety. The right of a State unquestionably elected to the highest local offices, and that men whose hands are still trembling with the effort to overthrow the Government should demand

Of the remainder of the debt—say $1,100,000,000 (exclusive of greenbacks)—about half, $550,000,000, is in the shape of Five-Twenty Bonds, which are redeemable next year. It is not settled whether they are redeemable in gold or greenbacks. Mr. Chase unofficially assured holders that they were payable in gold. It is not known, however, that the Government will do more than it is obliged to do, and as the law is not explicit, it is as well to assume that they will be paid in paper. A further sum of $62,000,000 in debt certificates is also redeemable within the year; $130,000,000 of deposit certificates; and about one-third of the outstanding compound-interest notes—say $60,000,000. Thus, in all, assuming that the new consol prove a success, and be negotiable at par, within twelve months, it is in the power of the Secretary to fund therein $772,000,000 of the public debt. Should Mr. M'Culloch share Mr. Chase's views, and consider the Five-Twenties payable in gold, the aggregate would be reduced to $252,000,000. In 1867–8 and 1868–9 the balance of the compound-interest notes—$130,000,000—might be funded. In 1869 and 1870 the last Five-Twenties—$171,000,000—would mature, and might be disposed of. In 1872 and '73 the Five-Twenties created by the conversion of Seven-Thirties would mature, and might be paid off or converted. And, lastly, in 1874 the Ten-Forties might be exchanged.

Clearly, then, the consolidation of the public debt into a 5 per cent. consol is going to be a slow business under the most favorable circumstances.

But what if a 5 per cent. loan could not be negotiated at par? What if the design of the bill was to prevent any successful negotiation by the Secretary? These are questions of moment. It was Senator Sherman who defeated the Secretary's plan for the contraction of the currency and the gradual absorption of the greenbacks with a view to resumption. It is the same Senator Sherman who now restricts the funding powers of the Department to a 5 per cent. loan at par, well knowing that to be only 5 per cents. in existence are selling at 93¾, after having been for a year between 90 and 92. Certainly, if a 5 per cent. loan could not be negotiated at par, the debt certificates and deposits on call would have to be renewed, the compound-interest notes would not be distributed, no effort would be made to pay the old Five-Twenties next year, and a plethora of money would prevail at the monetary centres, which would make the fortune of the speculators who are said to have influential friends in the House and the Senate at Washington.

Senator Sherman's bill seeks to enlist public favor for the new 5 per cents. by exempting them from taxation. Has any one reflected upon the practical effects of such an exemption? Supposing the bill passed and the bonds were negotiated, what would be the result? Why, simply that the capitalists and rich men of the country would be exempt from taxes, while poor men paid them. How long would such an inequality be endured? Among the causes of the French Revolution De Tocqueville enumerates, first, the exemption of the nobles from taxation, and adds that subsequent French governments, taught by experience, have carefully avoided this error. And this is the policy which Senator Sherman now recommends us to adopt!

A SUPERFLUOUS JURY.

It is very authoritatively announced that the Government of the United States is about submitting the decision of the justice of the late war to twelve chance men in Richmond, Virginia. For what purpose this is to be done is not clear. If the twelve men decide that the Government had no right to wage war, what then? If they declare that it was justified, what then? Will any body's opinion be changed? In the former case, will those of us who supported the war regret our conduct, or feel that we convicted the murder of the heroes by whom all true hearts forever honor? In the latter case, will those who opposed the war acknowledge their prolonged and miserable mistake? The sole question which can engage the consideration of the twelve men is, whether secession is a right reserved to the States by the Constitution? But can that question be more absolutely and finally decided than it has been by the sword?

The plea of Jefferson Davis precedes the question of treason. He would willingly agree that treason should be punished. But he would contend that he has not committed treason. Treason against the United States, says the Constitution, "shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." But this is true only or a citizen of the United States. Davis argues that he was not a citizen. He contends that his sovereign State had withdrawn and had thereby released him from allegiance to the United States. Therefore, while he would not deny that he levied war, he would insist that he did so not as a citizen of the United States but of a political community with which the United States were at war. Consequently he is an alien enemy, not a traitor.

Suppose, however, that the twelve men decide that this plea is of no avail; that a State is not sovereign, and can not withdraw from the Union, and that the allegiance of every citizen is due to the national authority; yet, we ask again, what have they decided which the whole country has not already decided by the most tremendous ordeal? This decision certainly gains nothing in weight or solemnity by the approval of the twelve men. Mr. Alexander H. Stephens and his friends do not change their opinion. Certainly loyal men do not change theirs. In the eloquent words of the first Jefferson Davis does not become a criminal, even though hung upon a gallows; in the judgment of the last, he is not a hero on a patriot though he go untouched. Upon what points, then, and to what purpose, are the twelve men summoned to decide?

It is to determine whether there is such a crime as treason? But the Constitution defines it, and there is no question. Is it to decide whether Davis is guilty or innocent? But that question is already settled by the refusal of the country to admit the plea under which he levied war. Is it to make treason and traitor odious? But that work has been done by convicting and hanging Jefferson Davis when General Humphreys, of Mississippi, who is guilty of exactly the same offense, is elected Governor of Mississippi and Senator Alexander—all of whom are equally guilty with Davis—and who is pardoned by the President that he may exercise his office? The question of treason in the person of Davis hanging upon the gibbet is entirely destroyed in the person of Humphreys sitting in the Governor's chair.

But suppose the twelve men decide, or agree that Davis is not guilty of treason. Is it worth while for the Government of the United States to have gone through such a long ordeal by humiliating position? If the jury be packed the trial is a farce. If it be free, there is the chance and the probability of this humiliation. Now, is there any political advantage to be gained by the trial which can authorize the Government to take such a chance as this? If the accused be convicted he is not disgraced. His offense is political. The dominant can persuade men to regard political offenses as crimes. Does any man suppose that if convicted Davis would be disgraced? How long would be an error as huge as to try him. Today he is a baffled conspirator, and practically the deadest of dead men. Hang him and he becomes a living power in politics, and an eternal remorse to the country. Every reader of history condemns Charles I. until he mounts the scaffold. Do we not all pity him? Did his father's scaffold frighten or deter James II.? We have subdued this vast rebellion by force of arms. The blood it shed has been avenged upon the same field by blood. An argument, its objects, and the characters of those who caused and controlled it, are committed to the tenacious logic of history and the conscience of mankind. Our present duty is not to hang those whom we did not shoot, but to secure ourselves by political measures against political perils.

Of course we speak of Davis merely as a political offender. If he be guilty of complicity with the horrible plot against Andersonville and Salisbury and Belle Isle, or with the crowning crime of the assassination, humanity itself calls for his punishment. The evidence of this latter charge is at the hands of the Judiciary Committee of the House. Before the Richmond trial we hope that Committee will give the country a plain statement of the grounds upon which the President offered a reward for Davis's arrest as a conspirator in the assassination plot.

HOW TO ESCAPE THE CHOLERA.

The cholera first appeared in this country over thirty years ago, and such a vast mass of facts has been gathered that every reasonable inquirer and the doctors have not fully settled upon the means of preventing its incursion and diffusion. But it is forgotten that in the world it takes a long time to settle even the most simple points in any new subject that comes up. And besides, there is, after all, more ascertained by medical men about what the cholera than is commonly supposed; but this is very much kept out of view by the excitement that prevails in relation to the few points that are in dispute.

The world, professional and non-professional, is at work from most different points. The question, whether the cholera is contagious? and every doctor is piled with it by patient and friend and stranger. And you may as well bother a man about a contagionist, or you will give no satisfaction to the questioner or dispatch that introduces the subject. He comes from a narrow view of the facts. One who has a certain set of facts come under his observation, decides that the disease spreads by contagion; while another, from another set of facts, comes to an opposite decision. This is all wrong. What there are numerous facts, and many of them apparently inconsistent, they must be extensively compared and sifted in order to reach correct conclusions. Taking this body of facts as observed by the whole history of the disease, it is clear that its ordinary propagation is by some cause, as yet vet wholly unknown, which does not emanate from the sick, and that it is only now and then contagious. For, not to go into any discussion of this point, while there are occasional facts that show that cholera is communicated from one person to another, it very commonly overleaps the strictest quarantines and sanitary cordons, and often fails to follow the best lines of communication.

Far be it from us to say that all quarantine regulations are to be discarded. Some are necessary. And yet some which are resorted to are useless, others still are absolutely injurious, multiplying the victims of the disease; and none are to be relied upon as certain preventives of its introduction. Reliance, indulged by some, of sealing up this whole country against the cholera by a universal quarantine is preposterous.

So much for quarantine measures. But there are other measures about which there is no dispute, and they are of immense importance in limiting the ravages of cholera if not in preventing its introduction. And yet the whole source is far from being properly appreciated by the community at large.

Promoting cleanliness is one, and we use this expression in its broadest sense. You must have a clean skin, clean clothes, clean air, clean houses, yards, and streets. No filth must be covered up with an outside show of cleanliness. Dirt in cellars, in corners, may do the mischief. A musty carpet, charged with the accumulating filth of months of thriftlessness, may procure the cholera for a family. After all, this interior uncleanliness has more to do with the origination of the disease than what is outside. Bad as are the emanations from decaying vegetable and animal substances, they are nothing like the fetid gases, miasmas and other diseases as those from personal filth, within and without, but especially within, where, pent up from the free air, they act with all their force.

Much is said about disinfectants; but, useful as they are, their use does take the place of cleanliness. We say, then, both to communities and to individuals, Clean up, clean up; and when you have done so, keep clean, for cholera is likely to come again; and, if not, there are other diseases, as typhus fever and cholera infantum, constantly, and therefore less strikingly, destructive of life, of which filth is a chief cause.

New York and Philadelphia once presented a decided contrast in the effect of the influence of cleansing measures. Philadelphia adopted them thoroughly, and has but 700 deaths from cholera; while New York, neglecting them, had 3000 deaths.

There is no fact more prominently brought out by the whole history of cholera than that intemperance in drinking is one of the principal causes of its diffusion. It acts in two ways: directly, by predisposing the individual to an attack, a large proportion of the deaths being from the intemperate; and, indirectly, by promoting the uncleanness, poor and irregular living, and crowding together of families. In this way, it could shut up the drinking places we should effectually cut off one of the chief sources—nay, the chiefest source—of the nuisances which so largely generate cholera and various other fatal diseases.

Intemperance in eating predisposes to the disease. But as also does a diet too restricted in quantity or variety. A poor diet will enfeeble the system, and thus render it liable to an attack. A diet restricted in variety does not meet the wants of the system, and so fails to fortify it properly against disease. Those who desire to have such a diet as a rational moderate liver would adopt in ordinary times. Good fresh vegetables and ripe fruits should be used as usual, as a part of the daily diet, and not irregularly.

No reliance should be placed upon vaunted prophylactics—that is, things supposed to ward off the disease. Intoxicating drinks are often taken for this purpose, and they are really among the most likely means of bringing on an attack. Good habits of living, the cheerful performance of duty, and a calm trust in Providence, are the best prophylactics. These are the habitual preservatives of the physicians who fearlessly stand at their post in the midst of the pestilence, and very seldom does one of their number fall a victim to it.

LEFT-HAND WRITING.

The specimens of left-hand writing by disabled soldiers, of which we have formerly spoken, were lately exhibited in Washington, and excited very general interest and admiration. Speaker Colfax, General Banks, General Howard, the representative left-handed soldier, with other noted men, made interesting and eloquent speeches, and it was resolved that the collection should be sent out for exhibition at the Great Fair in Paris. Meanwhile those left-handed letters which we have not contributed are invited to send specimens of their writing for reference and preservation to William Oland Bourne, Jun., New York Soldiers' Friend, who has devoted himself with untiring energy to this patriotic and illustrative work.

LITERARY.

Fifty pages of this Number we begin the publication of a short story-book by Henry called "The Little Spades," by Miss Warner, author of "The Wide, Wide World."

With the Number for June, 1866, Harper's Magazine begins its thirty-third volume. It is the one hundred and twenty-third number of the whole series at this popular periodical, whose hold upon the public does not appear to relax. The circulation is very large, and has increased by twenty thousand copies since the first of the year. The June Number opens with a paper by General Sherman upon his "Personal Recollections of the War." The author is a Virginian, and was a steady Unionist throughout the struggle. His peculiar position, his shrewd humor and observation, and his artistic skill both with pen and pencil make this article, which is one of a series, very entertaining and valuable. A brief paper upon "Gladstone as Leader of the Commons" is a vivid and picturesque sketch, and is the best portrait of the English statesman who now excites such interest and admiration. "The Fall of Richmond" describes that event from the inside. It is written by a resident of that city whose heart sank with Lee's retreating army. The other articles make an excellent variety, and we see no sign of senility in Harper's Magazine.

An "Index to the daily Times for 1865" is a very useful work, and is the model of an index. We believe it is the first instance of the kind, and a single exception. The book contains twenty thousand references to the events mentioned during that period, each specifying the date, and column of the paper in which it is to be found. It is handsomely printed, and bound in 8vo form, and contains 182 double-column pages. The index applies to other papers as well as the Times, the daily news for all the papers being essentially the same.

A modest, anonymous novel, "Ormond: a Tale of Slave Life in Kansas," is published by John Bradburn. Although its date is to appear as interest is vivid, while the novelty of its scenery and incidents, and the skill with which the tale is unfolded, give it a peculiar charm. The evident familiarity of the author with the details of Kansan life under the Border Ruffian régime is remarkable, but imparts a fine local coloring to the events of his story. The plot reveals the essential inhumanity of Slavery, even in its fine forms or the most favorable that is ever, which it is most useful to study in the passionless perspective of centuries. The merit of this modest book is likely to be overlooked, but we heartily commend it to our readers.

"Across the Continent" is the title of the book of Mr. Samuel Bowles, editor of the Springfield Republican, recording his observations during his journey with Schuyler Colfax. The key for the most graphic and shrewd report upon the journey over the plains, the Mormon Question, the Pacific Railroad, and Territorial Matters that we have, while the quick and humorous eye, the true and tender heart, and the picturesque and nimble hand of the author, give it a various interest which can not fail to send the book every where over the country. Mr. Bowles is as American and a Yankee in every heart-throb, and the good sense which is manifest through the whole work gives the greatest value to all his opinions upon the immediate and interesting questions he touches.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

May 8:

In the House, debate was opened on the joint resolution reported by the Reconstruction Committee proposing a Constitutional Amendment.—In the evening the Tax bill was taken up, and after a brief discussion, imposing a tax of five cents per pound on cotton, was adopted.

May 9:

In the Senate, the House resolution appointing a Committee to attend the funeral of Hon. Reverdy Johnson, passed.—A bill to incorporate the National Theological Institute of the Reformed Church was reported. The object of the Institute is the education of colored men for the Christian ministry.

May 10:

In the Senate, the Post-office Appropriation bill was taken up, the pending question being on Mr. Trumbull's amendment, providing that no compensation be paid to any Assistant Postmaster until his appointment shall be confirmed by the Senate, unless commissioned to fill a vacancy occasioned by death, resignation, or expiration of office during the recess of the Senate. The Senate was addressed by Mr. Howard and Mr. Doolittle, by Office Reorganization, and the amendment was disagreed to—June 16, 9 to 37. The bill was then passed.

In the House, the joint resolution to amend the Constitution was passed, including the Disfranchisement clause, 128 to 37.

NEWS ITEMS.

The body of Preston King, late Collector of the Port, May 13, will be removed from Greenwood to Brewerton last, by jumping off a Hoboken ferry-boat into the river, was discovered at 5 A. M. May 14, drifting in through the gap of the Atlantic docks, by Officer Keating.

On the 10th of May Jefferson Davis was indicted for treason by the Grand Jury of the United States District Court now in session at Norfolk, and the trial of the prisoner, it is supposed, will take place in June.

James Stephens, the Fenian Chief, arrived from Liverpool in New York. His arrival was confirmed by the resignation of O'Mahony.

The appointment of Collector Smythe for the Port of New York was confirmed by the Senate May 11.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The Russell administration has concluded not to resign, but deemed it prudent to make some concession to the spirit manifested in opposition, in the matter of the proposed Redistribution of Seats. The latter measure will be taken up in the Session of 1867, when it will be framed in Committee.

The Washington correspondent of the London Times gives that paper an interesting account of an interview which he had recently with President Johnson.

The German war question was still vexed, and in fact more threatening than at any previous time. Neither Prussia nor Austria would yield to the demands, and neither would either Power consent to disarm. The war spirit was at fever-heat in both. Ten it was known that Prussia had given a gentle hint that the time to strike for Venetia had not yet arrived, and Austria's Emperor then was talked of, for the settlement of the question now so angrily debated.

Since the advent of warm weather the cholera has broken out at the coast towns of Holland and the frontier of Brittany, between the French ports of Brest and St. Nazaire. All vessels from infected ports are now making a few victims in the Dutch Provinces of Luxemburg and in the French Department of Moselle, and the grave question has been what direction the epidemic would be likely to take when in the Northwest. It has now been said from Luxemburg the disease has crossed the Rhine into Holland, and that it has reached Rotterdam, the nearest town to the coast.

Cholera has appeared among the German emigrants awaiting embarkation for America in Liverpool. The Germans were to have gone on board the Steamship Helvetia (same line as the England and Virginia) for New York, but the disease manifesting itself on board almost compelled the other her departure from Liverpool, and two deaths occurred on the same evening. Consequently she came back to Liverpool. The National Steam Navigation Company has decided to stop further emigration by their ships, and the British Government ordered a strict examination of all German emigrants before their embarkation.

EDWIN M. STANTON.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY & CO., WASHINGTON. D. C.]

EDWIN M. STANTON.

IT has been usual with some of the admirers of the Secretary of War to compare him with CARNOT, the war minister of the French revolution. The analogy may hold good in respect of the enthusiasm, energy, zeal, and inflexible honesty evinced by each in the performance of public duty; but the burdens which our war imposed upon MR. STANTON far exceeded in their magnitude and complication that most of those that were borne by the celebrated Frenchman.

MR. STANTON came into office on the 20th of JANUARY, 1862, a month before the decisive and cheering victory of Fort Donelson. Though never identified with the party by which MR. LINCOLN was elected, his appointment was urgently recommended by both MR. SEWARD and MR. CHASE, as well as by MR. CAMERON, whose retirement caused the vacancy which he was to fill. He had always been a thorough-going Democrat of the JACKSON school; but these Republican leaders well knew the earnestness of devotion to the Union, and the extraordinary power he had manifested during the disastrous closing days of MR. BUCHANAN'S administration. In those days of gloom and anxiety he was Attorney-General, while Mr. HOLT was Secretary of War, and Mr. DIX Secretary of the Treasury; and it was chiefly to him, and to these patriotic associates of his, that we owe the preservation of the Government from total shipwreck before the 4th of March, 1861, so that the helm of power could be put into the hands of Mr. LINCOLN. The services which Mr. STANTON then rendered were known especially to Mr. SEWARD, with whom, as the designated Secretary of State of the new Executive, he was in constant communication. It was also felt to be desirable to give a prominent part in the work of the Administration to some representative man of the War Democrats who were then nobly sustaining MR. LINCOLN in his efforts to vindicate the national integrity; and accordingly, when MR. CAMERON left the WAR Department, MR. STANTON took charge of it.

At the time when MR. LINCOLN appointed him to this office these two remarkable men, who were destined to an intimacy which history will never cease to remember, had not seen each other. The first meeting between them was when MR. STANTON went to the White House to receive his commission. We believe, also, that the first notice which the new Secretary received of his intended appointment was but the day before the nomination was sent to the Senate, when he was informed of it just as he was about to rise for the argument of a cause in the Supreme Court. The relations thus commenced between the President and the Secretary of War always remained exceedingly cordial; or, rather, they constantly became warmer and more confidential, down to the last fatal day which ended MR. LINCOLN'S earthly career. While he was rarely seen at the offices of the other executive departments, at the War Office he was not merely a frequent, but a constant visitor. His tall form, wrapped in his familiar gray shawl, was usually to be seen making its way along the back alley that leads there from the White House, at from 9 to 10 o'clock in the morning, or about 4 in the afternoon; and persons who were admitted to see the Secretary on important business in his private room at those hours would sometimes find the President stretched upon the sofa there, as if the discussion between him and the Secretary had not yet been concluded. Indeed, the tie between them seemed to be quite as much that of private affection as of official duty; and when the catastrophe occurred which robed the nation in mourning, all will remember how admirably the confidence of the deceased statesman in his friend and adviser was justified by the latter. For a brief time, in that awful crisis, the whole Government seemed to rest upon the shoulders of the Secretary of War; and the country will not soon forget the manner in which the momentous trust was discharged.

MR. STANTON is a native of Ohio, whither his parents emigrated from Culpepper County, Virginia. He was born at Steubenville in 1815; studied at Kenyon College in 1833, remaining there barely a year; served as a bookseller's clerk at Columbus at the same time that he was studying his future profession; was admitted to the bar in 1836, and began the practice of the law in Harrison County. He soon gained an extensive reputation for ability in the argument of abstruse questions of law, as well as for success with juries. The memory of some of his more remarkable efforts, especially in the latter department of his profession, is still fresh in all that part of Ohio and the neighboring region of Western Virginia. He also became known as an active member of the Democratic party, of which Senators ALLEN and TAPPAN were then leaders in Ohio: and took the political contests which then prevailed he cast himself with all the fire and passion of his powerful nature. In 1846 he removed to Pittsburg, where, in 1857, he transferred his residence to Washington, where his professional occupations, especially in patent cases, soon became as constant as we presume they were profitable. Of his history in connection with the War Department it is not necessary that we should speak in these columns. The people know it already.

MR. STANTON is about five feet eight inches in height, and is a person of broad shoulders and heavy frame. His features are rather round and full, his hair very dark, though thin, and his complexion sallow. These peculiarities, combined with his intense and penetrating dark brown eyes, and his heavy beard, sprinkled freely with gray, give somewhat of an Oriental air to his general appearance. Though his ordinary expression is thoughtful, absorbed, and stern, his smile is gentle and winning as a woman's.

One of the most striking facts about MR. STANTON is his indifference to the usual means of popularity. Though during the past four years no man has been criticised so vehemently as he, he has not once undertaken to defend himself, either by his own hand or that of any friend. The facts urged against him might be either wholly fictitious or wholly misrepresented: he has treated them with the same silent neglect, as if confident that the future would do him justice, or careless of all wrong provided he himself felt that he was right. This habit seems to have been adopted by him before his advent to public office. His arguments in important legal controversies he has taken no pains to preserve. In one of these, which related to the right of the Suspension Bridge Company at Wheeling to construct their bridge across the Ohio River, his plea is spoken of by those who had the luck to hear it as a most impressive performance, but we have not succeeded in procuring a printed copy of it.

MR. STANTON has been twice married. His present wife was MISS ELLEN DICKINSON, of Pittsburg. He has four children: a son of some twenty-five years by his first marriage; and one son and two daughters, all yet little children, by the second.

INSIDE.

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XX.

THERE is a certain manner—the nautical name for which the writer has clean forgotten, though he assures the reader he once knew it—by which a vessel is advanced upon its way when steam or tide or wind fail it. Its anchor, with a stout cable attached, is carried forward in one of the ship's boats and hooked on to some rock or iceberg ahead, the other end of the hawser being fastened to the capstan on board. With many a heave-ho the crew then ply their strength, as in a slow whirlwind, around the capstan until they and their vessel are drawn to the anchor. The anchor is then again borne forward, and so the operation continued as long as may be necessary.

And in the same way we will bear the anchor of this our bark ahead, and grapple it with this first day of March, 1865, and endeavor to—yes, warp, that is the word—warp ourselves to the that point; for, though all the world else moves, Somerville has seemed sorely to lack, so far as advance is concerned, of steam and tide—not of wind, only it has been perpetually shifting.

Great events have befallen since Dr. Ginnis's house was burned—many of them.

Vicksburg. The Somerville Star had acknowledged, after the fall of New Orleans, that the Mississippi River, Port Pillow and Memphis having fallen, was open along its whole length to Federal navigation. Only a few days after its article in proof that this, so far from being an advantage, would be, like the capture of New Orleans, a positive disadvantage to the Federals, Vicksburg and Port Hudson are known to have suddenly arrested the navigation of the river, at which, with singular inconsistency, the Star greatly rejoices. Then follows the long story—oh, how long and weary in the slow telling!—of the assault upon Vicksburg and the repulse. The episodical capture of Arkansas Post, though Somerville has accounts for each after that event of the escape on their way up the river, and their march across Tennessee to join Bragg, of the prisoners there taken. Next comes the wearisome digging of the famous canal, and its failure, proving that hydraulics and hydrography are greatly neglected parts of civil engineering as taught at West Point. Great rejoicing in Somerville over that. Then comes Grant's desperate march around and regular investment of Vicksburg, at which also Somerville greatly rejoices.

"With Johnston in front of him, and Pemberton in his rear cutting off his escape to the river, we regard the annihilation or capture of Grant's entire army as a positive certainty," says the Somerville Star for weeks. "As to starving out Vicksburg, we happen to know it to be victualed for a two years' siege."

Then follow tidings of the fall of Vicksburg. This is treated with scorn. For weeks after, it is amazing how many gentlemen arrive, not in Somerville, but in its immediate neighborhood, who "are sure to have left Vicksburg on the tenth or fifteenth of July, the place not having fallen then, nor having the least intention so to do."

Even when Vicksburg and Port Hudson are known to be captured—"We see only cause of congratulation in it," says the Somerville Star. "First, because of the tremendous loss—one hundred and fifty thousand is the lowest estimate—of the Federals in capturing those points; second, because it will occupy a large part of their army to garrison those places; third, in that guerrilla bands will as effectually prevent the navigation of the river as before!"

Yes, there is the engine fact. We Secessionists may attach infinite importance to an Object, may wait in most intense anxiety to know the result in regard to it, deny the existence of it indignantly for weeks after it has fallen, yet the instant it is known to be undoubtedly gone we cease to more for it, never we should ever have interested ourself so much in New Orleans, Vicksburg and Port Hudson, Chattanooga, Atlanta, Savannah, Mobile, whatever the object is in its turn; can even see now, are astonished we did not see it before, that the loss of each such place is on every account rather an advantage than a disadvantage to us. Not merely in words only or in editorials—to some degree actually in heart it is so! No doubt there is, with the occurrence of each disaster to the Confederate arms, a secret undermining going on in the understanding and heart of each even of the most rabid Secessionists, but it is unacknowledged at this period even to themselves. In exactly the same way, Dr. Ginnis, swelling and bursting to-day with some wonderful news of Foreign Intervention, Confederate Victory, and the like, abandons it to-morrow when it is known to be false, not only without much regret, but scarcely remembering even that he ever heard, much less believed, in any thing of the kind.

"But who," says MR. Ferguson, "can reason in regard to lunacy, or analyze infatuation? There is something even awful in it," he adds; "a supernatural folly at which I shudder, as at the direct doing of Jehovah."

At which point MR. Arthur corrects his friend by drawing distinction between the positive and the permissive providence of Heaven—a distinction lost upon the Scotchman, who quotes the case of Pharaoh and the children of Israel to a frightful degree in these days.

But even while we are scouting the lying rumors of the fall of Vicksburg all Somerville is electrified by tidings of the glorious victories of General Lee in Pennsylvania. The bells can not ring enough after the conversion of the Pennsylvania militia and the capture of forty thousand prisoners at Gettysburg. Brother Barker has been entrapped by false news so often by this time that he is far from being as credulous as of yore, yet, "Do you imagine General Lee would have crossed the Potomac if he did not know what he was about? Believe it; yes, brethren, with all my soul!" For who can resist, if it was only the big bell of his own church, to which little Joe Staples clings, with brief relays for refreshment, for hours at a time? And so, when he can be sure the bell stop long enough for him to be heard in special prayer, as on Sabbath, Brother Barker leaves all doubt in regard to his patriotism far behind.

It was a singular coincidence that Orange, plowing in his master's field, and Jem at work with his axe in the woods near Somerville, both paused from their labors at the first sound of the bells with about the same exclamation upon their lips.

"Dar's bad news for me!"

They, and, of their colored friends, not they alone, had made about the same remark once or twice before at the sound of distant explosions, taking them to be cannon for victory. These reports, however, had turned out to be only the blowing up—quite a common incident—accidentally, of powder-mills and all therein—no mistake about the bells, however.

Not that, returning to MR. Barker, his has been an altogether unruffled course. Like other eminent confessors in all ages he has had his troublous hits. Many, among the best of his church, have long ceased to attend thereat. There is MRS. Juggins.

"No, Brother Barker, I can't do it. It was bad enough to see you, a preacher of the Gospel of peace, marchin' along, as I see you that day in Somerville, with a gun on your shoulder, member of a company, practicing, too, with them, as a mark, I'm told! But for a disciple of the blessed Jesus to preach and pray as you do is more'n I can stand. Not only it is nothin' but politics, politics all the time with you in the pulpit and out of it—no Gospel; but, then, you're fiercer than Staples or Lamum, actually bloodthirsty an' bitter. God, He knows I love my country. I gave Tom for it, didn't I? Please God, I hope the Yankees may be whipped back where they come from. If they ain't, it won't be for want o' prayin' for it here South!"

All the Union people have ceased to come to church long ago, and to support the ministry," begins her spiritual leader.

"Can't help it, Brother," says MRS. Juggins, firmly; "the Colonel and I is getting old; since Tom was killed, too, I've seen things different. The Confederacy gaining its independence is a great thing, I dare say; but religion here, the reachin' a better world after this, is a better thing still. Dare say you have no idea how you've stopped preachin' and prayin' any thing but the Confederacy. And look at it. The Sabbath-school there in Somerville is broken up, they tell me. Except on some grand political occasion, they say you've only a handful to hear you. Then 'you know better'n I how many of the very pillars of our church, ministers even, some of them, has taken to drinkin', cursin', and swearin', swindling, and all manner of wickedness. As to sinners, they are further off than ever; and who's to blame?"

Yes, Brother Barker has a hard time of it as well as MR. Arthur. Somehow his salary is very slow in being paid, what little is promised, the reliance he placed upon his Secessionist admixture in this matter being exceedingly mistaken; ready enough they are to crowd his church on every political occasion to hear, and to inflame and inflate by their presence the violence of, sermon and prayers for the South.

"If the Almighty does not give victory to General Lee in this his march upon our wicked foes, the very angels of heaven will be ready to revolt," he had remarked one Sabbath morning in a sermon. Who could say more than that? Yet the subscription paper circulated the very day after on his behalf was far from as successful as it should have been. "We all greatly admire, esteem, approve Brother Barker's course—no man in all Somerville more patriotic and useful than he—yet the war has cut our means down so, and we have really so very many calls every week connected with the war, that we can not say at this moment what we can give, Brother; we will think upon it, however, and let you know."

"No, Sir, you must excuse me," Captain Simmons remarked when applied to. "True, I was early instructed to worship it in the sanctuary, and I could at this moment repeat to you, sing to you to its own tune, the hymn 'Away, away, away, away, away to Sabbath-school.' True, I do drop in to hear the parson when he gives us a red-hot sermon, prayers, and all the trimmings, on the times. But I can not disguise the fact that he is a—Yankee. My soul revolts at a Yankee and—you must excuse me."

There was the shameful way, also, in which Brother Barker was treated on his last visit to the Pines. The president is exceedingly averse to speaking of it, but it seems a camp of soldiers stationed there have varied their monotonous routine of slaughtering such fat beeves, and stealing such poultry and honey as they can lay hands upon, by insulting, hustling, throwing clods at Brother Barker on his last appointment. Not on Union principles at all—from sheer contempt of a religion which has ceased to save them in reference to things spiritual in its superhuman exertions to instruct and excite them in reference to the Confederacy.

Very slowly, indeed, the truth comes out in regard to the Gettysburg affair. Somerville has placed all its hopes on a long succession of heroes, dropping them in turn as easily as it has done great cities; for the time, even General Lee has shattered on the earth from the upward. The ebb and flow of feeling during these days among Secessionists and Union people—the one close being in the trough exactly as the instant the other is on the crest of the sea—who can describe!

Neither can be described the intense eagerness of MR. Arthur, Dr. Warner, MR. Ferguson, and all other Union people—it is amazing how many of them are left in Somerville still—for Federal papers. Colonel Guy Brooks, not a written line from him since he left, consents to get papers to friends in Somerville. Isaac Smith, painter, too, little he cared for literature of any sort, still less his big and butter-making wife; now the seal with which Isaac Smith, from within the Federal lines, pours in letters and papers upon his wife is wonderful. MRS. Smith's little parlor sees, and sees very often too, visitors it never dreamed of before. Let fat MRS. Smith get a package as large as your hand at night—and her mails almost invariably arrived at that period—before noon to-morrow she had a dozen applications from friends to know the news. And a great deal of news Isaac Smith managed to smuggle in; only, alas! Isaac, from long use perhaps of his brush, gave so much—so little proving to be true. For, let the truthful record be made, we Union people in Somerville are almost as credulous in regard to the news we wish to be true as are the Secessionists—not quite, but almost.

"DIDN'T I TELL YOU SO?"

But, ah, the eagerness with which we clutch a paper from the North! We get it as a great favor, to be read as rapidly as possible, to be returned exactly at such an hour to such a place. We button it up in our breast-pocket, and hurry home. We must not be seen with it on the streets. Arrived at home, we arrest all the household work, turn the children ignominiously out of the room with terrible threats in case they come in again, which, by-the-by, they are sure to do a dozen times during the reading of precious paragraphs which can not be postponed a moment; and so we carefully unfold and read the precious paper aloud to wife or sister, in a nothing of all the Union people in the neighborhood cautiously summoned in to hear. The editorials, dispatches, items, advertisements of hair oil, and the like—with greedy hunger we let no morsel or crumb of the paper escape us. In spite of all the effort we made, a dozen readers to one have had the document before us, as dozens will, eagerly wondering why we can not remember that others want the paper as well as ourselves and get through with it after us. In consequence of this, the paper is painfully illegible at the fold; we have, in the course of the most interesting articles, to stop and puzzle around the chasms, often to take a flying leap over them and proceed. The little scraps of patriotic poetry, here and there, we often memorize even. And so the paper circulates till it is read, literally, to shreds.

There was Everett's speech at the Dedication at Gettysburg. Could the orator have imagined the zest with which his words there spoken would have been read from soiled and worn-out sheets by thousands at the South his soul would have turned with a greater enthusiasm than any weakened in him by the audience then visible to his eye. Who of us forgets the keen enjoyment with which we read our first fairy tales in childhood's sweet hour—not so keen, so delicious that gratification as the reading, during the war, of all thoroughly American matter coming in to us parched with thirst, from abroad. The circulation through Somerville of one good paper of the kind did all the Union people—for of no individual thereof read it, every soul did or had it repeated to him—evident good for weeks to come. Perhaps the full measure of the allowance—with food doled out to the wrecked at sea—increased its value, months often elapsing between the rations. Let us keep secret the absolute faith even Mr. Ferguson placed in the least assertions of a Northern paper, his belief heroin as absolute as sweeping as his unbelief in reference to the Somerville Star and all its kind. And, as men build a mural tablet into the wall of a house to mark with due solemnity, permit the insertion here of its profound truth, that in very much every sense of the word human nature at the Union and the South is exactly the same; with superficial differences we are at last One people.

The fall of Vicksburg and Port Hudson and the victory at Gettysburg send the Union people of Somerville quite up upon the crest of the ever-rolling sea, and—Mr. Ellis, Dr. Ginnis, lower all of all—the Secessionists down into the trough thereof for months to come.

"I tell you, ma'am," Dr. Peel says to the editor of the Somerville Star, toiling away cold, pale, steady as ever in his business of lying by power-press, more consistent in falsehood than even Bill Perkins brings in his budget—"I tell you, mam, one screw loose in the machinery of the Confederate Government is the way the Post-office is managed. What avails all you say in your paper so long as there as a perpetual stream of private letters coming in to the contrary? Federal papers, too, these Union people are constantly getting them; letters, also, from friends in the Federal lines—such things I question them, so to speak, to hold out. If a few more of them could be hanged—!"

But the remedy has been so thoroughly tried—not actually in Somerville, as yet, but all around it. There was Mrs. Isaac Smith's brother, John Jones. Who did not know him? Gray-headed with fifty years of farming—farming with his own hard hands alone these days, his boys now in the Confederate service—he owning no negroes.

"You see, Mr. Arthur," Mrs. Isaac Smith says to that individual, who hurries to see her—is she not a member of his church?—on hearing of the catastrophe, "you know John was in Union sentiment, he tried to help its being known, but he couldn't. Not that he said any thing. He made a point to stay close at home—never opened his lips. But he was my brother, you know, and my husband being gone that was enough. Every once in a while he'd come over from his place—fifteen miles, you know, it is from here—to bring me a little butter, or cheese, or wheat, you know, happened he could get, ever since Jim Boldin waylaid and shot down his own brother-in-law, Mr. Tanner—they do say Mrs. Tanner, his sister, she is a bitter secessionist, actually put her brother Jim up to it—ever since Tanner was found lying dead in the road with a ball through his head for being a Union man. John has been careful as a man could be. Letters from Isaac! How could John get letters from Isaac? As God hears me, Mr. John never saw one that I didn't show him. But you've heard the story. I have no heart to tell it, hardened as I'm getting to almost any tales. A party of a dozen of them broke into his house at midnight: said to his daughters, poor things! screaming around, they only wanted to take him to Somerville to be conscripted. Sarah, the eldest, knew better; she clung to him till they tore her off, some of them holding her to the wall while they tied John's hands. As they was dragging him out, Sarah she begged and screeched only to be let give him—her gray-headed old father—one last kiss; they wouldn't let her do even that, the man holding her saying such things——

"Can you make yourself believe, Sir, that such a thing can be true in this Christian land?" says Mrs. Smith, pausing, quite, quite exhausted with weeping till not a tear is left, emotion itself worn out from exercise so intense.

"Sarah Jones," she says, "I don't know how could tell you herself. They dragged that unoffending old man—lived fifteen years in the neighborhood—out of his house, mounted on their horses, and rode off at full speed, holding the end of the rope. Of course when he couldn't run he was dragged. Sarah tracked the way clear by the bits of his clothes on the brush till she lost the trail over the rocks. No one but her, and those not twelve years old, near night she finds her father at last. They had hung him by the neck from a blackjack. God knows whether he was beaten by them before he died, because they did not know how to tie the rope so as to strangle, but he was warm yet when she came upon him. He had been hanged by the left armpit and agony full fifteen hours. Sarah she had never thought to bring a knife—just think if you can of that poor child—but she got working there——"

But here there is loud crying from the next room of the little house—Sarah has been weakened from her slumber of exhaustion by her aunt, who has forgotten in her excitement that her niece is asleep there.

"We must get used to it, mam; like things in all varieties of hellish barbarity are taking in all varieties of hellish barbarity are taking place every day," says Mr. Ferguson, to whom Mr. Arthur has been telling the story. "The National Government will see to it—not help National Government. Why was purpose the Almighty is leaving us to ourselves."

"But to me the strongest part of the infatuation of these men around us," says Mr. Arthur, walking the floor of Mr. Ferguson's room like a caged leopard, "is that they are so blind to sin literally exactly where Dr. Warner and you and I and all other Union men of Somerville—and I know of more and more of them every day—usually stand. Do you suppose Mr. Ellis, Captain Simmons, Bob Withers, Ginnis, the Lathrops—the very leaders of society—not as an individual at the North, in the Federal army, in the Cabinet at Washington—not Lincoln himself more thoroughly, utterly damned?"

"Sh-sh-sh, man, not so loud!" says cautious Mr. Ferguson.

"And expect me actually to pray for the success——"

"We must beware of becoming too excited. It is very easy to exaggerate the wickedness of the Gospel when thereof, for ceasing to have main reference to things spiritual, and becoming far too much occupied with things political. This world, Wonder if I am not doing the very same thing? he thinks. If they are too excited for what they call their country's cause, is it not the cause of sin mine? True, theirs is a wicked rebellion; my interest is in my country, in which is involved civilization, freedom, the whole question. And all he can conclude is to set more vigorous watch upon his heart, out of which are all intemperate deeds, words, thoughts, the issues and springs of life. For grace to do which he prays there and then. Only there is the same sense of exhaustion in prayer that there is in reading the Scripture and in preaching. Leading the life of a pariah with most in Somerville every day, all little encouragement—every emotion in such perpetual and intense play—thought, forever on the strain—inefficiency of actual labor to give relief—feeling——

And Alice? If she was a thousand miles away now! God forbid—she is not. Alice, in fact, is not, like the Princess of Fairy Tale, alive to her lover in all her charms, yet inclosed beyond any thing but mere sight in Secessionville. Not that

Oh yes, we, of course, the writer knows all that fully as well as the reader; but Mr. Arthur, though he ought to have known better, does not. It is the easiest thing in the world for you to say how you would have gone boldly to her side as a man. Very easy, too, for Alice herself, had a perfectly frank and full conversation with herself, and, if necessary, with her mother. You have their consent to go. You have only to write, hoping, fearing so long. Very well; better despise him for cowardice in the matter than that he should run any gross risk, or should despoil himself for telling a falsehood in the matter. "If I was Alexander I would do so and so," said Napoleon. "And so would I were I Hephæstion," replied Alexander. You have, dear reader, first to be Mr. Arthur, defects and all, and then to be exactly in his place, with rather peculiar position, before you can decide how he should have acted.

"We so-called Union people here in Somerville are like—By-se I do not mean to include you, Miss Alice," says Mr. Arthur to her one day, "are like the Israelites of old encamped at Mrs. Bowles's, and finds that lady away from home assisting down-town in the preparations for a supper to behalf the 8th cold soldiers—the proceeds somehow never reaching them in its transit through so very many hands—very little at least—and that paper-money into which the specie paid in has become singularly transmuted. We dare not stop to ask whether, before calling at Mrs. Bowles's, Mr. Arthur knew or not of that lady's absence. How could he? Was not that lady's absence, unconsciously asked Miss Alice if her mother was at home?

"Mrs. Bowles people in and around Somerville," he repeats, having corrected himself from daring to class his fair friend among them, "are like the children of Israel——"

"In parity of purpose or in degree of persecution?" asks Alice, looking up—what beautiful eyes! making the question—from her sewing. Is ever woman lovelier? demands Mr. Arthur of himself, warming himself in her presence after long and chilling among winds and frosts and icebergs without.

"It was of their kindly feeling toward each other that I spoke," he says. "Not a day I do not hear of some charitable and generous deed. You have long heard of old Mr. Adams——"

"Yes, the struggling, feeble-seeds, smokehouses, grain-bins, poultry-yard seem to have ceased to be his own this last year. He gives away as freely as he breathes. People send their wagons, and help themselves as a matter of course. Provided, you know——"

"The equivalent is promptly dilolyal—to the Confederacy I mean," says Alice with, did ever woman have so sweet a smile since Eve was created? says Mr. Arthur to himself. "Oh, yes," she continues, "Mr. Neely was telling me of it when he was here last night; no, it was when he was here last week. He tells me his Union people are more like one family dwelling over town in different houses—what belongs to one belongs to all. It happened that Mrs. Isaac Smith's son this morning, and I noticed no less than three wagons unloading sacks of something—pigs, turkeys, chickens, I suppose—every thing, and met two immense ox teams going in that direction with wood as I came away."

Like one family! More loving with each other than the members of families generally are. Those of the Union people in Somerville who did not know each other's names or residence had long now become well acquainted. Long before this had old quarrels between such of them as had been of any consequence ceased. The distinction of occupation, denomination, property between these say longer. Treated with contempt, or with scowls, by all Secessionists, Union people can not even pass each other on the street without stopping to shake hands. On the most frivolous pretexts, or none at all, they are visiting each other, specially when "disastrous news" is afloat, all the day. The very children of Union people confidently expect now, when they pass him on the street, as much of a smile as Mr. Ferguson ever manages to bring into his face. As to that, more than once or twice has sober little Robby Sorel come home laden with gifts from men he has met in town of whom he only knows that they asked his name.

And how Mr. Arthur cherishes, hidden among his sermons, letters of encouragement, anonymous, honestly signed, drop-letters from persons in Somerville, long letters from strangers in distant parts, all to the same purpose, while the writers venture decided opinions in reference to current events in guarded language, and with no sign on the part of the writers after very much thought, and as original and remarkable discoveries as Mr. Arthur ever made. The plain country people that take Mr. Arthur cautiously to one side when they meet him, and break to him their little troubles and misunderstandings, their views, or ride out, introduce themselves, and spend the night at Mrs. Sorel's so as to be the much deeper in his devotion to the Union and his execration for the Confederacy from within a hundred wrappings, like a precious jewel in a casket of velvet—soft. And the delight, too, mingled with fears that he may not be prudent as he should be, of the new friend who has lately come to Mrs. Bowles's, exactly the same opinions, so very decided and clear.

Not plain people, obscure and quiet only.

"Parson Arthur, I want to know, I want to say a word to you," says Bob Withers, whom Mr. Arthur meets face to face on horseback in a very constricted part of Somerville looking as if the church compliles, but with very cold manner, for, like almost every man of his class in Somerville, Bob Withers has no use for Mr. Arthur in public; Mr. Arthur, therefore, is doubly shy of him. But Bob's open, cordial face is irresistible.

"I've wanted to see you for a long time. But in strict confidence, by George! mind—in strict confidence, Parson. You look pale and worn, and no wonder Somerville looking as if you didn't have a friend there. I wanted to tell you it's a mistake—you've plenty, only we don't like to say it, by George! Now you've got it. You just out, Parson; that's what you've got to do, hold out! I ain't a professor myself, as you well know, Parson, and I'm not even at all what I'd ever thought it could be. Worse? The lying, swindling, shirking, stealing, murdering, unsexual scoundrels! Oh, you're right, by George! You only hold out—that's what I say, hold out! And if you think I don't know as well as you that this whole thing is hurrying, like every other spree, slam bang to eternal smash, you are just, by George! mistaken. Yes, Sir-ree!"

And Mr. Arthur does not see his way clear to refuse the double eagle Bob Withers presses upon him, having with him a token of regard when they part at last. As to that, no one can write a letter or speak a word, "in confidence," to Mr. Sir," without doing something of the same kind. Though Brother Barker even would have been almost satisfied with the confidence with which Bob Withers and Mr. Arthur pass each other on the street the very next day.

In fact Bob Withers is very far from being the only prominent Secessionist of whom Mr. Arthur could have told some singular things if he had wished. Why do we say why? when done last autumn by Vicksburg, Port Hudson, and Gettysburg?

Even the grand old Major seems to look more benignantly than of old from his frame, this spring morning of eighteen hundred and sixty-four, upon Mr. Arthur having himself in the society of the Major's daughter. Very dignified and reserved indeed the visitor intended to be from his friend's, very unexpectedly, that he must be entertained by the daughter instead of the mother. It was, after all formal inquiries in reference to Belledge Boys, at whose name both color simultaneously; after being fully informed in reference to Mrs. Bowles's health, whom he always leaves to have some prayer, thinner, more nervous than ever from what he has casually heard and seen of her: after Alice has volunteered to speak of the interest he is intending to keep, after all this and a little old music too, that Mr. Arthur, slipping from sheet to sheet of music, finds himself in a variety of topics by the reference to the kindliness among Union people.

He ventures, Mrs. Sorel and Robby being mentioned, to tell how the latter is advancing in his studies. Nor can he resist the inclination by this time to tell how Robby has contributed for about the hundredth time on his last errand into Somerville by Joe Staples. But Mr. Arthur restrains from mentioning the word Yankee, free negro, Abolitionist, traitor, and a good deal worse with which Robby was assailed. That he had every right to do so, and that he had long ago become accustomed to, though it took a long time before Robby could endure being cursed as an Abolitionist, and being somewhat separated into him as far worse than any other epithet in the world—the quintessence of all abuse. But when Joe Staples had called Robby the bastard child of Robby's pony, and would not let the child pass till he had been sufficiently cursed, nothing might left for it, Robby, in a frenzy, flew at him to his fate, and pitched in, demure little fellow as he was, with his neat jeans suit and sun hat freely off, in a scrubbing of Staples's, intensified Staples Senior's hatred for the Union people, and Mr. Ellis's contempt for Alice Cherry that night at table against ever associating with a boy so desperately depraved as Robby Sorel.

"And she to set herself off from every body, and pretend to be so very strict with her child herself, you a Bible class teacher in the best room. "You hear what I say, children? If ever I know of your associating yourselves with them——" Mr. Ellis, and so on.

"Do you know," says Alice, at last, "that Mrs. Warner and Mr. Ellis, and the others who have suffered from the strictness of Robby, offended that you never have called even to see them since they withdrew?"

"And really you have urged me so often to do so, too," adds her visitor, reflecting her smile. "Would you have me do so, Alice—Miss Alice?"

What a beautiful color there is in the cheek of her hair, in the plain collar around her neck, in the flow of her calico dress—one she has had now four years if he only knows it—in her rising grace, a heavenly sweetness! After so long, long a period, too, of anxiety, disappointment, alienation from a hundred friends, to find once he exaggerated her, idealized, apotheosized—just as we must not trust what is said of Italy by travelers from one long year's end until in crossing the Alps. So rapidly and thoroughly has this lover thawed, beyond all his resolves when he left Alice to her own devices, her not even shaking hands with her on his first coming. Five minutes more, and, having lost all resolve to the contrary as it had never been, Mr. Arthur will have learned his fate. A discourse infinitely more impassioned and eloquent than he has ever delivered from the Belledge pulpit already borns on his lips, when—the big bell of Brother Barker's church first, then, clamorage in on the three places in a moment one by one, every bell in Somerville! Really and truly it was the great, hidden, unacknowledged movement, from the recent Federal victories, which had thrown these two thus so close together. At the first blow made by Joe Staples—yet stiff from his fight—but a variety to the scene—upon the big bell, these two are far asunder. His fault, his, not hers!

And here are Mrs. Bowles and Mr. Neely. Great news, glorious news! From the States west of the Mississippi this time. Banks is repulsed at Marksville; Sherman's wagons, fifty cannon, innumerable prisoners, all the gun-boats and transports; not the least doubt but the next mail will bring accounts of the capture or destruction of the last vestige of the Federal forces.

Slight, pallid, enthusiastic Mrs. Bowles! She strives, in the fullness of her joy, to be quiet from habitual refinement, but fairly radiates with excitement. And Mr. Neely, somewhat fat, physically as well as pecuniarly, upon his contractorship, he is rosy as morning, rubbing his hands, pulling down his waistcoat, jubilant in every curl of his hair, in every motion of his body, for he can not sit still! If any thing was needed to brim his cup it was meeting Mr. Arthur in just that parlor on just that occasion. Even the old Major overhead beams upon them in grander proportions, struggling in his frame to speak.

And just at this juncture it is that Brother Barker makes that fatal mistake of his. The Somerville Star is full of the news. Tim Lamum and Hon. Wilcox shake hands over Sumter and during three months before from something rising out of poker. Dr. Peel has read the dispatches aloud in a dozen crowds, with running oaths of confirmation. Even Bill Perkins, fallen back into a mere stage-driver on account of Confederate distress, he has been bringing up Jeup, with vague sense on the part of the people that he is somehow to blame for them, is treated till he can not stand. Dr. Ginnis, indeed, from two shabbiest collapse, in five minutes, by the news, to his fullest former proportion, is up and down every street, in and out of every store in the place, slapping his hands together, drawing back his sleeves, wheezing but irrepressible, gesticulating though he can not speak.

There is Mrs. Warner; from some sudden whirl, given by the Confederate disasters, she has been prophesying defeat and ruin to the South for weeks on weeks now. Not a bit less vituperative. She spites her small-talk as regretfully as ever, denouncing the swindling, stealing, lying officials of the Confederacy, their cowardice and inaction! She does not say with, "We are whipped—whipped, I tell you!" but even adds, "And I'm glad of it, because I hope the Northern mills and shops will be so miserable fellows floating about with their stripes and ambulances and things, when they ought to be off in the front, as they call it, fighting." All of which falls incessant upon Dr. Warner, who droops his head and rates it, conscious of being in some general way guilty of a little self. Even if he is balder these days, what he loses in hair he makes up in flesh—a shortbreathed man, but used to the small air, after all. The instant Dr. Warner could tell his wife this last news, before he had got it half out of his lips, his wife had snapped her forefinger and thumb, and thrust the former within half an inch of his nose.

"Didn't I tell you so, Dr. Warner? I want you to tell me that this instant! Didn't I tell you so? Didn't I tell you, over and over again, over again, we would whip them yet? Always croaking!—telling me about your Gettysburgs and Vicksburgs! I will see sick of you, sir! And you a pious man—at least, pretend to be, and doubt that God is a just Being! Wanted me to beg of Brother Barker!"

Which brings us back to the fatal mistake made by that clergyman when the news comes of Barker's decline.

"I hope so, I hope so!" he says, having hold of Mr. Ellis's hand, with peculiarly mournful intonation of the word "hope;" "but I am afraid. We have been so often deceived—I myself, on one occasion—by mere idle rumors. You, as a Christian, will understand me when I say that on the hand of Satan, the Father of Lies, often put forth these days. For some inscrutable purpose, always against the best and holiest of causes, but," adds Brother Barker, with a sorrowful shake of his head, "we are not ignorant of his devices. I hope so, Brother Ellis, but I fear—I fear not."

Even Mr. Ferguson, pasting the dispatches as they come into his Scrap-book—with great enthusiasm of purchase of his beard, though insincerest apprehension is tugging at its roots—even Mr. Ferguson might have admired the sorrowful, not to say morose, disbelief in the glorious tidings by Brother Barker, as he shakes them away, with boding head and sorrowful hand, through the crowds upon the streets.

Long ago, like all his class, his chiefest associations have been, especially on the street, with striped officials and brass-buttoned heroes. He may be talking with Sam Peters about his bad fall from his horse, awfully exaggerated by Sam; or with Smithers, also a member of his church, about Mrs. Smithers's last vocalistic runaway of a cook; even with Mrs. Warner, who regularly attends his church now, and always breaks Mr. Arthur's course in conversation with her as pastor—whoever it is with whom he is speaking, let Brother Barker but catch sight of a military man passing, or over the street, and, with a hurried excuse, he is off to speak to the son of Mars, or to get an introduction—oftener to introduce himself, if unacquainted.

But when this news of our glorious victory over Banks in Louisiana arrives, Brother Barker fails to render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's.

"I hope so, Captain Simmons—ho-pe so," he says, sadly, as realizing the universal joy, the joy, gently deprecating it, with open hand, as a father among his thoughtless children—"but I fear me—ah-r me!"

And this illustrates just what Mr. Neely so bitterly bewails—the deep-seated, utterly incurable want of faith in even the most loyal men going of Northern-born Secessionists on the part of Southern-born men.

"Gentlemen, you see that person who has just left us," says Captain Simmons, full of solemn joy, and something else, over the news, his left arm around a friendly post; "Rev. [the] Mr. [the] Barker, resi-resident clergy-clergyman of this commun-munity. Did you ob—[he]—observe the statement he impartly-imparted to me [the]? We having ful-fullest dispatches of a glori-glorious achev-y-achievement, he, the [the] individual, doubts it, gently-gentlemen, doubts it!" (Intense scorn.) "But do you comfy-comfy-comfy-ure the reason? A Southern! I ady-admit he toils hard [the] to hide it—very hard. It will come out. Not a Yankee in [the] the whole Confedy-Confederacy this day [the] but is a double traitor—traity-traitor to his own sick-sack-section, and a traitor to [the] us. My earliest inf-infancy was, I may say, sat-sit-saturated with reverence for the cloth. But that Yankee, Bub-Barker, I revolt from. To those of his birth I apply the language of the—the hymn: 'Touch not, taste not, handle not!'"

It is reasonable, therefore, to wonder at the frantic effort made by Brother Barker to right himself, when, on the morrow, the most touching felicitations because of the overflowing flesh. The great overseas in West Baton Rouge have been abandoned, and the people of the parish, and of Iberville and Point Coupée, driven by the Yankees from their homes, many of them to perish miserably. The accumulating waters from these overseas have left a sea-like lake in the neighboring bayous and bodies so that a large portion of the Acadian, or Teche country, is flooded, and the people have fled to the highlands. And now, in the midst of all this astounding disaster, come rumors of the fall of Shreveport, on the Missouri, the Arkansas, Red, and all the other tributaries of the mighty river, the Mississippi, threatening to wash every whatever little of dry land is left to us."

WASHINGTON MARKET.

It is a city which boasts the best markets of the world as regards the excellence of the commodities offered for sale in them it is shameful that these markets should be, of all others, the most filthy in their surroundings and the meanest in their structure.

For the present necessities of the city their situation is unfortunate, but they are not sufficiently central; they were built over a century ago, when they were probably very conveniently located, but now they are in the extreme eastern quarters of the city, where they are least needed. They are difficult of access, also, on account of the crowded streets. They are in the midst of a dense central population of the island large, clean, and tastefully-constructed markets, such as shall be an ornament to the city instead of being, as now they are, reckoned an nuisances?

Of our large markets Washington Market, of which we give an illustration on page 332, is the oldest. Its first charter dates from 1686—a century before the establishment of our republic, and long before the birth of the illustrious patriot from whom it was afterward named.

SPRING.

SWEET Spring has come, and once again,
Or hill and plain,
She weaves her mantle fair and green,
In brightest shades of emerald sheen,
With pinks and crocuses between;
And lays it down
Where late the white and chilly snow,
So loth to go,

Sweet Spring has come, she wakes again;
For hark! a strain
Of woodland melody she rings;
The air is stir'd with glancing wings,
With crystal pipes and twitterings,
From conscious birds
While Jamblin' runneth on the mead,
With velvet tread,
Skip in and out among the herds.

Sweet Spring has come; we through the shade
Of bower and glade
Can trace her footsteps in the dark,
By silver glints from larchen bark,
And purpling bud-lights on the stark
And leafless trees;
Or by the gleams from sunlit streams,
Whose dancing beams
The gentle ferns mistake for vows.

Sweet Spring has come, and in my heart
Its passions start
Joy's babbling rivulets gayly sing,
Like silver chimes that sweetly ring,
And new-plumed hopes take lighter wing,
And tempt new flights
E'en star-bright eyes and rose lips fair
Spring blooming there,
And promise autumn wealth of love.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE pedestrians of New York city make no special claim to say "right of way" in the streets. But it is necessary to cross these streets frequently; but carts, and cartage never deign to regard those who humbly go on foot. It is Mr. Roberts' expect say without intention. If, by means of dodging behind one vehicle, and before another, and running clear of a third a vehicle, they succeed in crossing without being crushed, they are simply thankful, and never for an instant cherish the idea that they have a right to be in the street at all.

Moreover, our citizens have uncomplainingly and generously submitted to a portion of the city taxation which are generally supposed to be for the special use of pedestrians. Crosswalks, flagged sidewalks, and innumerable miniature banns for various merchandise, have long been patiently tolerated. Such by rule has it been with our fellow-citizens until the majority of second-class merchants could not display a pair of boots without one of slaughtered animals, artistically arranged over barrels of pickled pork, and bags of potatoes. The corner grocery sign extends far and wide in the shape of boxes of hard soap, casks of dried apples, and buckets of lard and pease; while one's hand is not unfrequently entangled in the meshings of hoop skirts and brilliant-colored flannel and delain which waringly announce that dry-goods "are sold here" for "less than cost." But New Yorkers bow their heads submissively, beat a retreat if necessary, or pass on.

There is, however, a limit beyond which forbearance ceases to be a virtue. Some of our sidewalks appear to be exclusively used for lumber-rooms and packing places; and heretofore the public has been in such a supineness. Pass down Beekman Street, for example, or you can find an equally good Pi specimen in many other directions if you prefer. Boxes, barrels, casks, and bales of goods literally cover the sidewalk. Bundles of rags, and newspapers, and packages of every conceivable kind of merchandise are stored, apparently, on the flag-stones. A man weighing a hundred and twenty, or a woman with the smallest possible crinoline, would be imperiled by the attempt to squeeze through, to say nothing of garments soiled and rent. But perhaps this is some extraordinary emergency, a mere temporary state of things. There is a people of hours later, the blockade continues. Come back again to-morrow—next week, next month, and next ensuing in the same condition.

Really it does not seem as though it would be unreasonable to mildly suggest that a small passage way be reserved on the sidewalk for those who do not invariably ride in cars or carriages.

The May Anniversaries appear to have been carried on with unusual spirit and interest this year. The mass of Germans, who, in the greatest measure in the English, many days which adorned last week; and which enticed many to wander from their usual haunts, "to spend an hour at home." Among the many meetings of interest, the Anniversary of the Institution of the Deaf and Dumb, that of the Institution for the Blind, and the "Howard Mission and Home for Little Wanderers" were especially attractive. Ten thousand persons were convicted in the latter Society, several gentlemen giving one thousand each. At the session of the American Geographical Society, at this thousand five hundred dollars were donated, at the instance of Gerrard Hosack, for the purpose of establishing a church in Washington, where the "truth" should be "outspoken" and "proclaimed aloud."

Of course, during this coming season, all cases of colic, cholera morbus, cholera infantum, dysentery, and of every kindred disease, will be vigorously met by administering masses as tenancies of genuine Asiatic cholera. Let those who can think be sensible, and avoid alike the two extremes—indifference and fear.

Something like the following is said to be an everyday scene:

"Omnibus crowded. Enter two young la— of the female persuasion. Gentleman, rising to one of Y. L.'s, "Take this seat, Miss?" "No, sir, I thank you." "Sure, ma, katy? No, No, you take it, Mary dear." No, I, sir, no, Mary, you better stand; you're used to it." "No, no; I can just as well stand." No, I, "You had better sit down, Mary." Skirts rustling, feet entangled, door half-way open, and wind blowing in the dust. "No, I, You'll take it, Mary, dear." "No, indeed, I can very well stand, Mary dear." Bustles skirts, spends down, feet rub and tangle, gentleman rises and says he will just allow into hat of young gentlemen on the other, and—seated. Gentleman who surrendered his seat having been utterly ignored in this conversation, vows, as he hangs on the conductor's strap, he will never rise again, not for a princess."

The Parisian correspondent of one of our daily journals states that a French manufacturer has completed for the Duke of Wellington a watch of novel and peculiar construction, for the which was constructed that the Duke himself, who is well known to be of an inquisitive temper, and can not rest satisfied with an hour in any matter without feeling an irresistible inclination to look at his watch. This being very inquisitive the Duke devised an ingenious plan to accustom himself to hear without seeing—namely, the wiser for it. The watch manufactured for him is a silent repeater. It is provided with a spring, upon touching which a small hammer issues from the case and strikes an hour in the palm of the hand. Should the next hour be due, the Duke will merely need to strip his hand carelessly into his pocket, touch the spring, and he is immediately informed of the time of day. The only difficulty will be that all the papers will publish a description of the trinket, and the Duke had it somewhat disappointed to get his hand in his pocket without having his secret discovered.

The death of Mrs. Carlyle took place under very peculiar circumstances. She was taking her usual afternoon drive in Hyde Park, when her little favorite dog, which was running on the side of the carriage, jumped over by a carriage. She was greatly alarmed, though the dog was not seriously hurt. She lifted the dog into the carriage and the man drove off. The dog made every sign of direction from his mistress, as was usual, he stopped the carriage and alighted from her, as he thought, in a fit, and drove to St. George's Hospital, which was near at hand. When there it was discovered that the poor lady had been dead some little time. Mrs. Carlyle's health had been for several months feeble, but not in a state to excite anxiety or alarm. She descended lately into the dwelling of "the once well-known Dr. Welsh, of Haddington, and, with glad heart, dreamt of her own, the inherited mark of the force and penetration of her father's intellect. She was worthy to be the life companion of Thomas Carlyle."

The Cleveland Herald gives an account of a singular case of suspended animation—a trance of twenty-four hours in duration. A young female, recently married, was taken suddenly ill at his place of business, and in two days was, to all appearance, dead. Arrangements were about to be made for the interment, when the young wife insisted that the funeral be postponed; and she remained in the room with the supposed corpse. During the time that he could not be cead. She became convinced that she perceived the body move. Her friends were then summoned to her room and tried to divert her mind from the sorrowful scene. Two long hours were spent in conversation, the friends urging that the husband was, possibly by the flickering light. Then, suddenly, another slight movement was perceived by all, and the husband was followed may be imagined. The husband and wife are now living, well and happy.

In a series of interesting experiments, lately made, a woman's tongue has been found capable of moving one thousand nine hundred and twenty words in one minute. Think of that, ye who argue that woman is inferior to man! Profane a specimen of the masculine gender who can accomplish such a feat in whatever, in a minute.

The following characteristic anecdote of Dr. Franklin is not so sure as it is good:

During the last residence of Dr. Franklin in Paris he was once invited to a party of the nobility, by whom the Doctor was idolized and worshipped. One lady remarked that the Bible was devoid of all literary pain and Franklin, overhearing it, then appealed to him for opinion. He replied that he was hardly prepared on the spur of the moment to say, but he had more than once merits of a new book of rare excellency whatever: and as requested he left it with a few of the beauty characters they had pressed to take attention to themes to compare with it. The next evening it unlike pleasure, and he, with that old volume the merits of Dr. Franklin, in his turn, politely read them a portion of it, and was eager to hear the rare and sincere manner he of his rare book. It was a very pocket, and with a gripped hand, as old book from his pocket.

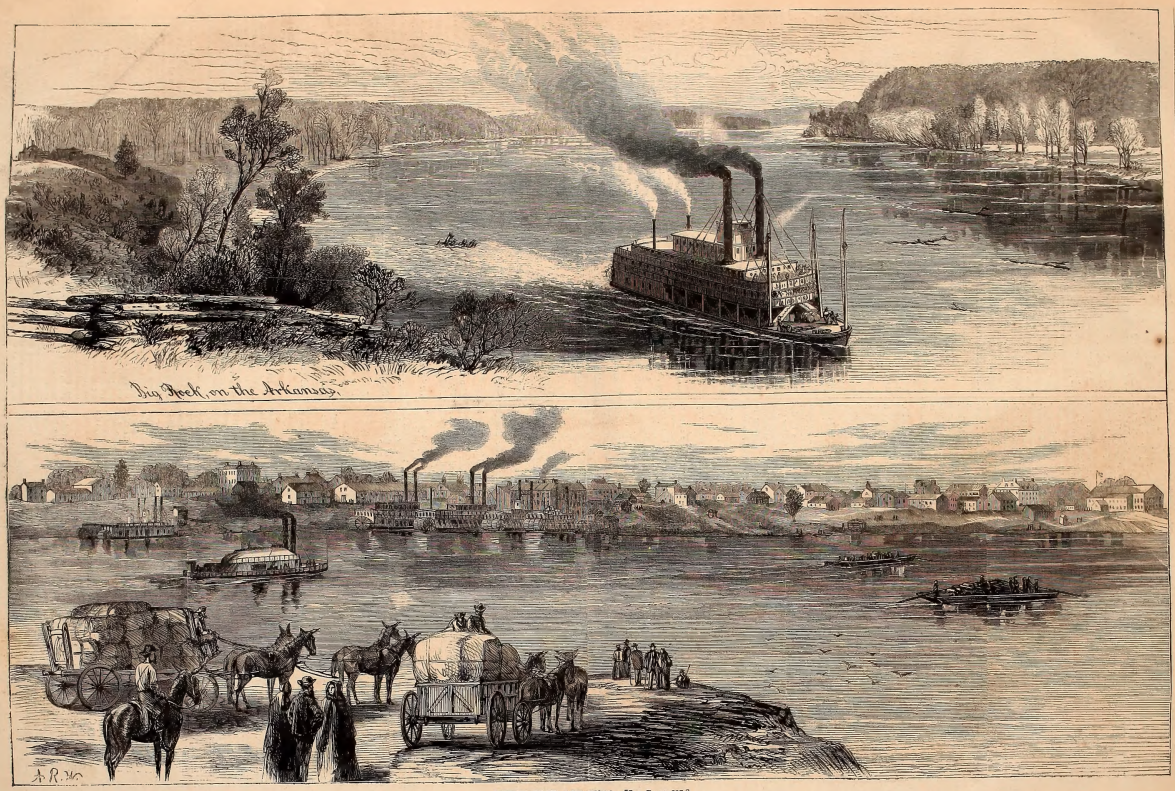
Of utterance read to the admiring listeners pe—



The poem had they had ever heard or read.

Encored it the boy said one.

"That is primary," said another.

"That is," exclaimed the third, "was the unavailing hope of his age. They all wished to know the name of the most beautiful work that was a specimen of its contents.

"Most beautiful, indeed!" said the Doctor, opening his book, "certainly, gentlemen," and the book passage. It is no other than the Bible, which you have read from your infancy, and often, than your good-for-nothing Bible, and I have read you the prayer of the prophet Habakkuk."

CLARA'S TEMPER.

I WANTED new carpets in the parlors, and my Uncle Andrew declared they were unnecessary. Now that was not so; for only I knew how they had been turned and coaxed and even mended. And why, seeing that every one knew my uncle was rich, should the best rooms of the house look shabby? It was bad enough to live down-town where no one else did; to have the busy law-office so tie first-floor; and to pass long days seeing no one but the clerks and the cat, as I had done often and often since I kept house for Uncle Andrew, without being ashamed to ask any one in besides. We lived well enough, goodness knew, and might save, if that were an object, out of spiced dishes and hot ragouts and costly wines. And it was fit dictates of uncle, perfectly preposterous. We had had a wordy war about it, and I sat trifling with my tea-cup, while my uncle was pacing up and down the room, puncning down upon me now and then with one of those perfectly rounded sentences which always aggravated me so when I was in a passion; and we were enjoying ourselves as two such hottempered people would be apt to do, when Barbara's voice arose above the din, crying:

"Here's a gentleman been knocking for half an hour. I do suppose, and couldn't make himself heard for the lawyer."

And in the midst of the sudden silence a tall figure passed her and came into the room, but, to my relief, with that gentlemanly air, equally removed from the servile bend of an inferior and the flourish of the dancing-master, which so plainly marks the upstart gentleman. I felt my hot face flush anew with shame at the very thought of being seen so red with anger. And what had I been saying? I could not remember. All sorts of passionate things for this cool, calm, quiet man to hear. I beat over the teacups, wishing I could quietly sink through the floor as I often did when my angry feelings came to an end, and I saw what a fury they had made of me.

Meanwhile gentleman was talking to uncle.

"Mr. Andrew, I believe?" he said.

My uncle bowed. The gentleman handed him a card.

"Aha!" cried my uncle, growing genial at once. "Mr. Rushton—glad to see you, Sir. I have been expecting you. Take a seat, Sir, take a seat. We have not yet finished breakfast. Pray join us."

"Thank you, I have breakfasted," replied the stranger.

"No matter," said my uncle; "an extra cup of tea or coffee hurts no man. Barbara, a cup and plate. We are no more sociable. I don't know whether you are a sociable man, Sir, but I am. Now, Clara. My niece, Sir."

I saw in the glass between the windows a very meek and very pale face indeed. I was a monster, and I heard a voice to match—not in the least like a virago voice of half an hour before—inquire whether Mr. Rushton would take cream and sugar.

I was naturally far from bashful, but that day I could scarcely bring to me look at our guest, and I listened to the conversation without joining in it by a word. Indeed, there was not much opportunity for me to speak. The talk was all of law matters. Of the case of X versus X, in which my uncle was engaged for the plaintiff. Of the numerous letters on which he most depended for evidence, written in such a peculiar, illomantic style as almost to defy translation, yet every word of great importance. Of the assistance Mr. Rushton's perfect knowledge of French would be. I gathered the fact that this young gentleman was about to be employed by my uncle in some capacity—whether as clerk or secretary I hardly knew—and that, it being necessary that he should be always in close communication with my uncle, he was to remain, for a while at least, under our roof.

"Yes! I'll see him room put in order, Clara," said my uncle, curtly; "and now, Sir, shall we adjourn to the office?"

Then they arose, and, looking on the floor, I saw the shadow there make a bow; bowed in return, and was alone. Never, never, never, so long as I lived, should I see one find me in a temper such as That I vowed. Yet it was an hour before I was angry as ever with that provoking Barbara, who insisted that I alone must needed see everything, and that, if it did, she couldn't do it baking day.

"I didn't mean to," I said to myself, as I bathed my eyes with cold water; "but an angel could not live with testy Uncle and salky Barbara without quarreling. It was not my fault, but theirs."

Then I began to darn the worst place in the carpet.

It was a good while before I could look the stranger in the face, but then I saw that he had a cool olive skin, calm dark eyes, a mouth as sweet as it was firm, and the broad forehead of a thinker. Perhaps his face was regularly beautiful—I hardly know; but it had the effect of beauty, and he had youth and health and strength, and was wonderfully graceful. Soon I'd have given half the world to know what he thought of me. He was polite, stationed in a gentleman would naturally be to the only lady inmate of the house; but, perhaps, after all, he remembered the little vixen he had first seen. I tried to be calm and quiet, to seem as uncle when he scolded me with decorous respect—but that thought haunted me. I had never thought so much of a man's opinion in my life.

On Sundays we went to church together. I learned by that that he had an exquisite voice, for I used to hold my breath to listen to his singing. At last I ventured to ask him to sing for me at home. I never shall forget the song he sang, but there are many ways of singing. I have heard it from another, and scarcely listened. That same night I sang for him. He said not one word of praise—only bowed a thank you; but, as he turned my music, I saw his heart beat under the soft gray vest he wore. Mine was beating, too, like a mad thing.

Well, after that I was not so much afraid of him, and it came to long talks in the parlor and long walks by moonlight. He never said one tender word. He never took my hand. He never looked at me more earnestly than one friend might look at another; but I felt, in spite of that, that he cared something for me, and I—I loved him. I used to think sometimes with shame that I had given my heart unsought; that it was unmaidenly to care so very much for one who had not asked me yet to care for him at all; but how could I help it? All my feelings were strong; I could not walk by the decorous rule and line so many women liked; and in the sight of Heaven I could not be wrong in admiring what was admirable, in loving purity and truth and noble manhood! So I kept my secret, but did not strive to alter it. And at last? At dusk one autumn day we walked in the shady Square, under some old trees.

The nurse-maids had gone home with their little charges, and the file of workmen with tin-cans had tramped through it into the street. The fountain tinkled and splashed but its little basin. The leaves got out of their sickly evening perfume. A bit of crescent moon came faintly into the sky; and in all the Square, besides ourselves, only a sleeping beggar stretched upon a bench. No one to watch—no one to listen; and then I heard all I longed to hear. I had never thought that gentleman could love so—that that silence could cover up such a sweet wealth of tenderness.

We were home arm in arm, and then under the blue heavens the moon saw no woman happier than I.

Ah me! If you had told me then what I should do I would have looked you in the face and believed a man would willingly cut the rope that held him from dropping into some awful chasm as that I should part myself from him.

For weeks and months I kept my temper. For half a year I was too happy to be angry. We were to be married in May. Uncle Andrew declared he'd little change save a trip to some country place, for we were still to live with my uncle in the old house. Mr. Rush—I called him Edwin from now—was not demonstrative; but I knew he loved me, and that was enough.

Enough until one day I heard Ruth Baker say to my cousin Grace:

"Heaven send me a different husband from the one Clara is to have! Who would think he was fond of her?"

"It's only his way," said Grace.

"I'd teach him another," said Ruth.

That set me thinking. It was not pleasant to be spoken of in this wise. No good ever comes of listening. I began by trying to love Edwin into making pretty speeches and doing silly things. At last I strove to pique him into more manifestation of his love. I knew perfectly well, that it should not content me! that to be really fell, and flirted, before his very face, with a young coxcomb of his acquaintance. I was, for whom I absolutely felt a detestation.

The little puppy had taken it into his small brain to admire me. He was pleased and flattered. He looked and encouraged with a word. At last, angry that he should take it all so coolly, I let the little middy steal a kiss from my lips where he could see me.

That evening, when the rest were gone, I felt a hand touch my arm.

It was Edwin Rushton's. I looked up.

"I want to speak to you, Clara," he said; and before I had answered he had drawn me on to talk, in one might a willful child, on my impropriety. "It is not right," he said; "and people will make you worse of it. I am sorry to speak to you."

Not a jealous word. My uncle might have spoken much the same. "He can not love me," I thought, and my cheeks burned with shame.

"Who made you my judges and master?" I asked.

"Yourself," said he, "when you accepted me."

"More silly I!" I cried. "Sir, I will not care to hinder others from having what you don't want yourself!"

"What do you mean?" asked he.

"Frank would give his right hand for a kiss from me," said I; "and you hardly know whether I am living or dead. I believe I'll like being in fetters to be tied to such an uckle."

"You are letting your temper carry you away," said he.

"My temper, Sir?"

"Yes," said he; "it is your one great fault. I see that what I first saw you. There, there."

He tried to soothe me, as though I had been delirious. I believe I seemed so to him.

I forgot every thing in my anger.

"I wish you had never seen me," said I.

"You will be sorry to have said that."

"I say it from my heart."

His face grew white.

"There is more in this than I thought," said he.

"Perhaps you love Frank Hearne better than you love me?"

I saw the chance of making him jealous. I saw nothing else in my rage.

"Perhaps I do," I said. "We can't help our choice."

He drew a great breath, and arose, standing before me like a statue.

"I will not let your pledge to me stand between you and your young lover," he said. "God forgive you, and make you happy! Good-by! You are as free as you ever were."

And I was alone. Alone, stretching out my hands toward the closed door, and calling on my darling to return. He did not hear me. He never came.

"Temper! temper! temper!" shouted my uncle when I met him at the breakfast-table next morning. "Ah, you will suffer for your folly this time. He was the noblest fellow God ever made, and you've lost him. I'm sorry for you, Clara," he said, he 'it is not temper. She loves Frank Hearne; she told me so." By Jove, if that puppy enters my door I'll kick him!"

"Is he gone?" I asked, with my head in my hands.

"Gone forever," said my uncle; and I lost all consciousness the next moment, and lay, happily forgetful of my woes, in a deep swoon.

Gone forever! Ah, yes; the days passed and he came not. The lonely evenings counted themselves away. My life was over; my joy past. I wanted to die; but I was young, and still lived. I shut myself up from every one, and knew they said of me that I had been jilted. What did I care now? At first I used to hope he would return. I knew soon that such a hope was folly. No angry mood had made him leave me. He believed me false. Oh, the pain in his face, the anguish in his voice at that last moment! I never should forget it. As sune are sad to accuse themselves for their sins, so I punished myself by recalling that look, that tone daily and hourly.

The spring which seems to have seen us wed was gone. Autumn came, and winter. At Christmas-tide I sat in my own room reading. It was long past twelve. Barbara was in her attic, my uncle in his chamber below, but I could not sleep. The evergreen Barbara had twined about the gas fixtures and placed over the mirror seemed to mock me with its holiday look. What was he doing tonight, my Edwin—my own dear love? I lifted the curtain and looked out. All the street was white with snow, frozen snow, that crisped and sparkled in the starlight. Opposite a dark figure paced slowly—a watchman, I suppose; but my fancy, always possibly by a vague rumor of Edwin's presence in the place, made the outline seem his. Oh, if he should be there! I—I, his own all folly! I dropped the curtain, and sat down before the fire a while. Then I took my white dress from its nook—the dress in which I had been married—and folded it and unfolded it, and caressed it, saying such words to it that you would have thought me mad. Let while I did so I fell into a kind of dream. It hardly seemed as much like sleep as stupor.

I was startled from it by a blaze of light. The dress had fallen from my lap into the grate. It was all ablaze, flaring up toward the bed-clothes. In an instant there was a fire-alarm, and the blaze went whirling up the paper on the wall, and the window curtains, long and light and floating. I rushed to the door. Alas! my genius had impelled me to lock it and withdraw the key. I could not find it. I searched in vain. I screamed. I prayed. Neither aunt nor Heaven seemed to hear me. I stood in a very furnace of flame. Walls and door and ceiling were all blazing.

They rose a great fire in the street now. I heard the policemen's clubs, the tolling of the fire-bell. Why did no one come to save me? Help, help!

The flames were licking up the floor, climbing, twining, swirling through the ceiling. Barbara would be burned to death, my dear uncle would perish, and I—I had done it, I!

The flames had driven me into a little corner. They were darting their fiery tongues at myself. I could not see the door—it was a wall of flame. The window was a seething furnace.

"God receive my soul!" I prayed. And then I heard a crash. Something came dashing through the door into the flames. A voice cried:

"Clara! where are you?"

And I felt Edwin's arms about me once more, and was borne through the red whirlpool out into the open air. I had been saved, but he left me there. After I knew my uncle had caught me to his breast I saw him no more. One moment of hope had I felt. It was gone forever. It had never been.

Ah, that was a woeful night! The dear old house was gone, with all its belongings, and the brain and nerves of my uncle were shaken. He took to his bed in the new lodgings we found, and never arose from it. In two months we buried him, and I was alone in the world.

A great heiress; for it proved that Uncle Andrew had been far richer than I guessed. But oh, no princess and no heiress ever poured wretcher might pity me! I had not heard one word of Edwin Rushton since the night of the fire.

But days came after, as I sat at work in my black dress, Barbara came in weeping.

"What is the matter?" I asked, for she plainly wanted me to question her.

"I've seen poor Mr. Rushton," said she. "It makes my heart bleed. He that was so strong and bold, feeling for him as I do now that! You'd cry too, Miss."

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"Didn't you know?" she said. "Why, Miss, you, of all people! I heard it from his landlady. The night he saved you he went home feeling his way up the stairs. She was frightened, and asked him what had happened. 'I've been through a fire,' said he, 'and I fear my wife was one of those I can see only a red blaze.' It didn't pass off, Miss—he's blind!"

"Oh, no, no!" I sobbed. "Oh no!"

"It's true; more the pity," she said, and was going from the room. I stopped her.

"Where did you leave him?" I asked.

"In the Square," said she. "He goes there every night. A boy leads him, and he sits alone near the fountain. I'm sorry I pity him, poor dear! —waiting until he comes again to fetch him."

Every evening! I had no rest until the next. Then I put on my plainest cloak and went over to the Square. All quiet in the dusk, as it had been on that long-gone night when he asked me to be his. Little groups of the children gone home; the troop of toil-freed laborers passed by. I stood by the fountain and looked at him.

He stood beside it, his soft hat drawn low over those darkened eyes; his hands playing with the loose chain that kept intruders from the fountain's brink. I remembered standing in that very spot. I knew it by the weeping willow drooping over it, and the cleft head of the post hard by—only a little cleft, a wee, slight rent have made it, but I remembered feeling it with my finger as he spoke to me.

I looked at him, my love, my life. He who had exercised so much for me, and was bold enough for any thing.

I went closer. I touched him. He started. "It is only Clara," I said; and he trembled all over for an instant.

Then he said: "I can not see you, but I know your hand. I should have known it if you had not spoken."

And I knew he loved me still.

"Edwin!" I said, "Edwin!" it was the hand of your promised wife once. It is long since you have held it; will you take it now?"

"Give it to me," he said; and our palms touched once more.

Then we stood silent, close together.

"I have been the cause of great ill to you," I said. "Do you hate me for it?"

"You forget," he said; "it was not I who ceased to love."

I clung to him. "Did you believe me?" I sobbed.

"Oh, Edwin, I super cared always for your Hearne. I flirted with him because I thought you indifferent. My evil temper conquered me, and I uttered falsehood. I loved only you. I never shall love any other."

"On your soul?" said he.

"On my soul!"

"I shall be happier for knowing it," he said. "It was hard to think you false. Oh would I were not blind!"

"If you were not," I said, my heart choking me, "I could not speak as I do now. If you love me still, and, oh, I think you do! can you forgive me, and you seem to, take me to your heart again, your promised wife. If not, let me go to hide my shame, for I have been over-bold, and die of my remorse."

He caught me in his arms. I felt his great heart beat.

"It is worth sight—it is worth life!" he said, and kissed me. Then I led him home, through the still streets.

We were married in a quiet little church. Only Barbara was with me, and I wore my black dress. I shed some tears, but I was very happy, so was he. So in the years to come we have lived together.

And still the future held a great joy for me. Years after, when there were young children at our fireside and I was their mother, my husband's sight returned to him. When the surgeon told me he could see, my first thought was great thankfulness. My next? But I have already told you. Will he know the girl he won in the faded woman?" But when I stood before him, tremulous and fearful, little was what he said, though the roses of my cheeks and the gold of my hair were quite gone, I knew:

"My love, how sweet a woman you have grown! There is no angry temper in your face now any more than in your voice." And he kissed me like a bridegroom, and I thanked Heaven.

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS WARNER,
Author of "The Wide, Wide World."

CHAPTER I.

"PAPA, please," said little Primrose, "what smells so sweet?"

Her father sat by the table, untying a large brown package; and from it came a strange, fresh, wild sort of perfume; but sweet, as Primrose said, and very pleasant.

"What smells so sweet?" Mr. May answered, cutting the last stubborn knot with his pen-knife. "Why, my little girl, fancy it is some of my sweet seeds." And selecting a small paper-bag from the heap which now lay spread out before him, Mr. May held it close to the little girl's nose as she stood at his side. Primrose took a long whiff with great delight.

"Oh, papa, how good!"

"Good, is it?" said Mr. May, laughing. "Prim, you ought to be a seedsman!"

"No, papa," said she; "I wish I had a garden."

"So as to plant such sweet things as celery seed?" said her father. "Prim, this is not a flower."

"Well, papa," said the impetuous Lilian, flinging down her book on the widow-seat, and coming to the table with a bound, "there are flowers, you know, and we have plant 'em! Oh, papa, won't you give us a garden?"

"If you please, papa!" said another little voice, now drawn near, "there is room enough, and we should like so much! Only I should prefer to have our gardens separate, because I should wish to keep mine in order."

"There spoke my methodical Clover!" said Mr. May, with another laugh, as his orderly, astute, shabby little daughter came and stood beside her behind Primrose, who had not spoken again, but whose dark eyes watched her father with intense interest.

"One would like a garden to keep in order, and the other to run wild in; and the third—What does my little Prim want of a garden?" he said, handing down to kiss her.

"I should like it so much, papa?"

"Prim would nestle there just like a little bird," said her tall brother Sam.

"Papa," cried Lilian, "will you give us three gardens? I am sure there is room enough."

"Yes, Lily should be allowed to grow weeds entirely on her own account," said Jack.

"What do you think you'll know it," said Lily, with great good-humor. "Will you, papa?"

"I find one garden pretty expensive now," said Mr. May; "what should I do with three more?"

"Oh, they wouldn't cost any thing—our gardens," said Lily.

"A very excellent sort of gardens yours will be then," said her father. "Where do you propose to get your seeds and plants?"

"Why, just a little," answered Lily.

"Perhaps we could get wild flowers, papa," said Clover, thoughtfully. "And I've got one package of seeds already, that Maria Jarvis gave me. He mignonnette."

"And then just the ground is so pretty, papa!" urged little Primrose.

"Think so?" said Mr. May. "I must confess I like to see the ground well covered. But who'll dig it up, to begin with?"

"Why, Robin," said Lily.

"Robin has a great deal to do."

"I guess Sam would," said Primrose. "He's never to busy, you know, papa, to do any thing."

It was very ridiculous, of course, but—tall fellow as he was—Sam's eyes actually flushed with pleasure at this compliment from his little sister.

"And will Sam take care of the gardens all summer after they are dug up and planted?" said Mr. May, lifting Primrose upon his knee.

"Oh no, papa! that's what we want to do."

"Well," said her father, "upon three conditions I will give you each a garden: First of all, mamma must approve. Next, each one is to choose her own seeds and plants, to suit her own taste. And, lastly, each must keep her own garden in order, after the first heavy digging is done. She must sow the seeds, and plant the plants, and dispute possession with the weeds—all herself. Now, what does mamma say?"

"I say yes with all my heart!" answered Mrs. May. "But I too shall make conditions—or, at least, one: In each garden, no matter how full it may be, there must be no corner set apart for patience, perseverance, brotherly-kindness, and such sweet herbs; and each shall be well hedged in with the Golden Rule."

"Well, children, now you know the conditions, what do you say?" said their father.

"I like the conditions very much, papa," said Clover.

"They are easy enough," said Lily.

"Mamma," said Primrose, quitting her father and going to lean her elbows on her mother's lap, "what is the hedge for."

"To fence out little mischief-makers as pride and selfishness and envy; for if they get in they will root up every sweet flower there. And no other hedge is low enough and close enough to keep them out."

"But, mamma," said Primrose, her little mouth dimpling into a smile of full intelligence, "who'll want the herbs?"

"We shall see," said her mother, answering the smile. "I should not wonder if I came down to the gardens myself for a sprig now and then."

"Well, papa," said Lillie, "we agree. But where are the seeds and plants which we must choose to come from?"

"I suppose from my pocket," said Mr. May. "Most things seem to come from there nowadays. See! here are three greenbacks—a dollar apiece for each of you. How far will that go? Far enough, I think, for little novices."

"Oh, papa!" said Clover, "a dollar apiece is a great deal. Are there seeds so expensive?"

"All depends upon the sort," said Mr. May, with a shrug of his shoulders. "They cost from five cents a paper to fifty cents a seed, according to circumstance."

"Fifty cents a seed!" said Lily. "I guess I sha'n't buy that sort. Spend all my money for two seeds, truly!"

"Papa, did you mean me to spend a whole dollar too?" said Primrose, eying the greenback in her hand as a toy quite beyond belief.

"You are to spend the whole of it. And you will find it as far as it will go possible."

"A dollar will buy twenty packets of the five cent kind—only think!" said Lily. "Papa, will Robin find me seeds?"

"No, no; you are to have nothing to do with Robin. I will furnish the tools. Now, what next?"

"How are we to choose our seeds, papa?" said Clover.

"Oh, to be sure! Here is Mr. Vick's Catalogue," said her father, taking it out from his pocket-case, "full of names and descriptions and prices. You can study this at your leisure, and when you have made your choice I will send an order for the seeds."

Prim's eyes glistened as her father fluttered over the leaves of the Catalogue. What pictures of flowers were there!

"How splendid!" said Lily, talking it from his hand, and pausing over a bunch of petunias.

"Papa," said Clover, "I feel too rich!"

"Rich?" said Mr. May, laughing—"you will feel as poor as possible when you have studied that Catalogue, my child, an hour. I foresee an endless call for donations. In fact, you will be such poverty-stricken damsels, with your one dollar apiece, that I think we'll have better take up a collection at once before matters go any further. Mamma, what will you give?"

"Some strong calico frocks, and thick shoes and gloves," replied Mrs. May, promptly.

"A most needful contribution! But tending rather to the comfort of the gardeners than the beauty of the garden."

"Oh, I will give the gardens each a rose-bush," said Mrs. May.

"Ah, that is good! Sam, what say you?"

"A cutting of geranium, Sir, for each; with leave for tying up the flowers, and strong sticks and labels. Also, the help of a knife and hammer and nails when wanted."

"All very excellent and necessary," said his father.

"I will furnish advice," said Jack, "in any quantity, and upon the most liberal terms. Also, as Sam says, a well-grown plant of Canada thistle for each garden—just to promote the growth of mamma's sweet herbs."

"If I wouldn't promote the growth of mamma's hedge," said Lily. "If you'll furnish advice, Jack, we'll take it, and thank you too."

"For me," said Mr. May, "I will provide the tools. And Jack, under the circumstances, that is all I will engage to do."

"Do you mean that you will give us tools, papa?" said Lily, with falling eyes.

"A little spade and watering-pot, papa?" said Primrose.

"You will see," said her father. "If I tell you all beforehand the package will not be so interesting wh n it comes."

"Can we wait?" said Lily, gleefully. "We've enough to think of for one day. Come, Clover, let's go make our list."

"But I think I can not make mine to-night, Lily," said Clover, as she came to the window. "I don't know yet where my garden is to be."

"That makes no difference," said Lily. "Just look at these pinks! Did you ever see any thing so grand?"

"Why, it makes a great deal of difference," said Clover, eying the pinks with loving looks. "I can't tell what I shall want. I may have to plant out something, you know; and that would require tall things. Or there may be rocks. Oh, Lily, I'm happy! Let's begin to-night."

"These gardens will be a study," said Mr. May to his wife. "Clover, what do you know about 'planting out yet?'"

Clover turned back, blushing a little.

"Not much, papa. But I heard you and Mr. Jarvis talking one day, and I learned something in a book."

"That's right," said her father; "listen, and then apply your knowledge. But go and make your list, my child; and then it can be modified here and there if need be. You will find it a longer business than you think. And I'll see where the gardens shall be to-morrow."

So the three children curled themselves up on the sofa, by the window-seat, and the work began. Mr. May and the boys went off, and their mother sat silent by the table, her gentle face bent over her work.

CHAPTER II.

The children of whom I told you in my first chapter had been (so far) brought up in the city. Brick walls, and noisy streets, and town sights and sounds, were all they knew best; and it was no wonder that Primrose pronounced the celery seed "sweet," if only by way of comparison, and quite forgivable that Lily thought "Job" a pretty word and the dusty pavement on the other; a wisteria, rambling drearily over a brown stone front in the vain search after something pleasant—all these they had seen again and again. But these are exiles, singing but half their sweet song in a strange land; and every child knows the difference between their captive beauty and the free, sonny grace of a truant dandelion, that every one of these things are so new to them that it displays the oldest fashions in Fifth Avenue. Highly respectable little dandelion!—nobody ever liked you in all your life.

A year from this time of which I write Mr. May had bought a country place, and with the beginning of winter his family had all removed thither, to make it their home. It was not at all a remarkable place, unless for being at once large, old-fashioned, and comfortable; and the fence for fourty years from that time. The house stood back from the road, with a short, smooth slope of grass between and a straight gravel fence for fronting any line. This fence turned up the slope quite near the house on one side; but on the other, where was the door of entrance, it ran down in a long curve in a wider sweep than in front, and the fence stood off at a respectful distance. Behind the house was a large garden and a well-stocked fruit-orchard. Robin was busy with his pruning-knife and hot beds, and preparations of all kinds. For it was now just at the end of winter, and there were days when the very breath of spring was abroad; and the light on the bare trees looked soft and kindly, and adventurous blades of grass peeped out in sheltered places.

The front-door of the house being, after all, a side door, the front room was unbroken except by a large bow-window belonging to the family sitting-room; and as the first floor of the house was but a single story above the ground, this bow-window was something like a glazed porch, having its own low step without, and within a broad window-seat all round. And here, every winter, under tight with double sashes, it became the favorite resort of the children. Here they and their mother lived during the very afternoon of which I speak, hardly knowing whether they were most delighted or at their wit's end; for of all distracting things connected in a well-known way, illustrated Catalogue of flowers! Such a bewildering confusion of red and blue and purple and white and yellow and striped and spotted! Seasons dazzling your very eyes; such "blazes of brilliance" that you seem to see; such "every sort" perfumes that you can almost taste. The colored leaves, the stately growers, the trailing creepers, the vines that mount up like Jack's bean-stalk, enchanted ladders to your head. People go into raptures over lace and jewels and old china. Well, well, those have their place; but it is not the place of riches, after all. And they are not heart's-ease—they can never be balm.

"Now, first," said Lily—"oh me, whatever shall we do with these hard names!"

"They are not so hard when you have looked at them a little," said Clover. "I wish Jarvis knows more—many. So—about that first one's easy enough —alsonia.'"

"How shall we begin?" said Lily, "shall you take the first part of the Catalogue, and I the second, and Primrose the third? or shall we divide by flowers? Alonzo for me, and Amaranthus my aged—spectrum for Prim? Such names!"

"But that wouldn't be choosing," said Clover.

"No, it wouldn't," said Lily; "and we've got to choose. Well, shall we agree that we won't ever take the same?"

"But that would not be choosing, either," said Clover.

"Then we'll just have to begin and see more about it," said Lily. "I don't want any of all three first four—do you?"

"I want alsonia," said Primrose. "It's sweet."

"Write it down then," said Lily; "but if you take all the sweet flowers, I guess you'll have enough. And that's no little—only six inches high. But I'll tell you what I will have, and that's snap-dragon—never mind the other name. Look, Clover, here's a picture of it; and you see they say it's 'exceedingly brilliant.' Oh, I should think so, indeed!—'scarlet and yellow with white throat,' and 'crimson with white throat;' and 'magnificently striped,' and all sorts. Which would you take? there's a blood-red one."

"I should like blue-see, down at the bottom," said Clover; "best and brightest varieties mixed."

"Why how splendid!" said Lily; "and only ten cents for four sorts!"

While Lily was writing down snap-dragon, Clover peeped over the leaf and quietly headed her own list with sweet-sultan.

"What's that?" said Lily. "Oh, I don't believe you'll like that. It's just some common little white thing."

"But see these!" said Clover; "amaranthus, with red and yellow and green foliage. I must have that. And here's a useful for back-grounds."

"What are back-grounds?" said Lily. "I love lies blooding—what a funny name! Prim, don't you want any thing on this page?"

"I'll see what there is first," said Primrose, latching her little brows on all the other pages, I mean. "Because I got—colored. I think I want every thing; and you know I can't have that."

"Oh, but a dollar will go a great deal," said Lily! "Just look at those asters! I must have them."

"So must I, some of them," said Clover. "And there are ever so many kinds. Which one will you take?"

"This first one—perfection," said Lily. "There can't be any thing much better than that."

"I'll take the 'chrysanthemum—dowered,'" said Clover. "I like the name, somehow."

"Well, I guess I'll have this little one—'pyramidal bouquet,'" said Primrose. "Because I like bouquets."

Prim's garden will be all six inches high," said Lily, laughing.

"They say balsams are beautiful," said Clover, writing the name down on her list. "And they must have good culture; you see they must be 'transplanted and thinned, and pinched out.' That's just what I shall like. I think I can take pains enough."

"Then you'd better take some cockscombs," said Lily—"recommended to all who will give their plants good care. Why, I mean to do that, too, of course; but I don't like the name, they say."

"Oh! oh!" cried Primrose—"just look at these dianthus flowers over the leaf!"

"Dianthus!" said Lily—"what's dianthus? Why, they are perfectly splendid!"

"They are pinks," said Clover; "I'm sure so down here. I never saw any thing so beautiful in all my life!"

"No, I believe you never did," said Lily; "and there they are over the leaf. Let's go all through and look at the pictures the first thing. There's something—I don't know what—and annuals—and petunias. Mamma's Catalogue is perfectly fascinating!"

Mamma laughed a little at that. "How do the dollars hold out, Lily?" she asked.

"Oh! I don't know," said Lily—"well, I guess. You see, mamma, we are looking through just to put down a few of the most striking ones first, and then we can add to the lists afterward."

"How many of the striking ones' does each list contain at present?" said Mrs. May, looking very much amused.

"We haven't counted yet, mamma. Now, there's something I should like—a 'double green-centred sunflower,' from five to eight feet high."

"That sounds imposing, indeed," said Mrs. May.

"Don't you like sunflowers, mamma?—the name's pretty. What do they look like?"

"Something between, going to her side, "what flower do you love best?"

"I am quite fond of primroses !" said Mrs. May, taking the little face between her hands and giving it a kiss.

"And you'd like some more?" said Primrose, laughing.

"Very much!"

"Well, there's plenty of 'em in Mr. Vick's Catalogue," said Primrose, gleefully, going back to her seat. "And I'll write 'em right down."

"But, Lily," said Clover, presently, looking up from her list, "I guess the reason—how far will a dollar go? It will never buy all these in the world!" said Clover, showing a slip of paper well covered with figures.

"Oh! I guess it will," said Lily; "a dollar's a great deal. Let's count up and see. But I haven't gotten down—I mean over mind; we can turn over the leaves again. There's snap-dragon one—I mean ten; and aster fifteen; how comes that, I wonder?—fifteen cents a paper—; and pinks, ten more, makes thirty-five; and my sunflower is forty-five; and pansy, sixty-five; and my double petunias—how much? Now for all never do!—double portulaca, fifty! Why, I must have five dollars' worth on my list, at this rate."

"I've got three dollars' worth on mine," said Clover, laying it down with a blank face. The children looked at each other, then broke into a laugh.

"Prim was wise," said Lily; "she waited. Well, we've just got to begin over again, that's all."

"Yes," said Clover, "we begun all wrong. I ought to have had more sense. The way is to put down only what we can afford, and then add more if we have it to spare. Here, Prim"; and then over came the price after each one. Let's take new slips of paper, and make a nice list this time."

"Well," said Lily, and she wrote at the top of her paper—"Flower seeds that I must have."

"Now don't let us talk," said Clover, "but just go over the Catalogue quietly and think." And again the enticing pages were turned over, leaf by leaf.

"Well, this passes all my philosophy," said Lily, when she had again added up her list. "It seems that I must have at least two dollars' worth!"

"That's just what I've got, too," said Clover "Papa might well say it would be a long piece of work."

"Mamma," said Primrose, once more quitting the bow-window for her mother's side, "im't it funny?"

"And are you in difficulties, too?" said her mother.

"I've not made my list yet, mamma, I got so confused between what Pat they want and what I want. I think I'll wait till they have all done with the Catalogue, and then I can take it."

"That will be likely to be very soon," said Lily. "What can I strike out! Mamma, did you ever see this bartonia—very showy, with yellow flowers and gray branches?"

"Yes, I have seen it."

"Is it pretty?"

"It is very showy."

"Which is the prettiest, that or pansies?"

"Oh, pansies, if I am to be judge! They are showy and lovely too."

"How nice!" said Lily; "that's just what I'd like to be. I'll mark pansies with my red pencil, as a settled thing. But they're terribly expensive."

"It often costs a good deal to be showy and lovely," said Mrs. May, with a smile.

"I must have my hyacinth bean," said Clover, "but that don't cost a great deal; and I must have some stocks, though they do. Mamma, are zinnias handsome?"

"Very handsome."

"I may want those, they look useful," said Clover, with her face full of plans and back-grounds.

"And I must have petunias," said Lily. "Mamma, my book is a perfect whirl."

"Then if I were you," said her mother, "I would put my body in a whirl, and then Lily will be a good run out of doors. You will not know her from blue if you sit puzzling there any longer."

"I guess that's true," said Lily, with a laugh. "I'm as tired as can be."

And the children went for their hoods and cloaks and then off into the snow; little Primrose giving a lingering look at the Catalogue where it lay on the window-seat. Her list was but just begun.

"SPRING-TIME."

THE BLACKSMITH'S WIFE.

BY AUGUSTUS COMSTOCK.

She has a figure trim and neat,
And full of health and life,
With nimble hands and nimble feet,
The blacksmith's little wife.

Her hair is dark, her eyes are blue,
And though her cheek is browned,
An anchorite would smile to view
A face so smooth and round.

All day she labors like the bee,
The blacksmith's little wife,
While round her play her children three,
Bright-haired and full of life.

And all day long, her cheery song
Comes through the cottage door,
While tap, tap, tap, her gaiters rap
The neatly sanded floor.

Her swarthy husband, from the town,
Comes home when day is dim;
For kisses he must stoop 'way down,
Or she climb up to him.

He's just the man that women crave
To shield them from "the wrong,"
For he's as kind as he is brave,
As brave as he is strong.

"You're tired out with work," she sighs;
"You lead a weary life."
"No, no," quoth he, "'tis Paradise,
With such a little wife."

The gleeful fire with ardent rays
Peeps slyly from the hearth,
The tea-pot blushes in the blaze,
The kettle shakes with mirth.

The sleek "grimalkin" purs and mews,
The dog whines at the door,
The pattering of little shoes
Is heard along the floor.

About the smith his children play
When evening's meal is through,
They love to see his pipe of clay
Send forth its clouds of blue.

They clamber on his shoulders broad,
They clamber on his knee,
While wife looks on with smile and nod:
And all are full of glee.

I'd sooner be this blacksmith bold,
With such a little wife,
Than have the wealth of yellow gold
That gilds an aimless life.

THE ISLAND GIRL.

A TRUE INCIDENT.

After leaving the port of Valparaiso we cruised for several months in different parts of the Pacific, capturing three large sperm whales and a "California gray." The latter was a curious-looking fish, about twenty feet in length, with a long, funnel-shaped head, crooked flukes, and a thin, tapering body, spotted like that of a leopard. We lost a whole tub of line, and one of our best boats was stoven, before we succeeded in killing "Monsieur Gray;" but he rewarded us for our trouble in the end—yielding us forty barrels of good clear oil. By this time the few casks of fresh water procured at Valparaiso were nearly empty; so, as soon as we had stowed our oil we shaped our course for the Navigator Islands to obtain a fresh supply. Our vessel was the bark St. Mary, of New Bedford, commanded by Captain Buncle—a tall, raw-boned native of Sag Harbor, who could fling a lance to the distance of twenty fathoms without missing his aim. He was a thorough whalesman and sailor, equally good and collected whether battling with the mighty leviathan of the deep or the shrieking typhoon; a large-hearted, genial man, too, well calculated to win the love and esteem of his officers and crew.

All hands were delighted with the prospect of a run ashore. The vast watery wilderness of ocean, unrelieved by rock or even a floating blade of grass, must eventually fatigue the eyes of poor Jack, how deep soever may be his appreciation of Old Neptune; and though his fancy may occasionally weave pictures of rocks, valleys, and even trees among the clouds in the horizon, yet there are not substantial enough to satisfy his longings for a sight of terra firma.

As our little bark stood bravely upon our shore-ward course we spent our leisure hours in washing and "patching up" our well-worn garments, so as to look respectable when we should reach our island port—for a sailor likes to appear well, even in the eyes of a savage. A couple of clothes-lines forward, extending across and above the deck from the bow to the weather shrouds, now presented a spectacle which was both amusing and picturesque. On these lines were great patches upon the sails, shows, trousers of various sizes and colors, Guernsey frocks, woolen stockings, and clean but molecularly-looking shirts were these—all tossing about in the wind, with arms and legs kicking and striking at each other, as if they were quarrelling because one garment stood a chance of getting dry before the other.

One morning, however, the cry of "Land O!" rattled suddenly from our three mast-heads, and put an end to our "washing and drying." We doused such of our garments as were fit to be worn, and hung up those that were not in the fore-hold. Then leaning over the bulwarks, we gratefully inhaled the sweet fragrance of flowers and spices wafted from the shores of beautiful Savaii, the island we were approaching. As our little bark bounded onward through the curling waves our watchful gaze was presently rewarded with tall, sloping hills, covered with cloud-like masses of green verdure, slender cocoa-nut trees lining a white, curving beach, and the huts of the natives, with the smoke ascending from them, seen through openings in the shrubbery in the fruit-trees and clambering vines.

We let go our anchor a quarter of a mile from the beach and shook hands with a number of natives who had come off in their canoes loaded with yams, cocoa-nuts, bananas, and bread-fruit, which they were anxious to exchange for tobacco, articles of clothing, etc. Also some of them were furled to wear as blazers to trade with the islanders. From one of these—a gigantic fellow whose only garment was a piece of tappa (cloth manufactured from the bark of the mulberry tree) fastened around his waist, and which reached to his knees—I purchased a hundred ripe yellow bananas for a shirt, which I had carefully washed in a whale's tooth. There was something touching in the simple, child-like pleasure evinced by the stalwart savage at such a mere trifle. His eyes sparkled, his whole countenance glowed with delight as he turned the little piece of ivory round and round between his thumb and forefinger. He examined it on all sides, then chuckled and commenced to dance about the deck, clapping his hands. Finally he eyed a tree standing to and fro along the lee gangway, blowing the whistle with all his might, and returned in a serious gaze of his delight-beaming countenance of proud exultation. From this man my attention was at length drawn to a pretty, interesting little girl of seven or eight years, who was seated upon the knight-heads crying and sobbing as if her heart would break. She wore a long skin robe of faded tappa, confined just beneath the arm-pits, and around her forehead a pretty wreath of flowers, from beneath which her long black hair streamed in wild masses. On her lap were some dozen mountain or mauee apples, strung together by means of a piece of twine formed of cocoa-nut husk.

"What ails you, my child?" I inquired, advancing and touching her on the shoulder; "why do you cry?"

She wiped her eyes as if comforted by my sympathy, and in broken English informed me that she had just succeeded in selling one of her strings. The crew, attracted by more palatable fruits, had paid no attention to her unripe merchandise. She feared she would have to go back to her home, where she had sent her to the ship in one of the canoes, without any food or clothing; and this old mother, who, according to the child's description, was a perfect fury—would then beat her with sticks, and afterward shut her up in a dark hole in the mountains.

I immediately purchased the apples, giving her in exchange half a dozen hands of tobacco and a small silk scarf. Her father I fastened about her waist, stern, told her that it made her look very pretty, and expressed the hope that her mother would not take it away from her. She clapped her hands and laughed with childish glee; then threw her arms about my neck, calling me her dear "feiong" (friend), and declaring in her half-wild, half-timid manner, that she would never go back to her wicked mother, but would stay with me and let me be her father.

Before I could reply an angry screech, something like that of an owl, pierced my ear, and turning, I beheld an old, fierce-looking hag, whose gaunt figure was enveloped in a ragged piece of cotton cloth. She held in one hand a knotted, formidable-looking stick, and in the other a long wooden wasp from a shriveled apple.

"Hi! hi! I'll run from mother, eh?" she screamed, seizing my little companion by the shoulder. "Glad me come aboard—give much beat; beat so no walk for long time!"

And lifting the stick she would have carried out her threat, had I not prevented her. The tobacco which her little daughter now slipped into her hand elicited a screech of satisfaction, and grinning with delight, she thrust the stick into an old belt around her waist, and proceeded to fill her pipe. She then lighted it and began to smoke with the utmost composure, offering all the natives to leave the ship. My little girl was obliged to go with her mother. After they with their canoes had been entered the canoe, and as it glided away from the vessel she looked back now and then, waving "farewell" to me with the pretty scarf. I stood watching her until the canoe with its occupants disappeared around a headland; and even then her large, melancholy eyes haunted my mind.

When our watch was sent ashore the next day with a raft of casks, I filled my pockets of my shirt with presents for the natives, and sprang among the group of natives about the banks of the lake from which we were to procure our water.

Children of both sexes were there, running hither and thither, or rolling over the green turf like tumble-bugs. Many were provided with long wooden spears, which they darted at the little fish gliding beneath the ripples near the beach. The girls were very pretty, but I was not impressed by either of them as I had been by the child with the mountain apples.

After we had obtained our water and stowed it I visited the island with several companions, but was still unable to find my little friend; and I felt a presentiment that I should never see her again.

One foggy morning about a week after my last ramble over the island we got up our anchors and stood out to sea. I had just taken my station at the helm when the cry of "Look out!" rang with that wheel!" was shrieked by the mate, who stood upon the knight-heads, forward.

I had the wheel quickly, but even as I did so I heard a snapping, crackling sound, followed by a plaintive wail that pierced my ears like a knife. The moment the sound reached me I was hauled aback and a boat was lowered—for the bark, I soon learned, had run over a canoe, capsized it, and that the unfortunate occupants had been flung through my mind, and with breathless anxiety I awaited the return of the boat. It was not long coming. The men in the boat found the occupants of the canoe, but had picked up fragments of the frail vessel, to one of which, caught by a projecting nail, hung the silk scarf which I had given to the island girl.

The poor child, leaving her wicked mother, had put off in the canoe before I could overtake her, and might intercept it and be taken aboard to join "her friend;" but the thick fog had prevented her from seeing the bark in time to escape her melancholy fate.

SECOND LETTER.

"NICE, old fellow, tell me what's the row? There's been thinking enough about it to fill sixty of things; tell me—and" I got up and put my hand on his shoulder. "Poor old boy! what is it?"

Oh! leave me alone, Harry—there's the matter; only I'm a fool. Well, if you must know, read that! I shall be all right soon; only I got that into—confound it—the left eye. I'm not much know I'm an ass!"

I took the letter he held out, and he twisted up his head and tried to whistle "I'm afloat;" but it was a failure, and he added, in a lower tone:

"One can't pull up a ten years' litany of that sort, Jack, without shaking the helm a bit. Thank you for making me let the cat out; I'm all the better for it. Good-night!"

"Here, my dear—more sorry than I could say—for him. He was the oldest friend I had got. We used to sleep in the same bunk at Winchester, and had rowed in the same boats at Oxford, and I could not bear to see him so cut up. I could have done almost any thing for him, but there was only one thing which you must be sure of, that, unless a letter from my daughter Minnie, who is much distressed at being obliged to give you pain,

"Believe me, yours sincerely,

"T. DARLEY."

I could not bring myself to read Minnie's letter, so I folded Mr. Darley's up again, and gave them back.

"Poor old Nick! I'm very sorry for you. I have a notion you really cared for her, didn't you, night, old boy?" and I squeezed his hand, feeling half a hypocrite all the time, and lay down to think till I should sleep.

I think that any one who is rash enough to attempt to describe even an ordinarily pretty girl is sure to make a failure. I am not going to say more of Minnie Darley is, that she was slight and very pretty indeed. Possibly some critics might object that her lips were perhaps too full, and that, after that her delicately-chiseled features were, at times, almost so colorless as to be almost more suggestive of marble than soft flesh and blood; but as a moment a blush or a smile could warm the beautiful statue into a charming English girl; and any one must have been much more than ordinarily fastidious not who could watch her, flushed and animated, in the momentary pause in a valse or galop, without acknowledging that—artistically speaking at least—she was lovely.

I really was very sorry for my friend Nick, for I knew how I should have felt had a letter, I had only known her six months; he, poor fellow! had loved her for ten years. It had been, according to his own account, his one idea since he was a boy at school, and he was inconsolable now, and seemed quite unable to rouse himself to any thing. I had the greatest difficulty in stirring him up enough to start for Switzerland; and if it had not been for my promise to my uncle that I would be promised to escort as far as Geneva, I am not at all sure that either of us would have left England at all. When we did start he was not a lively companion, and for the first whole day traveled with his hat resting on his nose, without speaking a word.

Fortunately our passage over the Channel was a very rough one, and Nick, who was never an overgood sailor, was compelled, against his will, for a time to turn his thoughts away to other more immediate troubles.

There is nothing, as every one knows, like time and change of scene to take the edge off any sorrow; and nothing, perhaps, helps their effects more than another sorrow intervening. His shocking seasickness was one, and a awful black chasm yawning between him and his rejection; and when we landed at Boulogne his spirits had risen in a way that surprised us all. We lovely weather, luxurious fruit, and amusing company. My mother and sister, who both liked him, and had heard his story, all that kindness could suggest to cheer him up, and by the time we reached Geneva, after a leisurely journey, he was quite himself again, merry and sarcastic, the life of the party; and his confidences to me had been dropped for at least a week.

We had arranged—at his suggestion, I believe—to go with the ladies of our party as far as Chavronix, a solitary village, standing in its own pine wood and inn-yard, on an isolated marble rock, a little way up the mountains between Bex and Aigle to the east of the Lake of Geneva. Here we found we were to stay for a few days, and then Nick joined us, and by the time we reached Geneva, after a leisurely journey, he was quite himself again, merry and sarcastic, the life of the party; and his confidences to me had been dropped for at least a week.

On a table of soft moss close by some rough wooden seats we found some wine and fruit awaiting us, and sat there chatting and telling our adventures till it was time to go in. "There are some letters for some of you, Fanny dear, on the drawing-room chimney-piece," said Mrs. Grey, when we had all met for tea; "I forgot them when we came in." Fanny was on the instant, and danced back into the room with a disappointed

"Not one for me; what a shame! Mrs. Holmes," two for you, mamma, and—Mr. Darley, such two for you, mamma, and—Mr. Darley, such a fat one for you, sir. Mr. Barnard; I'm sure it must have got another one in it." Nick took it, blushed crimson, and put it in his pocket. It was from Mr. Darley.

Supper, as every thing else must, came to an end at last; but the evening grew chilly, and we sat on the terrace, and, after that, something else, which kept us with the rest of the party, and it was not till we were alone in the little bedroom we were to share for the night that Nick could venture to open his letter.

I don't know which was most eager. I looked over with him and read:

"DARVEIN LODGE, August 10, 1865.

"MY DEAR NICHOLAS.—If you believed how painful it was to me to be obliged to send you the inclosure to my last letter, you will not, I am sure, doubt that I give me the greatest pleasure to forward that which accompanies this. Sound thoughts, they were we feel. I hope you will not quarrel with the truth of the saying in your own words, 'I think you had better come here and see for your return. There will be several business matters to arrange. I may probably, by then, be able to say what allowance I shall be able to let you have. You must be reminded that your profession is the law.

"I hope Mrs. Darley may be able to persuade your mother to meet you here. I remain, my dear Nicholas,

"Yours very truly,

"T. DARLEY."

Nick stared at me. "Well, old boy, I congratulate you," I said, with a sickly sensation in the throat that was more bigger than before; "I wish to goodness I could not; but I must—so I do."

Slowly and deliberately he read through the letter, getting redder and redder every moment, till all of a sudden he threw it down into the middle of the room and began to walk in a towering rage. "Second thoughts, indeed! and mayn't I have second thoughts too, I should like to know? A likely thing that I'm going to be kicked and then whistled for again, like a dog."

"Second thoughts, con—" He stopped short and was quiet for a moment, and then said in a lower tone. "Jack, I've been an ass! The fact of the matter is, I don't care a snap for Minnie Darley; and I love you and your sister Fanny a thousand times more than I can say. No, stop; don't say any thing yet, and don't go staring as if you had never read Roman and Greek, but listen to me. I'm a person as Rosaline; but just listen quietly to me. I shall go right home to my chambers, and stick to the law and read like fury. I've doubled three times before, and I'll try how I can work. I'll stick to it, and I will. I was thinking the whole matter over last night. I guessed you were right in every way, so I said up and went to bed. Darley to tell him I was very sorry for his daughter and all that; but that I'm blowed if I will have her. I don't care a hang for that, of course, but I was firm and civil, and I'll send the letter first thing to-morrow morning. I wonder what the post goes? Have you got any stamps, by-the-by?"

I never was so taken aback in my life, and had literally a difficulty in catching my breath. There was a vague feeling of relief with it all. Minnie MIGHT get over it, and who could tell what might not happen then? but the complications before us were appalling.

"Let me see HER letter." It was at my feet. I picked it up, tore it open, and looked for her signature, and read:

"Dear Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"SMITH and SMITH."

I suppose I opened my eyes wider, if possible, than they were before, for, in a second, Nick had snatched the letter out of my hands. It was a lawyer's letter, announcing the sudden death of old General Barnard, soon after he had executed a will which revoked a former one, necessitating his money to build and endow two monasteries and a convent, and left all his property to Nick on his attaining the age of twenty-five.

Mr. Darley was named executor and trustee, with full powers to do as he thought best with the estate until Nick should come into possession. A dozen times, at least, we must have read it through. Nick at last broke the silence. "I say, second thoughts, if a'n't out of sight before to old Darley."

I seized hold of his hand and shook it so that his arm was stiff for three days after, and was only saved by that he was disfigured by having it prematurely lengthened.

I have not much more to tell, and what there is is best told in few words.

Nick left us the next day but one, but before he went he spoke to Fanny (by accident, he says) alone on the gazebo.

What happened there I am sure I don't know! All I know is that I was sitting on a camp-stool in the whole, it was as well, for Nick in the mean time turned tweety-five, and was able to accept an invitation to stand as Conservative candidate for Helston. When the appointed day—Fanny's birthday —came, I was in full uniform, and had rung myself in as sector of Barnard.

I am not a good hand at describing a wedding, and am grossly ignorant of the difference between a train and a petticoat; but Emma and Edith Grey were two of our bridesmaids, and as Nick and Fanny were going to the East, and did not want Chavronix for the honey-moon, Mrs. Grey lent it me.

TUCKER'S PATENT SPRING BEDS.

There are some truths besides those enumerated in the Declaration of Independence that are self-evident, and though they may pertain to the less vital interests of the human race, they are by no means unimportant. Among them are these: A bed, to fulfill the purposes for which it is designed, must be COMFORTABLE; it must be as conducive as to insure CLEANLINESS; it should, for easy transportation, be made PORTABLE; and, lastly, the combination fecteit demands that it should be both DURABLE and ECONOMICAL. All of these essential requirements centre in the spring bed invented by Hiram Tucker, and it is confidently affirmed that nothing has ever been devised for man's comfort which is at all comparable to it. A single night's repose on one of them will cure the most inveterate doubter of his scepticism. For sale wholesale by the

Brandreth's Pills,

WHOSE TIMELY USE, UNDER PROVIDENCE, HAS OFTEN SAVED LIFE.

These celebrated Vegetable Pills are now, untried remedy; they have been used and known in the United States for thirty years, and are relied upon by hundreds of thousands of families as almost their sole medicine when sick. No cure or equivalent is spared in their preparation, and it is certainly true when I assert that no king can have a medicine safer or surer than Brandreth's Pills.

They produce a good effect upon diseases almost immediately they are taken. By some wonderful power, perhaps electric or nervous influence, the progress of diseased action is arrested; where watchfulness and pain have been present, the system becomes quieter, and the patient soon obtains refreshing sleep.

The genuine BRANDRETH PILL BOX has upon it a UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT STAMP with B. BRANDRETH in White Letters in the same.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1855 that this Compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a dangerous cough. I had for some months previous thought that a preparation, having for its basis the balsam of white pine, might be so compounded as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of the discase alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the medicine that I contemplated using, and it will be remembered does. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering for some weeks with a bad cough, occasioned by a sudden cold, and had raised mucous streaked with blood. She soon found relief, and sent for more. She also took the medicine, and found it to be a valuable remedy. In 1856, I first advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivalled.—Boston Journal.

This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the test of eleven years in the New England States, where its merits have become so well known. It cures sore throat, coughs, diarrhœa, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally. It is a remedy for diabetes, bleeding from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel; and for pain and scurvy it will be found valuable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicines generally.

Steinway & Sons'
GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT
PIANO-FORTES

Have taken 39 First Premiums, gold and silver medals, at the Principal Fairs held in this country within the last nine years, and in addition thereto they were awarded a First Prize Medal at the Great International Exhibition in London, 1862, in competition with 262 Pianos from all parts of the World.

That the great superiority of these Instruments is now universally conceded is abundantly proved by the fact that Messrs. Steinway's "scales, improvements, and peculiarities of construction" have been copied by the great majority of the manufacturers of both hemispheres (as CLAIMED AS USUAL IN MOST WITHOUT INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT RIGHTS), and that their instruments are used by the most eminent pianists of Europe and America, who prefer them for their own public and private use whenever accessible.

STEINWAY & SONS direct special attention to their
Patent Agraffe Arrangement,
which, having been presented in all their Grand and highest-priced Square Pianos, and admitted to be one of the greatest improvements of modern times, will hereafter be introduced in EVERY PIANO MANUFACTURED BY THEM, without increase of cost to the purchaser, in order that all their patrons may reap its benefit.

STEINWAY & SONS' PIANOS are the only American instruments exported to Europe in large numbers, and used in European concert-rooms.

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

BY MISS WARNER,
Author of "The Wide, Wide World."

CHAPTER III.

"WELL, young ones," said Mr. May, next morning at breakfast, "what of the lists? Are they made up?"

"Not finished, papa," said Clover.

"Papa," said Lily, "it's terribly hard work!"

Mr. May laughed.

"I thought so," he said. "And so you have all been bankrupt half a dozen times? Well, I have chosen three places for the gardens. My part of the work was easy."

"Oh! papa," said Lily, "whereabouts is mine?"

"Why, that is as you all agree," said Mr. May. "I promised to provide the places, but you must do the dividing yourselves. The first is down by the fence, just in front of the bow-window. The second lies close at the foot of the window itself."

"Papa," said Clover, "may the one who has the place by the fence let her flowers run on it?"

"The one by the fence may do what she likes with the fence, except pull it down. In like manner the one by the window may do any thing with that except break it. The third place lies down at the foot of the slope to the west; toward the side fence but not by it. This is rather the largest of the three."

"Oh, I should like to have the largest!" said Lily.

"Till the weeds come," said her father. "My dear, have you thought about the weeds?"

"Oh! I don't mean to let 'em come —so I needn't think about 'em," said Lily. "But Clover's the oldest, she ought to choose first."

"I don't care about choosing," said Clover, "I dare say I can make something of either place."

"Well, then, I shall take the large place down at the foot of the slope," said Lily. "I can't bear to be crowded."

"Now, Prim," said Clover, "you must choose next."

"By what rule of preference?" said Mr. May, who was watching the progress of affairs with a good deal of interest.

"She is the smallest, papa—it might make more difference to her."

"May I really choose?" said Primrose; "I don't think it's fair."

"Why yes it is, if I with it," said Clover.

"Well, then," said Prim, with gleeful pleasure in her very tone, "I choose the place under the window. Because mamma can look at me when I'm at work; and I might be lonely down there by the fence."

"I am sure mamma will approve that arrangement," said Mr. May, as they left the table. "Clover," he said, softly, bending down with his arm round her, "are you quite content?"

"I? Oh yes, papa! I shouldn't enjoy any thing, you know, if Lily and Prim were not pleased. And besides, don't you think, papa, 'said Clover, drawing him off to the window, "that my fence will be an advantage, and give me nice facilities?"

Mr. May laughed; but there was great tenderness in his eyes as he stooped and kissed the honest, sensible little face, and went away.

"Yes," he said, "you'll find 'facilities' enough, and turn them all into felicities!"

Clover stood still, looking out at her fence.

"Oh, Sam!" said Lily, "will you dig our gardens this morning?"

"Certainly not," said Sam, without hesitation.

"Oh, why not? I thought you would do any thing!"

"I will not, chiefly because it is impossible," said Sam. "The ground is frozen as hard as a rock."

"Why, is it?" said Lily—"frozen? That's very strange."

"On the contrary, it is just what happens every year about this time."

"But when will it melt?" said Lily.

"Melt!" cried Jack; "the ground melt! Ha, ha! that's a good one!"

"Well, I don't see what you're laughing at," said Lily. "Other frozen things melt."

"Yes," said Sam, "other frozen things melt, but the ground knows."

"And as soon as the ground thaws will you dig up our gardens, Sam?" said little Prim.

"If I live and am well, you may depend upon it. As soon as the ground will work, I will."

"What do you mean by the ground's working?" said Clover, turning round from the window.

"Why, just now it is frozen hard, you know; and when it first begins to thaw it is very wet—more like mud than earth; and it is impossible to dig it well and break up the lumps, and make it fine and smooth. Indeed you can hardly dig it at all. But when the water drains off a little, and the warm sun has shone upon it for a while, the earth gets dry and crumbly, and then it will work. So shall I. You'll find those three gardens dug when you first get up some morning. I've no doubt."

"How interesting it is!" said Clover.

"But, Sam," said little Primrose, "please don't dig my garden when we're asleep, because I want to see you do it."

"Why, it's not much to see, is it?" said Lily. "Just dig it up, that's all, isn't it?"

"Just dig it up, just right," said Sam; "and put on just what is wanted, and make it just smooth afterward."

"What do you put on, Sam?" said Clover.

"Manure of some kind. I must ask papa what kind this soil needs."

"Is it hard to dig it just right?" said Primrose.

"I hope it won't be, after the frost is out," said her brother. "I'll do my best to get it in nice order for your plants and seeds."

"We haven't got any plants," said Lily, "we shall have only seeds. Except mamma's rosebush."

"Oh!" said Sam, who was turning over the Catalogue, "you've taken care of that, have you?"

"Taken care of it?" said Lily; "why we haven't got money to buy plants."

"Plants come from seeds."

"But, Sam," said Lily, "how can we sow our seeds till we get the ground to sow 'em in?"

"It does sound difficult," said Sam. "Are these lists made out?"

"Mine is," said Lily.

"Mine isn't," said Primrose.

"I can finish mine very soon," said Clover, "now I know where my garden's to be."

"Let's look over yours first, then, Lily, if that is ready," said Sam.

"Oh, I'd like to have you, very much," said Lily. "I guess you'll think it's beautiful. You know papa told us to choose; but then each of us had such different reasons for choosing that I don't believe we've got one thing alike. You see I took (generally, I mean) the flowers with easy names—I got so bothered with names half a yard long. And Prim wanted all the sweet things; and Clover," said Lily, with a laugh, "wanted all the useful things. Useful flowers; it's such a funny idea!"

Sam looked comically down at his Catalogue.

"The three lists, then," he said, "may be divided into Sweet, Useful, and Easy-Useless."

"Well you may laugh," said Lily, "but you'll see what a grand list I've got, if it is easy-useless. I didn't want flowers that were too much trouble, Sam; and I'd rather have something that I can call snap-dragon at once, and not be always saying 'the tall, blue thing,' or 'the little pink thing,' because I can't remember its name."

"Very judicious and proper," said Sam, opening the Catalogue. "I conclude, then, that snap-dragon heads the Easy-Useless list."

"Yes, it does," said Lily; "this one down here; 'best and brightest varieties mixed.' That was the one Clover advised me to take."

"Useful advice at any rate," said Sam. "What comes next? Alonsoa warscewiczii?"

"No indeed," said Lily.

"This one, perhaps, then—amblyolepis setigera."

"I should think people would be ashamed to give flowers such names," said Lily. "Little innocent things that can't help themselves. No, this is the next—aster: the penny-dowered perfection, mixed colors. Then comes calendula—that's a sort of marigold, you see—and then comes. That looks so beautiful that I had to take it. And the 'mixed varieties' are only five cents."

"That sounds useful," said Sam.

"How about this great cockscomb?"

"I don't like the looks of it much," said Lily. "I shan't take it. But here's a pretty thing, Sam —this little dwarf convolvulus—convolvulus minor. You see convolvulus major is morning-glory, but I've taken the minor. Ten cents—and all sorts of colors. And one must have some little things, I suppose. Then now come the pinks—just look at them! I've taken one, and Primrose another, and Clover another."

"You could not have made a better choice," said Sam.

"Then I've got this hollyhock," said Lily—"'showy and double.' I hope you like that? And oh! Sam, what do you think about sunflowers?—just see, 'perfectly double,' and 'from five to eight feet high.'"

"I never saw one so tall," said Sam, waiving the more difficult question of his thoughts.

"Well, I'll see," said Lily; "I couldn't quite make up my mind. But flax—I must have that—'brilliant crimson,' and flowers all summer. I didn't know flax was so beautiful."

"This is not the common kind," said Sam.

"I wanted some pansies, but I couldn't have every thing," said Lily, turning over the leaves rather fast, as if to hide from her sight all the unattainable beauties; "and of course I couldn't give up these petunias. There—just look! But they are terribly expensive—twenty cents; and that just takes all the rest of my money! Now, Sam, what do you think? isn't it a good list?"

"Very good," said Sam, "and not difficult."

"There's all sorts of peas and beans over here," said Lily; "but I thought they sounded common. And there's something else, beginning with a Z, that looks handsome: but the name's ugly. And one can't have every thing."

"Sam, where did you learn so much about flowers?" said Mrs. May from her table.

"At Thornbrake, mamma, while I was at school. Mr. Austin's place was close by, and I did a great deal of work and play too in his gardens."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 2, 1866.

MAKING TREASON ODIOUS.

THE President has directed that RAPHAEL SEMMES, the late commander of the late Alabama, shall go, while he remains unpardoned, hold or exercise the function of Probate Judge, to which office he had just been elected in Mobile. This is an indication of caution and prudence which will be commended by every good citizen.

When Mr. JOHNSON became President he made many speeches to many deputations, and the refrain of every speech was that treason must be made odious. No sentiment he ever uttered was more approved. It was not because he was undestood to mean that there must be universal vengeance. No sensible man wished that there should be a general hanging and confiscation and outlawry. No one who knew the kind human nature imagined that the pence which had been won could be secured by a vindictive policy. Treason was to be made odious by honoring patriotism. The Government was to favor those who had been faithful to it during the long, dark day of rebellion. Such a policy was founded in common sense. It was intelligible to the dullest mind. Why, then, has it been so often disregarded?

We are not of those who say or believe that the President wishes to put the Government into the hands of its enemies. It is sheer folly to insist that he is anxious to welcome redhanded rebels into Congress. A man is not proved a traitor because his views appear to be short-sighted and perilous. Some of the how estest men in the world have done the most mischief, and all that they were not bad men. That the President should wish to see the Union restored to its normal condition during his Administration is most natural and laudable; but it is necessary to suspect the motives of such a desire. We disagree, indeed, with many of his views, and the temper in which he often discusses public affairs in his hyphe speeches is most lamentable. His disposition to make assent to his theories the test of patriotic fidelity is, of course, simply pernicious, and the systematic attempt upon his part, which we do not anticipate, but which is clamorously urged upon him, to prostitute the vast patronage of office to the promotion of his own purposes, however honestly those purposes may be entertained, we trust will be Constitutionally opposed to the utmost. But we believe he heartily deplores the unpromising state of feeling in large portions of the late rebel section, and while he is inclined to attribute it to the slay of Congress to admit loyal representatives from that section, he probably entirely forgets how much of the unsatisfactory condition of the late insurgent States is due to departures from the policy of making treason odious.

When the Union men of those States who have undergone every kind of outrage, who have been fined, mobbed, imprisoned, and have seen their Union neighbors hunted and tortured and hung for their fidelity to the Government, see a man like General HUMPHREYS, of Mississippi, a conspicuous, leading traitor hastily pardoned by the President that he may become Governor; when they see Mr. MCCRDLE, of New Orleans, another chief traitor, pardoned that he may become Mayor; when they see members of the Cabinet deliberately annulling the law of the land in order to appoint late rebels to national offices, while the most noted and tried Union men in the insurgent States ask in vain for such recognition of their fidelity, how can such a policy help bitterly feeling the contemptuous scorn with which the triumphant rebels regard them? How can they help asking why they might not as well have been rebels? How can they help the conviction that the policy of the Executive is conciliation of rebels and not recognition of Union men, or would asking with intense incredulity whether this is the way in which treason is to be made odious?

On the other hand, what is more natural than that the late rebels who, as the President solemnly declared last year, were to be made odious, seeing exactly what the Union men see, should denounce Congress precisely as they used to denounce "the North," should heap every insulting superlative upon the most loyal men in the country, should vociferously declare their "rights," and begin vehemently to expound the Constitution which for four years they have trampled under foot? What is more natural than that these men whose treason, the President taught us, was to make them odious, should persecute with savage ferocity the most unfortunate and defenseless of all Union men in the South, the freedmen, attack their teachers and assassinate the officers of the Bureau, when they see that the Executive is plainly hostile to the Freedmen's Bureau, is reluctant to secure their civil rights, and fiercely denounces as traitors their especial friends? What is more natural than that these men who were to be made odious should make it odious to have been a Union man, and as Mr. BOUTWELL says in Tennessee, should "assume a superiority over the loyal men of this State, impudent, defiant, and determined to ostracize, decapitate, and put the brand of infamy upon loyal men, and by legislation to render treason commendable and loyalty a crime." What wonder that the late rebel Mayor of Mobile, at a banquet of rebels, toasts together ANDREW JOHNSON and JEFFERSON DAVIS, while JOHN MINOR BOTTS whose fidelity to the Union will not be questioned, declares that he has abandoned President JOHNSON'S plan?

What is the explanation of this extraordinary state of affairs? A year ago, amidst the total ruin of the rebellion and exhaustion of the rebel section, and with the hearty sympathy and support of every loyal man in the land, Mr. JOHNSON became President. Where, while all the people said Amen, that treason must be made odious. Now, when a year has passed, it is loyalty that is odious and treason in the disaffected section, and the vast body of loyal citizens gaze at the President in wonder. Is this situation to be explained by the delay of Congress to admit Union representatives from unorganized States, or by the fact that the Executive has not succeeded in making treason odious in those States?

If from the moment he became President Mr. JOHNSON, while he reasonably pardoned and annestied the late rebels, had strenuously supported in every way the loyal white men of the rebel States, if he had shown the most unflinching determination that every right of the freedmen should be respected, and had made it very manifest to the people of the Government by its official preference of those who had defended it and believed in it under terrible trials, then, whatever the disposition of Congress upon questions of method might have been, his policy would have been as approved and resistless as that of Mr. LINCOLN. As it is, the Union men of the late rebel States are either silenced as before and during the war, or else with Mr. BOTTS they mean to try for their rights independently of the Government.

The sad and stringent testimony of Mr. BOTTS and of Ex-Governor HOLDEN of North Carolina, neither of them "Radicals," supported by the constant stream of private letters and of the frankest statements of Southern Union men, that should the military force be withdrawn they could not maintain a life at all tolerable, the incessant assaults upon the freedmen's schools and teachers—the testimony of General GRANT and of General SHERIDAN that the military force must be maintained for a long time yet in the late disaffected States—the ferocity of the late rebel press, and the undoubted fact, as Governor HOLDEN says, that the true Unionists are dejected, cowed, proscribed, under the ban socially, pecuniarly, and politically," should certainly induce the President to consider whether the term may not be some better explanation of the situation than the radicalism of Congress. A little radicalism is perhaps natural and even justifiable under the circumstances. And we have no doubt that if the Executive should unswervingly insist upon making treason odious, not by hanging or imprisoning or confiscating, nor by treating every man who was in arms as if he were a murderer, but by that firm preference of tried fidelity which is perfectly intelligible to every body, the morbid, vindictive tone of tone in the late rebel section would abate, the painful and prolonged rupture in the great Union party would begin to heal, and a reasonable and truly "restored Union" would become much more promising.

EQUALIZING REPRESENTATION.

At a late political meeting in Philadelphia Senator COWAN, of Pennsylvania, is reported to have declared that he was opposed to any amendment of the Constitution at this time. The importance of any opinion of his now will be due entirely to the public impression that he speaks for the President. But that does not so upon this subject we can not believe. For in that he stands entirely alone. Why Senator COWAN, that the loyal people of this country intend that the late rebel States shall have gained political power by their rebellion? Are the States which conquered against the Union not only to have caused the countless sacrifices of life, the enormous debt of the country, and the universal disturbance of all commercial and social relations, but also to have increased their weight in the National Government? Yet such will be the result if no amendment is made to the Constitution equalizing representation.

Mr. OWEN, in his admirable letter, shows that in the eleven States lately in insurrection the population is in the proportion of three-fifths white to two-fifths colored. If the three-fifths, to which belongs the dangerous element in those States, exclude the two-fifths from voting, and the Constitution remains unchanged, every three white voters in those States will have as much political power in Congress and in all Presidential elections as every five white voters in the other States. Is it for this result that Shiloh was fought and the fiery battles of the Wilderness? Is it for this that SHERMAN marched to the sea, that our brothers were tortured to idiocy and death at Andersonville and Belle Isle, and that untold thousands of Union men were buried in unknown graves? Mr. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS tells us that the opinions of those who led the rebellion are unchanged. Do we, then, propose to give them an unjust advantage in the political arena to which the debate is now adjourned? Senator COWAN says yes. We trust he may live long to repent of that in the country. The citizens who have been the soldiers and sailors, and their brethren and friends, answer the question.

The eleven late insurrectionary States are entitled under the present apportionment, reckoning the whole population white and colored as it stands, to fifty-eight representatives; under a purely white basis they would be entitled to forty-two. Even then they would have an unchanged representation in the Senate, and unchanged in the Presidential election the white voters of those States would have an advantage over the white voters of the other States. This is not intended by the election of President directly by the people.

The question is simple. Shall we, by leaving the Constitution unamended upon this point, give to the chief insurrectionary States that so long as their white population which supported the rebellion chooses to disfranchise the colored population which was loyal, every white voter shall have more than twice and a third as much political power in the Government as the white voter of the States that did not rebel? This is the question which should be put to the country unembarrassed by any other proposition. This is the amendment suggested by the Committee of Congress, which we hope will be acted from the four years' disfranchisement of those who adhered to the rebellion and then offered to the Legislatures of the States. The result, we imagine, will be that Senator COWAN and other loyal people can be magnanimous without folly, and conciliatory without forgetting common sense and justice.

THE ENGLISH REFORM BILL.

THE next step in Mr. GLADSTONE'S Reform bill, it appears, is the redistribution of seats —or, as we call it, the reapportionment of representatives. This is the proportion between the representation and the population in different parts of the British islands has always been excessively unfair. It has arisen from the ancient borough and county rights and privileges which it was the object of the "Municipal Reform" bill of the year 1835 to regulate. Parliament was composed of members elected by counties, by boroughs, by a certain number of cities, and by the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin. The counties, towns and boroughs the right of voting was anciently conferred by the gracious will of the King; but in a town where there was a corporation it was that, and not the people, who was privileged to vote.

In 1790 the city of London had 500,000 inhabitants and four representatives; while the county of Middlesex, with a population of 175,000, had 44 representatives. In the same year 375 voters, scattered among 30 boroughs, sent 60 members to Parliament. The member for Tiverton was elected by 14 voters; the member for Tavistock by 10. The borough of Old Sarum is historical. Old Sarum is the synonym of a rotten borough. This was a deserted spot of half a dozen old houses and a dozen inhabitants, and was entitled to two representatives, who were generally nominated either by the owner or the holder of the proprietor of the place. LOUIS BLANC tells us also of another borough which was under water, but which continued to be represented. The proprietor of the place stepped into a boat with three others, and the election took place at sea. But in the debates of 1831 the Lord Advocate mentioned a case where the constituency was composed, in addition to the sheriff and the registering officer, of one person who met, called himself to order, took the chair, nominated, seconded the nomination, voted for himself, and declared himself unanimously elected.

In Middlesex, in 1844, it appeared that the voters were 1 in 115, in Lancashire 1 in 80, and in West Surrey 1 in 26. Tavistock, which in 1790 sent one member for 10 voters, now elects two members by 340 voters. Honiton has 283 electors and two members; Totnes 250 and two members; Thetford 217 and two members. Mr. ROBERT LOWE is one of the most active and forcible opponents of the GLADSTONE Reform bill. He represents Calne, and is elected by 175 voters, a majority of whom, or 88 voters, would counterbalance the votes of 11,396 electors in the northern division of the West Riding of Yorkshire. Mr. LAWSON, Attorney-General for Ireland, represents a constituency of 86 electors. His seat would be secured by 44 votes, and his vote is of course equal in the House to that of either of the members for Cork, whose constituency numbers 16,572.

These extraordinary inequalities are natural in a system of government of classes and not of the people, and they explain the origin of the condition of England. The perception of the inadequacy and injustice of the representation brought the country into the state of civil war in 1831 and '2; but such is the political progress even in England, that the year 1867 will probably see a man who believes in universal intelligent suffrage Prime Minister.

NATIONAL BANK SCANDALS.

THE pending investigation of the affairs of the Merchants' National Bank at Washington reveals facts which, though scandalous enough to shock any outside observer, were not unexpected by those who have made themselves familiar with the working of the National Bank system. It not only appears that the heaviest deposits of public money in the Washington bank were made after its insolvency was established, but it further appears that a considerable portion of that very money was used in stock operations in Wall Street. A correspondent, who took pains to get control of the bank, used its money in Wall Street and lost it, and, to make good their losses, contrived to induce Government agents (we use studies to mention names) to give them more money to speculate still further. It is the old story of JEREMIE or KERCHEVAL.

The scandal will pass over and be forgotten in the usual nine days were the Merchants' National Bank a solitary specimen of its kind. But it is only one of two or three score institutions which have been fattening on the public money. Over twenty-four millions of public money were, at the date of the last Treasury return, deposited for safe keeping in National Banks. The amount must now be reduced to less than twenty-three millions and a half by the failure of the Merchants' Bank. All this money is dealt with the National Banks free of interest; though, simultaneously, the Treasury Department is paying 4 and 5 per cent. interest on $26,000,000 of Government deposits which it does not need. A smart financier can thus make money very easily. All that is requisite is to get his bank appointed a Government depository, which is readily done. A little further exertion secures him a deposit of half a million. If he does not choose to take trouble or to run risks, he leaves this money in the Sub-Treasury in New York or Philadelphia, and lends it to Government at 4 per cent. Thus our obliging Secretary actually pays a premium of interest for the use of his own money, and our smart National Banker makes $20,000 a year without risk or labor. This may be very grand in theory, but in practice it strikes us that financiering of this order is not the way to restore a sound currency or to promote economy.

There are points of view in which the National Bank system commends approval. It is an improvement on the old State system, which involved such wide variations in the values of the currencies of different States, and created the door for so many frauds. No one would now desire to abolish it, and go back to the old plan. In the main it is a success. But it can not be denied that the system, as at present administered, is susceptible of improvement. The public will not much longer pay taxes at the rate of 8 to per cent. in order the purpose of enabling National Banks to realize 12 per cent. on their capital—as they do by drawing 6 per cent on the bonds deposited with the Controller of the currency, and 6 more by using the currency issued to them on the deposit of said bonds. Sooner or later, Congress will see that bonds deposited as security will absorb the bulk of the interest they bear; and no sound objection will be urged against the measure. Nor is there any justification for the present Government deposits. Every such be safely kept. Apart from the risk which money now—quite needlessly, there is something demoralizing in placing at the gratuitous disposal of speculative bankers large sums of money which may not be called for in months, and by the use of which, with good luck, fortunes may be realized.

It is notorious in Wall Street that the bulk of the "fancy stocks," which have been lately inflated in that meridian, are "carried" with money loaned by National Banks—in good part, indirectly, money supplied by the Government. The money of the Merchant's National Bank at Washington was lost, it is said, in Chicago and North Western, and one or two fancy coal stocks. It had previously been used to corner Michigan Southern—so 'tis said. Who can say how the other $23,500,000 of Government money in the National Banks is being employed? Is this the money which is inflating Canton, and Quicksilver, and Mariposa, and Pittsburg, and Fort Wayne, and the other lively "fiancies" of the street? Or is it employed in carrying gold—with a view to put up the premium and depreciate the national currency? If Mr. M'CULLOCH is willing to lend his own money to National Banks without interest, while at the same time he borrows money of the same banks at four per cent., there would be no inconsistency in his selling gold to keep down the premium, and at the same time furnishing buyers of gold with currency (free of interest) to carry the precious metal and so defeat his object.

History incessantly repeats itself. Thirty-two or three years ago Government deposited its money with State banks, which used it to foster speculation, and the result was the crash of 1837 and heavy losses of Government money. We seem to be trending in the old path. If Government continues to employ the National Banks as depositories of the public money, in disregard of the established Sub-Treasuries, the amount in the keeping of these institutions will soon swell from $83,500,000 to double that amount. The Sub-Treasurers have no interest in increasing their deposits; the National Banks have every reason to desire theirs increased. And at Washington the latter appear to have more friends than the former. Mr. M'CULLOCH is understood to have interfered with the War Department last week to prevent the summary withdrawal of paymasters' funds from the National Banks; and the Controller of the Currency has written a letter to say that in his opinion National Bank notes are quite as good as greenbacks. If Congress does not interfere, the current of thing points very clearly to increased deposits in the National Banks, a vast speculation based on such deposits, and another 1837 not very far off to view. It is for Congress and the tax-payers to say whether this risk shall be incurred.

THE LATE RIOT AT MEMPHIS.

A PRIVATE letter to us from Memphis, written just before the late riot by a careful and impartial observer who is by no means of a "Radical," is an interesting revelation of the state of society in that city, and explains the late shameful scenes there. Our correspondent is speaking of the Freedmen's Bureau, and says:

"The Provost Marshal of the Bureau attends every morning at the Union-house to watch over in which the colored men are concerned. This is quite necessary, the civil authorities of the city being mostly Irish, and lookingly violent to the negro. Two or three cases of outrageous misconduct come under my notice. The Major is a full-blooded Irishman, and will not allow any abuse of the same nationality. Brutal muscle and all kinds of misdeeds are uncommon.

"In Memphis one of the ordinances is, that a stranger not a storekeeper can only sell through the agency of commissioners appointed for that purpose. The police are constantly on the watch for infringements of this ordinance. Now upon the steamer Arkansas a boat I traveled on, there was a large number of boxes full of poultry going to New Orleans. A well-dressed man came on board and addressing a colored porter, asked if they were for sale. He was told that the man who owned them was in at dinner. Without further words he carried off the porter to prison. When the man was missed, and the explanation had been had become of him, he sent another colored man to the station with a message that it was altogether a mistake. This man was likewise detained in durance vile. The clerk of the boat went next, but without satisfaction. So the captain went, up, and learning that his men were to be held for trial for breaking a city ordinance. He asked that the court sit and decide the matter. This was at once refused. He next requested to see the law. This fresh piggo pulled out a dog's-eared old order-book, and pointing to a page, remarked, 'There, damn it, is a copy of the law.' The captain would not have his men, and even offered his boat as security for their appearance, without avail. He then bethought him of the bravura, through which the men were released, the captain having fifty dollars with the officer as a guarantee to produce the men if wanted at a future time. The court was now in session, but was the informer present? Everything and saying he would be damned if he was going to lose his men. Under such laws about a hundred negroes are at present held."

It is not surprising that in such a city upon the slightest pretense the police force and the rabble should engage in a bloody form of the unhappy class of the population. We gave last week the details of the sad scenes of the first days of May. The animus of this terrible riot is evident. It was that hatred of the white race which is made more malignant in the late Slave States by the fact of its unswerving loyalty during the war. That the returning colored soldiers were quarrelsome and noisy and sullen as drunken white soldiers are under similar circumstances is undoubtedly true. But no conduct of white soldiers would have occasioned so prolonged and murderous a persecution. The Memphis Avalanche, which was a furious advocate of the rebellion, and is now, of course an equally furious opponent of "the Radicals," gravely states that in this wanton massacre of negroes and burning of their houses "Radical feelings was indulging a partial satisfaction." In precisely the same spirit when the foreign rabble of New York hung and shot and burned the inoffensive negroes in the summer of 1863, the New York World, and other papers in sympathy with the rebellion, spoke of the loathsome crimes of a mad mob as a movement of "the people."

Both these shameful riots sprang from the inhuman prejudice against the colored population which is carefully fostered and inflamed by the Democratic party. We appeal to every intelligent man whether it is a fact that that population is generally or notoriously lawless or criminal or malignant. We appeal to our history to declare whether for the last eighty years they have been more sinning or sinned against in this country. And we appeal to Yankee common-sense to decide whether a party whose sole policy is contemptuous injustice toward a seventh part of the population is not a party radically dangerous to the peace and welfare of the country.

General STONEMAN'S letters upon the riots to the people of Memphis are manly and decided. They show that the peace will now be maintained if he has force sufficient. General FISK, of the Freedmen's Bureau, and a Committee of Congress are engaged in investigating the circumstances of the disturbance. Those who ask why this is left to Congress forget that Memphis is still under the National care.

A SIGN IN VIRGINIA.

THE Virginia Union Convention is one of the most cheerful signs of the times. It is an indication of the self-respect and confidence of the large number of the South, who although compelled to silence during the war still nourished the true faith. For a year they have been as silent as before, apparently waiting to see the salvation of the country which their cause had won. But at last they begin to see that they must save themselves, and Mr. CLEMENTS, of Portsmouth, touched the mainspring of their final success when he said that the true policy of the Union men in the South should be to avail themselves of the negro element. This is indeed obvious, because the more than the colored population composes a solid body of the staunchest Unionists. We confess, however, that we had not expected this inevitable and decisive position to be so quickly taken, and the fact that it has been is proof of the earnestness of those who plant themselves upon it. We call it inevitable, because the colored race must support given to impartial suffrage by the most intelligent class of citizens in the country, and its sure final triumph, it was impossible that, as political influences now stand, it could be overmastered again in the rebel States, this immense resource of strength should be disregarded.

It is a significant fact that the political Convention has declared itself for impartial suffrage more plainly and forcibly than the late assemblage at Alexandria. It was in that city that the first advance of the Union sentiment was made against the external lines of the late rebellion, and it is there that the first blow of a Southern State is given to the political system which rebellion. When the platform of this Convention becomes the policy of the late rebel States the cornerstone of an enduring peace will be laid.

The Convention, which called Union Republican party of Virginia, and took measures for the appointment of State and county committees. The platform adopted for impartial qualified suffrage as a requisite of a republican form of government, and as a means of maintaining the policy of the President and of Congress. It holds itself under honorable position of the people which is denied a voice in the elections will be denied just protection for property and person. The only true instruction to sure which does not provide against the assertion of the doctrine of secession; that treason should be made odious; that it is the evident intention of the late rebels to try to secure by votes what they could not obtain by bayonets; that intelligence is essential to a truly safe republican government; that the system of education should therefore be secured by a system of free schools; and, finally, the Convention appointed a committee to wait upon the President and Congress to present their sympathy and their approval of its action.

Here, then, is a movement to which the most captious can find no objection. The unswerving devotee of State rights can not carp at the peaceful and lawful action of a body of unquestionably loyal citizens; and the most ardent believer in the right of the nation to secure the Union by any just political condition may well prefer to see that result attained by spontaneous local action. The Convention is but another illustration of the vital character of the question of equal suffrage. It will be agitated every where in the country until it triumphs, and until it does triumph we shall be subject to the gravest political excitements.

RELATION OF EXERCISE TO HEALTH.

THE necessity of exercise for the maintenance of health is a very hackneyed theme, and yet few really understand how it promotes health, and some even of those who have written about it would be puzzled in trying to furnish an explanation. With the view of presenting the real nature of the subject, there are consequently many errors afloat which are practically injurious. Hence the necessity for looking at the matter more carefully than is commonly done.

What effects do exercise actually produce in the system? Its most palpable effect is increased activity in the circulation—the heart beats faster and stronger, pumping the blood more rapidly into the arteries; and the capillaries, or hair-like, extreme vessels, are every where fuller of blood than usual, which is shown externally to the eye in the reddening of the skin. The lungs are crowded with blood, and hence the breathing is rapid to provide sufficient air to aerate the surplus blood passing through. With the reddened face there is a reddened brain, for the strongly-pumping heart forces more blood than usual upward into this organ. And so of other organs.

What comes of all this? What should come from increasing the supply of blood to muscles and from stimulated action? Good development, building of bone to a full pattern, and strong building. It is not, observe, what is put into the system that may come from mere relaxation, with a plentiful supply of material. The struggle is firm as well as large.

You see this result in the muscles themselves. Look at the bulging muscles of iron strength in the arm of the blacksmith, contrasted with the muscles in the arm of a sedentary man. So also the sailor has the muscles of the arms more developed than those of the lower extremities, because he uses them so much more; while, on the contrary, the muscles of the lower limbs of the dancer and the athletic runner are extraordinarily developed.

But while the enlarging and strengthening effect of exercise is manifested most decidedly in the muscles, it is, as you have seen from what we have already said, by no means confined to them. There is not an organ of the body that is not affected. This is recognized in relation to the stomach, for it is commonly said that exercise increases the power of digestion. But it is equally true of the lungs, for they are strengthened by exercise, and the exercise that makes the blood course through their minute vessels, distending them fully, will similarly affect those organs. So, too, with the brain can do its work better if the blood be exercised. It is a very general principle, then, to say that the thinker in taking exercise is not merely resting his brain, and strengthening his system at large, but he is directly storing up power in the brain itself.

We have thus far spoken of growth or building; but after the full development is reached exercise is needed to keep up the good condition. If it be omitted there will be either shrinkage or bulk without vigor. We have mentioned to think of adults as being fully developed; but there are glaring facts which prove that many of them are far from it—either they have not been fully developed, or if they have, there has been a decided loss from long intermission of the requisite exercise. We refer to the measurements of the chest, the increase of bulk, especially in the capacity of the chest, after a course of gymnastic exercises.

But there is something beyond mere development in the results of exercise. The nervous power, or vital force, or whatever it may be called, has for one of its functions the purification of arterial blood, and therefore the better this and the more briskly the circulation the sounder will be the general activity of the various organs.

Another thing still is to be taken into the account. All the waste matter in the body is carried to the skin of the active and the thin and flabby skin of the sedentary. We especially refer to the immense amount of waste which the skin of every man performs. One of these is excretion. In the insensible perspiration—the breathing of the skin, as it was called formerly—for instance, there pass off constantly much of the refuse of the system. For the purpose of effecting this there is a vast system of vessels in the skin. Mr. E. Wilson, with the aid of a microscope, counted 3528 tubes in a square inch on the palm of the hand. Now, as in general there are in the whole skin about 7,000,000 of these tubes, and the total amount of tubing is 48,600 yards, or 28 miles. Professor Draper has also, likewise, discussed an occasional washing out to remove obstructions, and this can only be done by the free, sensible perspiration produced by brisk exercise. Outside bathing will not alone accomplish this—it may remove obstructions from the outlets of the tubes, but can not clear out those themselves; and this can be done by water forced through them from the inside—that is, by the flow of the perspiration. It would hardly be said that these tubes are not to be cleared, the refuse which should pass through them, retained in the system, will surely impair the health and produce positive disease.

You see from what we have said that gentle exercise alone can not answer the purposes alluded to. There must be violent action with a strong exertion, such as will make the heart pump the blood forcibly into all the organs, and will cause a good flow to the perspiration. Hence the regular and proper walk of the formal processions so commonly seen issuing from boarding-schools does but little good. Merely developing and flexibility are the certain results of such shortcomings in the obedience of nature's laws.

The limits of exercise, and the relative values of its various forms and modes, will be considered hereafter.

"THE LITTLE QUEEN OF THE WOODS."

THE charming picture on our first page is reproduced from a painting by J. G. BROWN, of this city. The painting is one of those pleasant works of art which have given Mr. BROWN a well-deserved popularity. We have placed this engraving in industrious juxtaposition with MISS WARNER'S delightful story of "The Three Little Spades," because there seemed to be a peculiar fitness in setting "The Little Queen of the Woods" in the midst of a chapter about flowers.

LITERARY.

THE first volume of LOSSING'S "Pictorial History of the Civil War," published by GEORGE W. CHILDS, is now ready for sale. It is a large and handsome volume of 600 pages, copiously illustrated, and it tells with unflagging interest and fidelity the story of the rebellion from the meeting of the Charleston Convention in 1860 to the disastrous battle of Bull Run. It is written in a lucid and animated style, warmed with the most earnest, patriotic feeling. In the author's judgment the rebellion was a crime against the country, against liberty and civilization; but his fervid condemnation of the leaders in the dark conspiracy does not confuse his faculty as a faithful chronicler. Mr. LOSSING is familiarly with the country and with our history acquired in the preparation of his "Pictorial History of the Revolution;" and of the War of 1812, and his practiced skill as a writer and designer, have been of great value to him in compiling this history. He is now visiting every point of interest during the war; and when his journey is completed he will have traveled about twenty thousand miles for the purposes of his work. He hopes to be completed in three volumes. The author's candor and sincerity, his careful and extensive research, and his untiring industry and patience give a peculiar claim to his Chronicle of the War.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

May 15:

In the Senate, Mr. Sherman reported a bill to reduce the rate of interest on the national debt, and for funding the same. The joint resolution to prevent the introduction of cholera into the United States was then taken up, and, after receiving some amendments, was passed. A message was received from the President, returning, without his signature, the bill for the admission of Colorado.

In the House, the Senate amendments to the Army Appropriation bill were concurred in.—The bill on the Organization of the Territories was passed by a vote of 95 to 43. The ninth section prohibits the denial of suffrage on account of color or race of any citizen.

May 17:

In the Senate, the Diplomatic Appropriation bill was passed.—The West Point Academy bill was then considered.—The President nominated, and the Senate confirmed, the appointment either to West Point or the Naval Academy of any person who has served in the rebel army or navy. The bill was passed.

May 18:

In the House, a resolution was adopted, without debate, declaring Mr. Delano entitled to his seat as Representative from the Thirteenth District of Ohio.

BURNING OF THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

On the night of May 21 a fire broke out in a restaurant connected with the Academy of Music, and before it was soon laid in ruins. The New York University Medical College, the Academy of Music, the Cooper Institute, Fifteenth Street and across Third Avenue. The loss is estimated by millions of dollars.

NEWS ITEMS.

Ex-Governor John Letcher, of Virginia, in a recent letter, says that he has taken no part in politics, and has not cast a political vote since 1861. He says that he is personally ruined, and is not engaged in any profession. He says in conclusion: "The only service I can render to the people of the country is by my example, in showing a proper respect for the laws of the land, and a faithful obedience to them."

Captain Ap Catesby Jones, who left the United States Navy for that of the rebels, and commanded the iron-clad Virginia, has been appointed Chief of Ordnance of the Brazilian Navy.

The farmers in Upper Georgia and North Alabama are planting largely of corn fields, and planting corn instead. Not more than one-fourth of the crop was planted in this region.

Mr. Forry has been nominated United States Senator from Connecticut to take the place of Vice-President Foster.

The testimony taken by the Reconstruction Committee is in print. It makes a volume of 785 pages of document size.

On the 15th of July, 1865, the date on which the last organization of colored troops was mustered in there were in the service of the United States 120 regiments of infantry, 12 of heavy artillery, 16 companies of light artillery, and 7 regiments of cavalry—in all as follows:

Infantry	98,893
Heavy Artillery	10,770
Light Artillery	1,611
Cavalry	7,146
Total	118,176

FOREIGN NEWS

THE financial panic in England was increasing. Failures have occurred involving eighteen millions of pounds sterling. Among the houses closed is that of Sir Morton Peto & Co. The Bank of England rate of discount was suspended, and interest has advanced to the rate of 10 per cent.

The news from Germany exhibits no improvement. Count BISMARCK declares that there will be no peace measures unless she at once disarms. Saxony, on the other hand, has made the most humiliating concessions on the ground that she may be called upon by the Federal Diet to provide a contingent for the war. Hanover has refused to disband, and is reserving the Austrian rate of the 26th ult., and that she will not disband, assuming the necessary attitude in the direction of Italy as a menace. Just as an arrangement seemed to have been come to for the peaceful settlement and mobilization of the armaments of Austria and Prussia the latter suddenly broke off the negotiations, ordered the Vienna and on the frontiers against an attack from Italy. Both Austria and Prussia have issued the final mobilization orders, and denies that Italy had increased her armaments. Austria demands that Italy shall disband, but on promises not to take the offensive against Italy, and that, in the event of the disbanding of the Italian forces, the Italy does not meditate an offensive movement against her, and will immediately reduce her army in Venetia to a peace footing. The Italian Government has obtained the unanimous consent of the Chambers to declare the raising the army on a war footing, and for providing by royal decrees and by extraordinary measures for the funds deemed necessary for the defense of the country.

Austria has an army of 640,000 men, Prussia one of 367,500 men. At the latest advices Prussia had demanded the disarming of the Austrian frontier, Austria refused on "every score." Italy was most energetic in her war preparations. Rewards had multiplied her army. Prussia was about to take the same step, and Russia was reported as ready to take a position for action. An appeal had been made to assassinate Count Bismarck in Berlin.

The Italian fleet, under the command of Admiral Naplon, on its way to bombard the city of Cattaro, Pura, was met by the Austrian fleet in the harbor of Lissa, the two fleets clashed, and Naples himself wounded. The Pilo de Angelo and two vessels were sunk. The Austrians claim in the fight that they were obliged to withdraw to San Lorenzo, and they were afterward followed by the Austrian fleet and the rest of the fleet, more or less damaged. The fight lasted five hours. Sixty Russians are reported killed and one hundred and twenty wounded. Some Galvez, the Secretary of War, was killed. The loss of the Spaniards is not known; but it is supposed to have been heavy.

The fortunate peasant, now a noble, who saved the life of the Czar, at the risk of his own, continues to rise in important personages in Russia. His title will not be a possession for life. He is to receive a grant in addition to his birthright already amounting to 40,000, and, subject to his fate for his new position, the Emperor has requested General Todleben to superintend his education.

THE FIRE IN SALEM

WE give on this page an illustration of the recent fire in Salem, in which Lynde block and building in its rear were destroyed. The fire broke out on the night of May 14, in a shed in the rear of the East India Marine Hall building. The locality was one extremely difficult to operate in, and the flames were much advanced when the steamers and engines were brought to bear upon them.

In a short time the stable and Gymnasium building were enveloped in flames, the fire creeping through the roof immediately, and defying the thorough drenching of water which fell upon the outside, but which was unable to penetrate to where it was most needed. The roof finally fell in with a crash.

The East India Marine Hall building was at one time in great danger, the eastern coving being on fire its entire length, and the flames penetrating the roof. A pipe was finally put into the building, which was thus saved from destruction. As it was, the building was considerably damaged by water, though the celebrated collection of curiosities was saved without much injury, though with considerable displacement.

The whole of Lynde block was soon in flames, commencing at the southern end. The total loss of property can not be less than from $75,000 to $100,000.—The wooden buildings were not of great value. The Lynde block and the brick block on Liberty Street were the most valuable of the buildings destroyed.

RECEPTION OF THE FENIAN CHIEF.

ON the 15th of May Mr. JAMES STEPHENS, the Fenian Chief, was honored by his brave brethren with a grand reception at Jones's Wood. There was a crushing turn-out, and notwithstanding that admission-tickets cost fifty cents ahead, there was an immense audience gathered together to hear what the old veteran from across the sea had to say for himself and—for them. About fifteen thousand Fenians are supposed to have been present.

"At half past one," says the Herald, "the carriage which had been sent down to the Metropolitan for the Central Organizer appeared before the main gate to the wood, bearing its illustrious freight. The several bands, which had been dispersed many times during the morning by the appearance of swiftmoving barouches, struck up 'Hail to the Chief' with commendable vigor. Mr. STEPHENS was driven rapidly down the Mall to headquarters between long lines of shouting and cheering Fenians, male and female, young and old, lifting his hat often from his bald head and bowing his pale face to the delighted multitude."

We have not space to give Mr. STEPHENS's address in full. He began with the history of his own connection with the Fenian cause:

"Toward the close of December, 1857," he said, "a young Irishman called at my residence in Dublin, bringing me letters from Colonel O'MAHONY and from the late Colonel MICHAEL DOHENY. He had also an oral communication to make himself; but all was to the effect that an organization had been started in America, of which Colonel DOHENY was appointed the chief, and I was requested to commence an organization and to direct it in Ireland. . . . On my return to Ireland, after seven years' exile, the first thing I did was to travel through the country in every direction to derive a thorough knowledge of the people, and to see what could be done. I devoted a whole year to that, during which time I traveled three thousand miles on foot." He acknowledged that the Fenian movement was a conspiracy. He recounted the discouragements he had met in this country and at home, and also particularly to the opposition of the clergy. "We have," he said, "generally translated upon our friends the duty of giving obedience and submitting in all devotion to their clergy in their spiritual character, but that the most venal corporal character they were simply to look upon them as citizens. Without that training you never could have a force in Ireland upon whom you could rely." He earnestly urged upon his brethren the necessity of union in their efforts. He said the organization in Ireland toward the close of last year numbered two hundred thousand men, and of that force fifty thousand were thoroughly drilled, with a large proportion of men who had seen war and smelt powder on the battle-field — a large proportion of veterans, short: fifty thousand were partly drilled men, and the other hundred thousand quite undrilled. All that the Fenians wanted was war material and money.

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XXI.

IT came upon Somerville at last. Came the very week of the Sabbath upon which Brother Barker had ordained, with the angels in heaven, over the repulse of Banks on Red River. Came at the very time the Secession element of Somerville was glittering upon the very crest, the Union element gloaming in the lowest trough of the ever-rolling sea. Came to Somerville as comes upon the pit of his stomach to a pugilist an unexpected blow when he has just warded off another from his eye. So occupied were we all in Somerville with the doings of this week that we had completely forgotten about ourselves. It was like that ball in Brussels of which Lord Byron has made such extensive tickets: while carriage bell went merrier than did Somerville, when, like the roar of the coming Waterloo, dimming, dilating eyes, paling lips, and ashen cheeks at said ball, comes the rumor of an advance of the Federals upon the town.

How the rumor first reached the place who can tell? Rumor at times seems to be, indeed, the living goddess the Romans made it, and to move with lightning rapidity in and by itself without the intervention of any means whatever. It was exactly at nine o'clock Evening that Dr. Warner threw Mrs. Warner into strong hysterics by the announcement that the Federals were coming. When that lady ventured to steal forth after a night spent in hiding her silver and the children of her negro woman, lest the mother should run away, her jewelry and other valuables refreshing herself occasionally by abuse of alternately the Confederates and the Federals, her husband being most to blame of all, the first object she beheld was the Federal flag flying from the roof of the Court-house, near which Dr. Warner had his home.

We have the authority of Sir Walter Scott that the bugle blast of Roderick Dhu possessed the double power both of causing the instantaneous appearance and the as instantaneous disappearance of bodies of men. Whatever marvel blew the blast in this case, the appearing of the Federal force was not more sudden than was the disappearance of the male Secessionists of the servile. For reasons which will appear in the sequel, we abstain from saying any thing more in reference to this raid than the actual fact of its having taken place just at that time in Somerville compels us to record. Closed stores, upon the walls of which the enemy have posted bills informing the citizens that, so long as they are themselves quiet, the invaders will scrupulously avoid molesting any other than Government property; deserted streets, every individual peeping from behind doors and through the slats of shutters with curiosity swallowing up all other feeling; the marching hither and thither of blue-coated cavalry; the sound of martial music — a dream come and gone before we know it.

That Friday night Mr. Arthur was in the very act of kneeling with Mrs. Sorel's household at family worship when fis hailoo makes it necessary for Robby to go down to the front gate to quiet the dogs and find out what is wanted. He is gone so long that Mr. Arthur himself goes out. He meets Robby returning, and only hears some one shout, "Tell them exactly what I told you!" as the one mounting gallops off in the darkness. Repeating his message on the way back, Robby repeats it yet again when he gets into the house, a most remarkable message it is.

"Colonel Brooks says, 'Be prudent, don't commit yourselves!'"

"Colonel Brooks?" asks Mrs. Sorel — "Colonel Brooks, Brooks?"

"Nothing else?" asks Mr. Arthur, bewilderment giving place to the sudden joy.

"As soon as I could get old Cuff to stop barking I asked, 'Who's there?'" says Robby, soberly, but not without some vague sense of new importance. "'One of the men—'

"'There were two, then?'" asks his mother.

"Yes, ma, on horseback, two—Dr. Peel and Mr. Brooks. Colonel Brooks says, 'Be prudent, don't commit yourselves!' That is exactly what Mr. Brooks said. 'Is that you, Robby?' he asked, when I first got to the gate— 'Is that you, Robby?' so eagerly. Humph," adds Robby, "I think I ought to know Mr. Brooks's voice. Didn't I used to see him every day? Wasn't he my Sunday-school teacher? Colonel Brooks says, 'Be prudent, don't commit yourselves!' And then they galloped off."

"But how do you know the other was Dr. Peel?" asked Mr. Arthur, while Mrs. Sorel had sunk again in her arm-chair, as if unable to stand.

"Oh, I knew that before I got to the gate. He was cursing old Cuff, you know," adds Robby.

"Oh, I know Dr. Peel. I've heard him cursing and swearing on thousand times. Colonel Brooks says, 'Be prudent, don't commit yourselves!'" Robby repeats the words as he had before done quite other words, verses and the like, from Mr. Brooks's lips in the Sabbath-school.

"I really and sincerely think you had better go," says Mrs. Sorel, suddenly, to Mr. Arthur, after half an hour of whispering and consultation.

Mr. Arthur lifts his eyes in mute inquiry, though he sees at a glance that placid Mrs. Sorel has been reading his thoughts.

"By the Federals you know I shall be respected," she says, rapidly but quietly; "if any of the Federals should endeavor to insult me, it would be none the better, all the worse, if you were here. Go, Mr. Arthur, go!"

"I can not think of leaving you. None but you and Robby," begins that individual. "The negroes—"

"They would not harm their old mistress. No—Mrs. Sorel is safer without you," she adds, with a smile.

"I can not think of going. I will not leave you exposed," says Mr. Arthur, throwing on the table his hat, which he has, most unconsciously, put from the hall, and has had in his hand all this time. And he takes his seat, and draws Robby to his accustomed place between his knees.

"Mr. Arthur," says Mrs. Sorel, very erect in her chair—as thoroughly from South Carolina at the moment as Mrs. Bowles ever was—"I am mistress in my own house—No, I don't mean that. I am old enough to be your mother. I will do as you say. I would to Frank if he were here. I command you to go!"

Even as he gallops along through the darkness toward Somerville Brother Barker means him; but he gallops on, leaving the casuistry of the case to be settled when he has more time.

A busy time he has when he reaches town. He had met more than one vehicle on the road thither; he now hears the roll of wheels, the galloping of horses in every direction; slamming doors, running feet, sawing, hammering, glancing lights in the windows, lanterns in almost every stable. Few voices heard, but an exceedingly busy time.

Not until he has alighted at Mrs. Bowles's gate does he ask himself how he is to arrange matters with that lady—what he is to say. The front-door is open, a light streams from it, and, as he opens the gate for us, the beams fall full upon the face of Brother Barker, of all men in the world. And very much excited indeed is Brother Barker.

"Ah! Brother Arthur," he says, in an agitated manner, seizing upon, rather than sheer force of general habit—shaking the hand of the other in the long, and altogether indescribable manner peculiar to Brother Barker after a warm meeting in church or arbor. It is the first time he has even spoken to Brother Arthur for years past. Generally he has avoided him on the street, or, when compelled to pass him, it has been with a nod greatly colder than no recognition; the republican—moral, religious, intellectual, every way—the repulsion between these two men being really greater than that between any other two men in Somerville.

"Your horse, I believe, Brother Arthur?" pointing to the animal from which Mr. Arthur had just alighted with his left hand, while he retains his friend's hand, still shaking it, in his right.

It is Mr. Arthur's horse.

"Would you be so kind? Some unprincipled person has stolen my animal from the stable within the last hour. The fact is—I presume you may know—it is believed the Federal—I would not wound your feelings for the world, Brother Arthur'—another shake of the hand—"but I have reason to think that I may be singled out"—greatly agitated.

"What can I do for you, Sir?" asks Mr. Arthur, to close the interview, endeavoring in vain to extricate his hand.

With many hurried words Brother Barker at last sets and obtains Mr. Arthur's horse, and rides off, and faster than its owner had come. The fact is, just before, Brother Barker and Bob Withers had been thrown together at Stephen's hotel, in the universal jumble of the confusion and hurry.

"Oh, is this you, Mr. Barker? You here yet?" Mr. Withers has found time, in the rush, to stop and ask of that gentleman, with astonishment, even terror, depicted on his face. "Why, my dear Sir—by George! You here still? Don't you know they have sworn to hang you? You must have heard of it; it is you they are coming to Somerville after. Colonel Brooks commands the force. It was you, you know—don't you, by George!—who had his brother Paul hung. From your own steeple they'll hang you, man!" But here the two are separated in the confusion, and for several days after Brother Barker has disappeared, with multitudes of others, from the streets of Somerville.

Mr. Arthur finds himself in Mrs. Bowles's parlor, and in company with that lady and her daughter, before he has at all arranged what to say. He had not supposed Mrs. Bowles could be as cold and stately as she now bears herself, frail as a shadow, the silvered hair so smoothly arranged under the neat cap, the refined face as sorrowful yet as stern as Antigone. Mr. Arthur has a second idea, in the hurry of the moment, that so far from being in undress Mrs. Bowles has on her very best attire, dressed even with unusual care. With coldest politeness she barely endures Mr. Arthur. Alice sits with drooping eyes after the first salutations. No wonder he can not read her thoughts, she is far from knowing them herself.

"Will you pardon my intrusion?" he asks, without taking a seat. "I happen to be in Somerville to-night, and come to beg, if altogether convenient, that I may be permitted to sleep in the front office to-night."

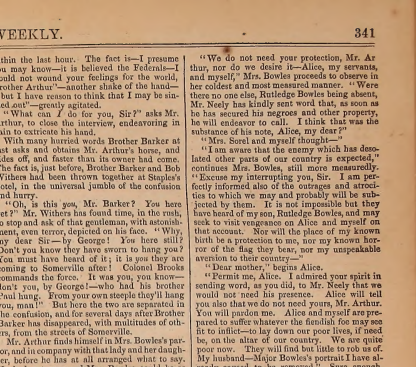
"If you desire to sleep there, not being able to go out to Mrs. Sorel's," begins Mrs. Bowles, with coldest dignity, and as ungraciously as she can force herself to be.

"A gentleman has just borrowed and ridden off my horse," Mr. Arthur remarks, Hannibal like, his ships burned behind him, that having been not the least motive with him in permitting Brother Barker to take his horse—not without a mounting color in his face, and conscious of the appealing eyes of Alice upon him.

"We do not need your protection, Mr. Arthur, nor do we desire it—Alice, my servants, and myself," Mrs. Bowles proceeds to observe in her coldest and most measured manner. "Were there no one else, Rutledge Bowles being absent, Mr. Neely has kindly sent word that, as soon as he has secured his negroes and other property, he will endeavor to call. I think that was the substance of his note, Alice, my dear?"

"Mrs. Sorel and myself thought—"

"I am aware that the enemy which has desolated other parts of our country is expected," continues Mrs. Bowles, still more measuredly.



"Excuse my interrupting you, Sir. I am perfectly informed also of the outrages and atrocities to which we may and probably will be subjected by them. It is not impossible but they have heard of my son, Rutledge Bowles, and may seek to visit vengeance on Alice and myself on that account. Nor will the place of my known birth be a protection to me, nor my known horror of the flag they bear, nor my unspeakable aversion to their country—"

"Dear mother," begins Alice.

"Permit me, Alice. I answered your spirit in sending word, as you did, to Mr. Neely that we would not need his presence. Alice will tell you also that we do not need yours, Mr. Arthur. You will pardon me. Alice and myself are prepared to suffice whatever the fiendish foe may see fit to inflict—to lay down our proud heads, if need be, on the altar of our country. We are quite poor now. They will find but little to rob us of. My husband—Major Bowles's portrait I have already caused to be removed." Sure enough, their visitor, who had missed something, he could not tell what, from the room from the time he entered, glances over the mantle, and sees only a blank upon where lately the grand old Major used to sit enthroned.

"You must permit me to add, Sir," continues Mrs. Bowles, dignified as ever, but recalled by her own words, "that of all the gentlemen in this community you are the last I would look to for protection. Passive as you have been, to use no harsher phrase, in this struggle for the land of your own birth, withholding even your prayers for its success, associating exclusively with, and encouraging to your utmost, those in our midst who are traitors to their country, vipers upon its hearth—Alice, you will permit me to speak in my own house—you, Sir, are the last man in the world to whom I would wish, above all, whom I would have Alice my daughter to look to for protection. Though he has been at one time even insolent, I would prefer me—the boy Charles, who was once my servant, as a protector. That you are here now, instead of at Mrs. Sorel's, is the result, I presume, of secret communication with the enemy. Besides"—all in a quiver from head to foot, her hand wandering about her throat—

"You must permit me, Madam," interrupts

THE HANDKERCHIEF AND THE FIST.

Mr. Arthur, quite conscious of Alice's eyes in mute entreaty, not without color in his cheeks, but never speaking in sick chamber or to dying friend in gentler tones, "to withdraw my request. I should not have intruded. I will do so no more. I trust you will one day do me more justice."

With a bow to the ladies in leaving, carefully avoiding Alice's face with his eyes, yet reaching more nearness to them none the less than ever before in his life, the visitor is gone. And Alice, though she never looks out at the window during the rite of the late night, is perfectly aware, amidst all the noise of wheels and hoofs and feet, that Mr. Arthur is keeping watch and ward about them.

"I have ever esteemed Mr. Arthur a gentleman: I have often wished Butler's fellow could have known him; but that he should have pursued the course he has amazes me. Mrs. Sorel, you believe in hereditary vice. And I am told that Mr. Brooks is actually a Colonel in the Federal forces. It can be nothing," said Mrs. Brooks to her hand to her head, "but insanity, raving insanity. Either they are deranged"—her hand wandering about her brow—"or I am," added she, with the use of the strongest metaphor in her knowledge. "As I have told you a thousand times, Alice, my dear, I wish you to have no further acquaintance with this Mr. Arthur. You have known him for years, but I wish you always to class him in your mind with Butler Arnold—remember, dear."

But Alice is thinking, by some strange coincidence, of the night of the insurrection—how they threw up together on the front porch in all night waiting for what did not, like millions of other things expected in Somerville, take place at last.

And so the night wears away, neither mother nor daughter caring to lie down. Mrs. Brooks, poor lady! in her old, the same instant blaming herself severely for having spoken so to Mr. Arthur, and regretting that she has not been even more bitter to him; wondering that persons like Mrs. Sorel and her late visitor—so good and calm and lofty-minded—can calm and firm and gentle now—wondering, wondering! And Alice, too, so silent and quiet.

And so it comes back with a start to the fact that the Federals are coming, and that she must meet them with the dignity and quiet scorn which becomes South Carolina when Yankees are in question.

And Alice? Conscious all along of Mr. Arthur keeping watch round the place; now glowing with her mother in heroic resolve; now mourning that it is such things as Secession and Slavery that make the heroic about; imagining to herself one Great Republic rending these twin curses out of its bosom, and lifting itself free, strong, and noble henceforth! But it is we, the South, who are being whipped, subjugated. And so she wanders about in the same bramble, now with welcome thorns, tearing in thought now to the right, now to the left, as upon tufts of turf in a morass, upon the intermediate spot—a type of the matter, but with firmer foot, in straighter course than before, not unconscious of broadening light ahead.

Had it come to pass, Colonel Brooks himself Mrs. Sorel would have been less surprised than she was with Brother Barker, not two hours after Mr. Arthur's leaving, presents himself before her, after most violent protestations on the part of all Huff at the front gate and along the walk—even Cuff scenting trouble abroad to-night, and vigilant accordingly.

"Ah, Sorel!" said he as has her hand in his before she can believe her eyes—"hope you are well? And the family too? And this is your little boy, Rocky, I believe?" Retaining Mrs. Sorel's hand with his right, he takes Bobby's with his left, and so establishes double rapport with the household.

"What a fine little fellow—sober as a judge! The truth is"—another shake of both the hands in his own—"Sorel, Brother Arthur in town, and have returned his horse for him. Please have him put up; and it would be well to tell your servants, you, girl!—not to let the boy give him too much corn. Mr. Arthur rode him rather violently." Another shake of the hand for both and releasing them. Then the visitor, placing his hat upon the table, takes a seat, and adds: "From long experience, Sister Sorel, I have never yet failed to find a horse when too warm. All are well, you say? Pleased to learn it. Excuse you a moment?—certainly."

For it is Mrs. Sorel's fine thought to have Robby out of the room, and impress upon his youthful mind the two things: First, not to mention the strange message given him, nor to allude to it in any way.

"You, girl, do you think I don't know?" says Robby, with as much indignation as is consistent with respect.

"Yes, girl, to the next injunction—to be polite to their new visitor, and to keep silence generally. "But the best way is for me to go to bed. Which, with a kiss to his mother, he forthwith does.

Immediately on her re-entering the room, her emotions, singularly like those of Mrs. Brooks with her visitor, Brother Barker informs her where he met and left Mr. Arthur—for whom, it seems, there was a sad tone of voice, the more comer has an affection rather more than merely fraternal. And so, with briefest possible allusion to the expected raid, Mr. Barker requests and obtains a bed—Mr. Arthur's—for the night.

"In case any armed men should visit the house during the night"—he lingers behind with his candle to say to his hostess, who has hardly opened her lips—"I know you will not mention the fact of my being concealed here. As a minister of the Gospel, Sister Sorel, an humble preacher of peace, I desire to hold myself utterly aloof from all scenes of violence and strife. My life is in your hands, my sister; but I am not a Sisera, I am pleased to say, nor even as a murderous Jael."

Nor does the sudden guest, over "the dish of butter and milk," furnished him by his harmless Jael next morning—the night having passed without event, save the uninterrupted barking of Cuff, assisted by all the other dogs on the place, at the perpetual passing of travellers—have any thing to say except to dwell upon the horrors of war in general, the absolute inconsistency of the same with Christianity in particular, and, finally, the sunken as by long illness, to say nothing of sallowness of visage, show how little sleep he has found that night. Mr. Arthur! Alice. How, however, we were all of us wide awake that night in Somerville.

Robby, with lips visibly sealed, places the Bible upon the table after breakfast is over, from force of invariable habit; the decent servants gather in at sound of it. Mrs. Sorel reads, and requests their guest to take Mr. Arthur's place, and lead in worship.

"We are most singing, if you please," says Brother Barker, after reading the first Scripture which comes up: "my voice is somewhat out of tune, my throat hoarse. And having prayed for every possible blessing upon that particular household, with general supplication for the whole country, Mr. Barker hastens through that exercise.

"If it is not too great a favor, Sister Sorel: if you will give your servants some charge to keep silence: if you will allow me to occupy Brother Arthur's room, I should be grateful—and it to be his by the books then—I will be obliged." And the guest disappears within that room, the curtain of which he has arranged with a view to appears again at the sound of a galloping along the road.

"Sister Sorel," he says, bending, with ashy face, over that silent lady as she sits at the table washing up the cups and saucers, "I have reason to know that they are the Federals, and have now the foe may be on my track. I am—am" —the galloping outside louder and louder—"not a soldier, I am"—with a look of unspeakable pain and sallowest of faces—"a poor, humble preacher of the blessed Gospel of peace. My life is in your hands, my blood will be upon your head."

"Mr. Barker, go to Mr. Arthur's room and remain there. Any thing as old woman may be able to do for you I will do. You have no cause of apprehension."

And in his room Brother Barker, on tiptoe, trying to read, trying to pray, tucking the curtain so as to conceal himself from any one passing, listening, trembling, enduring such agonies of fear as want him like a madhouse.

Mrs. Warner, peeping forth that morning, finds the Federals in quiet possession of Somerville. Not a shop-window remains unbroken, but Mrs. Warner has said, a very great number of times, that she only wished the Yankee mudsills would break in, that she might break it; and the throat that she might cut it; one heart that she "might wish to see bleeding." Mrs. Warner, in short, is carving at table as she speaks, into their heart to the hilt. Touchstone's complete destruction in words, as for Dr. Syntax, sometimes recurred upon the knots in the string of his bag; Romish anathema in full, so far as her knowledge of the language furnished her with terms, but that intellect with the thoughts, her imagination with the possibilities, her heart with the zeal, has Mrs. Warner long ago overcome the Federals upon the Federals. No Mrs. Partington has ever swept away the Atlantic more vigorously, in anticipation, than her Mrs. Warner has swept, in what is actually over her threshold the mop fails her wearied hand. She has so exhausted herself before their arrival that she has no reserve for any thing, except curiosity, now they have actually come. Probably this is the reason why she does not burn her house over their heads, as she said she would do. She has ample opportunity of shooting at them from her windows, she has almost whom she would, yet she merely peeps at them instead.

Friday night they take possession. All Saturday and Sunday all seem in possession of the one male Secessionist visible. Union men quiet as mice. Guy Brooks need have sent no messenge to that effect.

The stores are all closed. Somerville has long ago learned to do that when even Confederate soldiers are in the streets, much more when over again have squads, half-naked, two-thirds starved, four-fourths desperate, helped themselves to what they will. Somerville has learned what they wanted, a good deal more than they could consume. It shocked us terribly at first, but Mr. Ellis and the rest of us have become used to it. Only three days before the raid of Colonel Fuller. That was speaking of it to Colonel Ret Roberts in his own house, and his family from his duties in Richmond.

"Colonel Roberts," said Mr. Ellis to that distinguished Senator, "has my store been sacked by ruffian soldiers?"

"And my house—probably will be a dozen times again," said the Colonel, very coolly indeed. If Colonel Ret Roberts was a splendid blackguard, a brilliant bully, a fascinating, high-spirited, thoroughly plain-spoken scoundrel before the schooling of the last few years, tell us, oh whatever of gay humor, of sarcastic voice, the mere cynosure is the Muse of History, what Colonel Ret Roberts is now!

"And my house" says Mr. Ellis; "look at it, Sir. I pay two and a half per cent. on my sales every three months; one per cent. more for soldiers' tax; five per cent. on all real estate; eight per cent. on all the wool, tobacco, cotton I had on hand in '63; ten per cent. on profit on sales. Let me see! Yes, I am taxed as a retail merchant, taxed over again as a wholesale merchant. And all this while my Corporation, County, State taxes are at least one hundred per cent. heavier than they were before the war."

"Certainly. But you may rest sure the taxes now are nothing to what they will be next year," says Colonel Ret Roberts, as coolly as if stating a desirable fact, with a sort of pleasure even.

"But have you nothing encouraging to tell us?" asks Mr. Ellis, nervously. "Your opportunities at Richmond—"

"I know nothing but what you read in the papers," remarks the Senator, elaborately paring his finger-nails, "save what we heard me from the stump, Sir. If you people at home will sustain the currency, the South will succeed. If you do not, Sir, the South will fail, as well as I whether they will sustain it. We are in this thing; all of us, as a family. We can win. Hold on, Lamum!" to that editor, who is passing, and the distinguished Senator is gone.

An excellent Unionist organized, contempt Colonel Ret Roberts had for the people before Secession; his contempt now is so great that it is not to be expressed. He is elected for years to the Confederate Senate, entirely beyond the favor of the people. They stand so astounded at his cool impudence in public and private that he has left again for Richmond before they have time to recover themselves.

And Sabbath dawns upon Somerville still in Federal occupation, the quietness of death upon the population peeping from behind doors and curtains upon the long, cavalry passing and repassing. After full conference with friends, a Federal chaplain descrating Brother Barker's pulpit, and Sabbath beside his own in Somerville open that day, Mr. Arthur fills his own pulpit, his sermon being exactly the same as they would have had it there been no raid. Quite a large congregation too, to Mr. Arthur's surprise; almost all ladies. Mr. Ferguson sings as usual, and leads in manner as if were he were confined to the Crimea and like distant regions. And the Federal officers and men, upon the ladies cause to say, were quiet, orderly.

"Nothing remarkable at last, every thing extremely well," Mrs. Warner, at church for the first time in many months, remarks, as she and the Doctor walk home. And, beside a little knot of the men who have tamely permitted the Yankees to come here, Mrs. Warner is strikingly silent to-day.

"If the Colonel Brooks was not coming to church I wouldn't have gone, I can tell you. Have you seen him yet, Dr. Warner? Mighty shy you Union men are of your Federal friends, and they of you! As if I don't know the reason why. You all had better be, I will you; if our men are not more miserable cowards than they are I—there's plenty of women left in Somerville to watch you. Did you notice that Mrs. Isaac Smith, at church, at whose husband has gone over to the Yankees? I watched at her heels, and she never looked at a Federal, but presply to look at these Federal wretches, looking wistfully at them—expected to see her husband among them, I suppose. As I live, there he is this moment going into that Jem Budd—even 'Ria could tell what that is for!"

It was true. Mrs. Isaac Smith had never made a visit since her husband fled. She has only a general invitation made her years before to the house of Jem Budd's poor, down-trodden wife; yet there she is this moment, in Sunday finery long laid aside, entering the door in question. Mrs. Warner's eye-glance is all at a glance. Jem Budd's little one-story house is right on the most public street in Somerville; its front porch is so public that it may be the town to see all that can be seen of the Federal troops.

Besides, Jem Budd and Jem Budd's harmless little wife have always been to the one side of the great question which rends Somerville asunder but also to the other. Secessionists say of Jem: "Poor fellow! he is a queer sort of fellow, but he is all right at heart. He doesn't talk much, but he has said this, that, and the other exceedingly severe things about slavery, and especially about the Union people. And then Alfred Morgan, Mrs. Budd's brother, who left for the war as a private, and who is now in a good Secessionist, in dangerous and efficient service for the Confederacy in the North. Jem doesn't say much of it, but he has shown letters from Alf to that effect. Oh, Jem is all right!"

"You can't change a man's nature," Union people say to each other of Jem Budd. "Of course it's his interest to keep well with the faithful; it's the only way to hold his detail to fix shoes and stay at home. But he is all Know-Jem, Jem can't help that. But we all know Jem. He's told me in confidence a thousand times a most detailed account of Secession." There are severe disadvantages in Jem's course. Neither party were thoroughly cordial with him. Besides, for Jem's money these women were weapons, and he can not refuse to give when called on to assist Union families suffering for the necessaries of life in the absence of their husbands. For more impossible to refuse his mite when called on to assist every other week, to contribute to some war purpose or other. He has to pay for his position, but he holds it and his tongue accordingly.

"I took a lunch just before coming to church, ma'am; please excuse me. But you know my house is out of the way, and I am dying to see the Federals. If you have no objection," Mrs. Isaac Smith says to little pale Mrs. Budd, who lives in her own house as closely as a snail, and keeps no servant, and who, a good deal astonished at the apparition of stout Mrs. Smith, whom she has not seen for so long, invites her from the parlor in to dinner.

It is all very well when, dinner over, Jem Budd smoking his pipe in one corner of the fireplace for the convenience of spitting, Mrs. Budd opposite him in her easy-chair, Mrs. Isaac Smith filling with her nerfy portion the chasm between, the three fall into a quiet, confidential chat. At least Mrs. Isaac Smith, greatly freshened up by the blue shirts she has seen at church, talks, and the others listen.

First, she tells all she has seen and heard at church, for Mr. and Mrs. Budd have not entered any church for years now; Jem Budd, a member of Brother Barker's church, too. Next, Mrs. Isaac Smith, by natural transition, speaks of Mr. Arthur; to all of which, Jem Budd, on one side, saying "Exactly" when Mrs. S. appeals to him; pale Mrs. Budd, on the other side, says, when she is appealed to, "Just so, ma'am." By natural transition, too, Brother Barker is next on the carpet. Mrs. Isaac Smith never warms as she recounts some of that divine's violent remarks in and out of the pulpit. To this, also, Mr. Budd, when directly appealed to in his sentiments, says "Precisely," and Mrs. Budd, "Just so you say, ma'am." Then Mrs. Isaac Smith asks in general terms after Mrs. Budd's absent brother. She has heard what a bitter Secessionist he has become, how actively and warmly he work for the Confederacy he is at the North. So she asks after him as under a sort of protest. At the North means nothing, and well, we have heard from, is all Jem and his wife can inform her on that point.

After every thing, day and night, flowing in one channel, her husband who is away, Mrs. S. tells for the ten thousandth time that Isaac would never have left if it wasn't for being forcing him into the army. Isaac has his faults—who of us has not? Isaac is a peaceful man—didn't want to fight on either side if he could help it. But Isaac could not fight for what he believed to be a wicked—rebellion; Mrs. S. rather hesitates between bringing in this last—and, no. Jem Budd only replies, "As you say, ma'am," while her husband merely puffs another cloud of smoke, and adds, to the total eyes of Mrs. Isaac directed to him, "Exactly so."

Like other large bodies broad Mrs. Smith is not easily aggregated; but once started, momentum being in proportion to weight, it is very hard for her to stop.

"Of course you have heard of how they murdered my brother John Jennings?" she asks of Mrs. Budd.

"Goodness gracious, what's that?" she adds in the same breath.

"That! What?" asks Jem, nervously, while poor Mrs. Budd is several degrees paler than before.

"Has! must have been mistaken, of course, thought I heard somebody under the floor. But I am so nervous!" says Mrs. Smith.

"Thought you heard somebody under the floor!" and Mr. Budd exclaims this in singularly loud tones, as if addressed to some one at a distance, and resumes his pipe.

"Your brother, ma'am? there are so many murdered, you know, one can not remember exactly," says little Mrs. Budd, quickly, quick-ened a good deal by the overflowing warmth of her visitor by this time. Mr. Budd smokes with inquiring calm. And so Mrs. Smith enters on the murder, describes it minutely, tells the destitute condition of the family left—all with such a tender eloquence that Mrs. Budd and Jem Budd is affected. So much so that when Mrs. Smith says at last, suddenly, "You know John Jennings well, Mrs. Budd; you must, for he only told you the truth; now what do you think of a cause which permits, even justifies such a thing as that?" Mrs. Budd removes the pipe from his mouth and begins:

"So sure as there is a God in heaven, ma'am—"

"Jem! I—I hear!" interrupts a voice from the other side with a cry, and holding up a warning hand.

And well it is for Mr. Budd. Though his wife does not know it, there is a tap upon the door, and in walks—of all persons in the world —Mrs. Smithers!

Mrs. Smithers! We write the word reluctantly, knowing how hopeless it is to portray her upon the page. Let us see what one surviving that she was a very tall, a very long and red in the face, a very violent female in temper and language will do. Mrs. Smithers, before she knows all six of them, as desperadoes who have long ago killed their men. Mrs. Smithers is said to be a good shot with rifle and pistol shot-gun, revolver. The way Mrs. Smithers is known, with her own boys' hands, to swindle the erring men women, has weakened even Mrs. Warner's reprobation. Her nearest neighbors are exceeding respectful to, and shy of, Mrs. Smithers, not knowing what instant chickens from their yard into her garden, or a quarrel between her children and theirs, may bring her down upon them with such deadly weapon, or more deadly tongue. As to her having hurled, in a paroxysm of rage, that negro babe which would keep crying so much upon her every-second floor, down the hill back of the house, we reject that story of course, knowing, as we all do, that such testimony is no evidence.

But we knew we could convey no adequate idea of Mrs. Smithers to the postmaster's wife, when we began. Mr. Jem Budd had such an idea, however, and the instant she entered the room he uttered a word. "Where" none the less arrested from being altogether internal. Publicly, meeting them on the street, had Mrs. Smithers treated one and another of the subjects now in one Union man of her previous acquaintance. The Union ladies, met by her casually in stores and at funerals, she had not ventured to herself with refusing to speak to, but had looked at them in a way which had sent more than one of them from shopping and visiting home and to bed. Being of a fighting stock, Mrs. Smithers was true to the breed—even her brothers, with many an oath, admitted that.

As Mrs. Smithers entered, offensively ignored the existence of Mrs. Isaac Smith, and took the hand and the seat which poor, pale little Mrs.

Budd offered her, Mr. Budd saluted her and withdrew; remembered in the hall the feeble state of his wife's health and returned; really could not risk it, when back in the parlor, and entered; fear, with half-way out of his front gate, that his wife might faint, perhaps die, and so return again. He has an inspiration, he will effect a diversion.

"Bad news I hear this morning," he begins, after the usual salutations are over—Mrs. Isaac Smith will not. Mrs. Budd can not speak, nothing left for him. As the husband will be, to the head of the household, the only chance is to keep the conversation in his own hand till out of the visitors' hall-depart—any subject on earth rather than of the Federals just arrived.

"What news is that, Mr. Budd?" asks Mrs. Smithers, vivaciously. "It's a lie," in the corners of her eyes and upon the tip of her tongue.

And having mentioned it simply that, being repressed in his mind, it came first in the hurry of being compelled to say something instantly, Mr. Jem Budd narrates the fact of the suicide of the Liberal Judge of a Southern State. For had Mr. Ferguson been so interested in the occupation of Somerville as not, that very day, to have entered the same in his Scrap-book. Had he not foretold it?

"Drunk or crazy," is the verdict of Mrs. Smithers, refusing to know it is only that.

Jem Budd, toiling more vigorously for another topic than he ever does upon gun-lock or barrel-stumbles upon the one of the refugees. Tells how they are pouring into the region about Somerville; how poor they are, how sorry-looking as well as that they ever abandoned their old homes; thinks it a great shame people should receive them coldly.

"Serve them right. Why didn't they stay where they were and fight the Yankees?" is Mrs. Smithers' opinion, who gives only half attention to her host, casting about in her mind how best and soonest to assault Mrs. Isaac Smith.

"Have you noticed, Mr. Budd," asks Mrs. Isaac Smith, advancing her skirmishers, "how all the papers agree about the swindling going on by Government officials? Every single paper! Charges made by judges, findings by grand juries and by little juries, every body but it, universal corruption and swindling. From the highest to the lowest, all the officials at it, by the papers say." Because the lady speaker has heard rumor of the remarks made in reference to herself by the tigress at her side—infinitely more than that, the very epithets—the wish of Mrs. Smithers has come to her ears, to hang that red-headed painter, Smith, abolitionist and traitor, with her own hands. For the least shrewd linger in the mind of any of Mrs. Smithers's circle of friends but she would to just that thing if she had but the chance.

"I know noticed it, ma'am," says sorely-perplexed Mr. Budd, "but have thought"—with special reference to Mrs. Smithers—"our people ought not to publish such things at this time."

"I suppose you notice, Mrs. Budd, how sick even the Yankees are, from their own papers, with that vile Lincoln! All we have to do is to keep whipping them till his term is out; they'll be too glad to make peace with us then, if they don't have a revolution among themselves before that," says Mrs. Smithers.

Mr. and Mrs. Budd retaining their seats on opposite corners of the fire-place, the two visitors between them, Mrs. Isaac Smith being next to Mrs. Budd, Mrs. Smithers to Mr. Budd; Mrs. Smith having addressed her remarks in reference to the refugees across Mrs. Smithers to Mr. Budd, in contempt of that lady, Mrs. Smithers addresses, of course, her conversation across portly Mrs. Smith, and in utter ignorance of the existence of Mrs. Budd. Conversation will become platted together in this way, even in ordinary times and under friendly auspices all round; how it is hard at times for the troubles thus engaged to keep their threads of talk untangled. It is peculiarly difficult to-day in Jem Budd's parlor.

"As you say, ma'am," pale little Mrs. Budd replies, across Mrs. Smith to Mrs. Smithers.

"But isn't it strange, Mr. Budd, people won't take Confederate money? It's the most marketable trash, no better than brown paper!" says Mrs. Smith, across Mrs. Smithers.

"—and they actually force the miserable people to take their greenbacks at the point of the bayonet!" continues Mrs. Smithers to Mrs. Budd, heating with indignation at Mr. Budd's bare "I suppose, ma'am," in reply to her interlocutor, disregarding the "So I've heard, ma'am," which she gets from hers.

"—and actually believe what I hear every day of how poor people are getting among us. A good many can't send their children to Sabbath-school, day-school either, for want of clothes. Can't even put their foot out of their own yard themselves. What a terrible condition we are—"

"—universal infidelity there now, ma'am," from Mrs. Smithers, drowns Mr. Budd's "Tis, indeed!"

"—that, of course, is worse. Backsliding? Worse than that, Mr. Budd! Open gambling, drinking, swearing, stealing, and worse. The preachers themselves—"

"—because the Union people among us know the awful times which are coming. I'm told, Mr. Budd, the people driven off are sworn to kill every—" from Mrs. Isaac Smith, while the "As you say, ma'am," from Mr. Budd and the "I fear so, indeed," from Mrs. Budd are made no account of by either belligerent as the strife grows hotter.

"—even to the last drop of our blood, ma'am, and if the war should last ten thousand—"

"—and it was kept up only by the women, and especially the Secession preachers at home. The army is sick enough of it, you may be sure. Why, Mr. Budd, I go a letter, I mean a person told me—"

"—for of all things in this world, ma'am, a traitor to one's own soil they were born on, and a she-traitor is a thing I do—"

"—always so, Mr. Budd," Yankee Secessionists are the meanest, just as Yankee masters and mistresses are the hardest upon their poor negroes."

The conversation becomes more tangled as it becomes more personal.

Mr. Budd has first hold of the pipe between his teeth, long since gone out, and only repeats his "Precisely so, Exactly, ma'am," from memory. Mrs. Budd, poor, pale, little rabbit of Mrs. Budd, with firm hold upon the arms of her easy-chair, fascinated by Mrs. Smithers's terrible eye, has not even learn what she has escaped being asays than if she was dead, only is conscious of a steady rattle of words, and gasps her affirmatives at regular intervals.

But the conversation becomes more closely welded together as it heats.

"Quarter!"

"Beast Butler."

"Wretched Republican."

"Despicable Gorilla."

"Who wouldn't get fat as a beef, ma'am, when one is rid of a drunken husband?"

"Sir, Mr. Budd, will endure murderers."

"Used to lie dead drunk, ma'am."

"Has swindled with sugar speculations unfil—"

"Abolitionist, who ought to be—"

"Actually whipped her, Mr. Budd, until the bones—"

Mr. Budd closes his teeth harder on his pipestem, Mrs. Budd clutches her cold fists at the ears of her chair, the catastrophe must be near—

A long clear bugle blast out of doors! Mr. Jem Budd starts to his feet.

"The Federal cavalry, ladies!" and hurries out of his front-door, in a manner washing with extended arms his negro servants before him upon the front porch, leaving Mrs. Budd utterly exhausted in her easy-chair behind. And if the company had not made up their minds and been in so great haste in leaving the room they would have heard a distinct sound from beneath the floor upon which they were. For there has been a mouse or a bat. It did not sound like hog or dog. Perhaps a parrot had made his hole there, for it sounded exactly like the words "God! Thank God!" What makes it strangest of all is, that Mrs. Budd, the instant she is alone, is on her knees on the floor, with white cheeks, says in low, sharp tones, "For God's sake, Alf, be quiet," her lips almost touching the carpet.

The Federal cavalry coming up the street at a slow walk, and so very many, apparently, rough, bearded, powerful men, that Jem, returning in the future of a military manner than such Confederate soldiers as we have seen. Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Smithers stand, side by side, upon the elevated porch, both thrilling with deepest feeling, but of quite a different nature. Guy Democrat—erect, with more pride than in appearance than ever—rides slowly and at the head of the column. As he approaches, his eye catches that of Mrs. Isaac Smith. So far he has carefully avoided speaking to any of the Union people, for the best of reasons. There is something in her broad, handsome face, genuine so wistful in her eyes, that he forgets himself, and salutes her. Just a scarce-perceptible lift of the forefinger of the gauntleted hand to the cap.

It is the drop too much. Bless you! Mrs. Isaac Smith has been in the School of Prudence all these years since Isaac left, for nothing. She had resolved to be prudent before she left home; she had left Mrs. Smithers over and over again. "Oh, I'll be careful, Sarah, you never fear." She had even practised in every prayer, kneeling by her bed that morning, after she had put on her best bonnet and all, that she might be prudent. But Mrs. Smithers in the regiment with Mrs. Smithers has "overheat" her, as she afterward explains the matter. As Colonel Brooks touches his cap, Mrs. Smithers, from the parlor, snatches from prostrate Mrs. Budd her handkerchief—she had left her own, to avoid the temptation, at home—and, standing beside Mrs. Smithers, waves it to the Federals, continues waving it vehemently!—the tears running copiously down her handsome cheeks.

But if she waves her handkerchief at the Federals, Mrs. Smithers, advancing to the extreme edge of the porch, shakes her fist at them; a long arm has tall, red, hard-featured Mrs. Smithers, and a fist that has knocked many a negro child over, as well as one, for that matter. Handkerchief and fist so energetically flourished, side by side, send a peal of laughter down the column—even Guy Brooks finds it right.

But Mrs. Smith has not farewell to her wits. "They've murdered Hal Robbins, Mr. Brooks; they've hung John Jennings! you knew him, Mr. Brooks—old John Jennings, my own brother! Ge' God's curse on them! won't they sway above us!" she cries, with the cry of anguish peculiar to a woman beside, say, a drowning child. Handkerchief hard at work.

"Tut-tratior! Tut-traitor! Tut-traitor!" screams Mrs. Smithers, with the yell of fun peculiar to a furious female in her fiercest fury; fist shaken almost to dislocation.

"May God bless you!" cries Mrs. Isaac Smith, her entire soul as well as body in each separate word.

"May the devil—" But the rest of Mrs. Smithers's wish, though in the highest and shrillest of screams, is drowned in the cheer for Mrs. Smith, which rings once again, again, down the column, every man of whom by this time enters into the spirit of the thing.

It is full half an hour after both their lady visitors are gone that Jem and his wife can realize it all.

"That it should have taken place of all the houses in Somerville at my house!" said Jem Budd to himself over and over and over again; "and when I've worked so hard ever since the thing began to keep well with both sides. It is too bad!"

Mrs. Budd has long since gone to bed seriously ill.

"But I don't blame her a bit, not one bit either," adds Jem just as often, strictly to himself over the pillow-case, "and even then to be sure no one is by, though it is midnight, and Jem is in his own chamber. His reference is to Mrs. Isaac Smith.

He then falls upon his knees, although not, it would seem, for devotional purposes. With his face to the floor he says,

"Had plenty of supper, Alf?"

"Plenty, Jem," from below. It must be a parrot.

"Good-night, old fellow! Fun, wasn't it?"

"Guess it was. Good-night!" from below again.

"Remind me, Mr. Smithers, to take my Derringer with me to-morrow. I go out," says Mr. Smithers to her husband that night in conclusion. "If ever I meet that woman I'll spit in her round face and shoot her, as sure as my name is Araminty. If she says a word to that, I'll put a bullet just as deep into her old carcass as the Yankees put into my brother's."

"Needn't talk to me, Sarah Jennings, child. I didn't intend it when I went to church this morning. Intended to go out. And, what is more, I don't care one single cent. Let them hang me if they want to, like they hung your Hal. It's in my power, God knows. I'm tired of my life any way, Jane gone so long. Humph, but only let her try it! But oh, won't we settle it when these people of the old flag is here again for good! Not that I want their life; may the Lord forgive me, no!"

As to Mr. Ferguson, when, on Monday morning, he tugs out the Scrap-book from its hidden rest in the iron safe, to the bullet's arrival of the day before on the previous Friday night he has to add their leaving during Sunday night. It is a week or two before he can obtain an accurate statement of the number of negroes and Confederate stores they have taken away with them. One thing he knows, a full and silent drawing the whole raid as the Sphinx at midnight—no one can touch him for it; not a word, gesture, look, to the end of their days.

But it seemed strange to Robby, riding a week after upon his pony past Staples's Hotel, to hear the way in which Dr. Peck, absent on pressing business from Somerville a fortnight now, curses the Federals, and Guy Brooks especially. Yet Robby only saw the latter face to face still more sober silence, and rides about his errand, earnestly hoping he may not have to engage in another fight for a long time.

And so Somerville gets past that point in its history.

ROME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Anyone the many caprices of the fickle goddess of Fashion is worth remarking that she did not sometimes, by chance, light upon some vagary, by which she commended herself to the best taste of the most refined minds and hitherto, even more than to her especial votaries—the ladies. The fact is that "Queen of creation" have learned by dear experience that "the fashion doth not become them" more than the man," Shakspeare has it; but they regard the latter word as a term of endearment." It will therefore undoubtedly be a prospective comfort to those much-abused gentlemen to learn that they will shortly appear to be the sudden desire of the leaders of Fashion in Paris to adopt the greatest variety in all things appertaining to their toilets. Many members of aristocratic circles regret that they have spent such fabulous sums of money on the most extravagant fashions which were popular during the past winter, and with repentance cause the wise ones to cast aside their costly attire, and to dress elegantly without any large outlay. How long-lived this revolution may be is uncertain, but it is said that a very striking change appears in the toilets of those ladies whose dress is certain to be a subject of comment wherever they appear. Thus, at a certain princess, who, in Paris, goes by the name of the Charming Queen of Fashion, the parlor suddenly, the simplest toilet, such as a very plain untrimmed muhair or poplin jacket and skirt, the latter looped up over either a blue or mauve silk petticoat. Velvet has been below the rank of princesses are permitted to adopt a like simple style is not stated.

It may infer that this is derived from the fact that at the present season preference is given to white, either for home or ball dresses; and that these white dresses are to be trimmed with "elegant simplicity." Beyond this—a sympathies with the Federal cause—all that is known as to the fashion—there has come across the writer no positive proof that the "simple style" has reached as yet. Of the ball dresses, it is said that the most walking-dresses are made of grey-colored silks, and are embroidered with steel. Some dresses are composed of red and brown beads, and upon cerise silk as favorite color just now they are brilliant enough. Another toilet consists of a white silk dress with stripes, the sole ornaments on the skirt being silver buttons of open filigree work, and round the corsage a handsome silk fringe, with silver hanging buttons at the top of it, and a silver tassel at every point of the fringe. The sleeves are open at the back from the elbow, dotted over with blue or pink flowers, trimmed all up the skirt with rows of fringe quipure over colored ribbon put on in transverse folds, and terminated in the length of the pieces. The corsage imitated with a band and ornaments to quipure, fringe, and buttons. A white tulle dress beneath sounds round the lower half of the skirt; a low cash-bodice, made of straw-colored silk—the cost was vandyked, and the vandykes slashed together again with straw satin pipings; a deep flounce of point d'Angleterre was sewn all round the cost; a narrow bouillonnée of white tulle replaced the berthe round the shoulders. The head-dress was composed of straw-colored silk and tulle.

It is also announced that the latest new Parisian bonnet is to be shape not unlike the Spanish mantilla used in some of the comic operas; in other words, Don Quixote's helmet, stuck squarely on the top of the wearer's head, like the cover of a dinner-pot. It is fastened to its place by means of ribbons about as wide as your two hands, and tied under the chin, forming a gigantic bow, rather larger than the bow of a moderate-sized Zizling-tailor. There is, by way of variety, the inverted-breakfastaire style, trimmed with every thing and any thing, and two strings to hold it on; the round-shouldered-headdress style, either with or without the little round button at the top; the fancy-work basket style; the table-mat style—oval, and oblong, all trimmed and bedizened with glass, or straw, or lace, or birds, or feathers, or flowers; or all three put together.

Finally, it is reported that the fashionable women in Paris are actually now wearing crinolines the springs of which are made of pure gold and silver, have now taken a fancy to have their heads plated with the same precious metals.

New York ladies may be able to discover the "great simplicity" which threatens Paris in some of the above fashions.

The managers of the "New York Young Men's Christian Association"—earnest and accomplished young men, whose time and money have been freely given for the benefit of those less favored than—are endeavoring to increase their means for the purpose of erecting a building in which will be provided, to offer special attractions to the young men of this city. Their design includes a Lecture Room, Reading Room, Circulating and Reference Libraries, Conversation Rooms, a Gymnasium, and other means of recreation and amusement. Such a house could not fail to become a general place of resort. For its erection and endowment they ask the sum of $150,000. There are thousands of young men in our midst fatherless, and in the true sense of the word homeless, who are thrown upon their own resources for employment and for the enjoyment of their leisure time. Money could not be better employed than in providing attractive rooms and buildings, and recreation, books, newspapers, magazines, etc., might be freely enjoyed by that large class, who only need a little sympathy and friendly guidance to make them a more truly congenial to them than are the haunts of vice and dissipation.

The Woodland Cemetery referred to in the item we gave our readers a few weeks ago concerning Philip Empey is in Cambridge, Washington County, New York. The removal of Empey's remains to that cemetery was made by order of the Troy Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which recently held its session at Cambridge.

The third Choral Festival, which took place at Irving Hall on last Saturday afternoon, attracted a large and appreciative audience. The choir of one hundred voices, forming when in any of the finest boy-sopranos in America, produce a charming effect. The pure, fresh, young voices appear to have something refined about them. Haydn's chorus, "Then round about the starry throne," was unfortunately not given well. The "Gloria" sung by three soprano without accompaniment, as well as the aria, solo, by Master Tooker, were exceedingly fine. Mendelssohn's "Hymn" was very peculiarly beautiful. So also was the solo by Master Grandin, from Handel's "Messiah." Many other selections were finely rendered, and the descriptive lecture on Cathedrals added to the interest of the entertainment.

If such choral festivals could be frequently repeated, as that not only mere musical amateurs could attend, but that the representatives of the Public and Parish and Sunday Schools, and also the children who are under their training, would give a favorable impetus to the musical taste of our city. Many valuable ideas would thereby be gained which might be applied with great advantage in the cultivation of children's voices.

May in the farmer's hope-time—how he casts the seed into the fruitful earth, and with the full confidence of the autumn harvest. He may sing with a glad heart the following lines, which, like the sky, are of no uniform origin. For a London journal gives a description of a venerable relic of antiquity in the shape of an earthen pitcher or sovereign's drinking cup. And also the curious enthemastic representations of farming implements which adorned it in the following manner:

"Let the wealthy and great
Roll in splendor and state,
I envy them not, I declare,
I eat my own lamb,
My own chicken and ham;
I thrar my own fleece and I wear it.
I've a cot beside Lovers, I have riches,
I have fruits, I have flowers.
The sky is my tent where I recline
So jolly boys, now,
Here's to the good plow.
Long life and success to the farmer!"

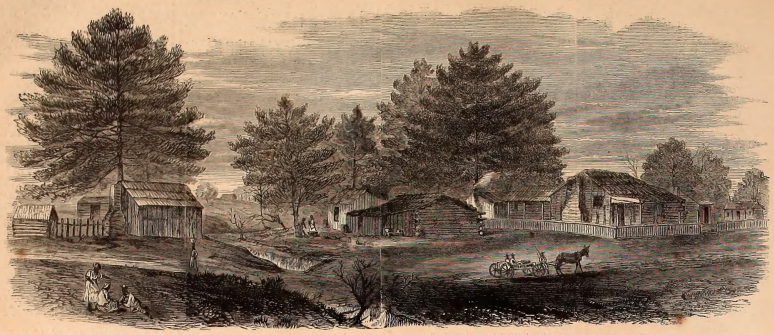
Mr. George Peabody, of Danvers, Massachusetts, his native town, and to the city of Baltimore, amount to the sum of $250,000, while his donations for the benefit of the poor of London will up to the magnificent sum of $850,000 sterling. It is no small satisfaction that it is to the American in England is indebted for the greatest boon ever given to the poor of London.

A new style of announcing marriages seems to be coming into vogue. It is one we may be informed by the following quotation from a North Carolina paper:

"By Dr. J. A. Mitchell, on Wednesday evening, February 28, 1866, in Catawba County, North Carolina, at the house of Mr. Jacob Hollar, Mr. Calvin Hollar to Miss Lizzie Milligan, after a short but most delicious courting."

The writer says, emphatically perhaps—we leave the reader to judge—that

"The world buds every year,
Buds as fair as ever were,
But the blossom falls off soon
And the withered leaf comes again."



If the term "Asses" be used generically in this case, we must admit that the exception of Mr. Peabody, and, especially it may be true, since a poet of undoubted authority says of woman:

"—a woman's second passion e'er can charm;
She loves, and loves forever."

But certain it is that neither of these statement is not the case with Mrs. or else the "heart" of a Michigan farmer, who recently lost his wife, had never budded. It seems that his wife died on a Saturday night, and that he could not fancy being left alone in the world, and immediately decided to follow her. Hitching up his horses, he went in his servant-girl and gone to a neighboring village to buy garments for the dead. While there he met the widow, and determined to his home the same night with his second wife, as that, by actual count, he was not a widower more than a few hours. The marriage ceremony took at the next day in deep black, and was one of the principal ornaments of the wedding party.

The pastor of a fashionable church pathetically says: "Two-thirds of the members of my church are honorary members. They don't come to prayer-meetings; they don't attend Sunday-school; they don't add to the life of the church; they are the passengers on the gospel ship; they bear no burdens; add no strength; their names are on the books; they are honorary members."

It was rather a curious compliment which Voltaire paid to Mademoiselle de Lervy, when he said of her to a friend: "She was so beautiful that I raised my long, thin body and stood before her like a point of admiration."

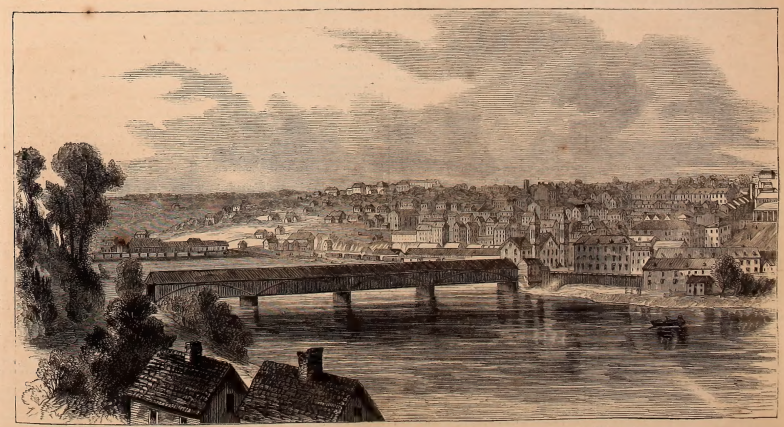
MONTICELLO, THE HOME OF JEFFERSON, NEAR CHARLOTTESVILLE, VIRGINIA.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

OUR ARTIST IN VIRGINIA.

MR. THEO. R. DAVIS, who accompanies General STEEDMAN in his Southern tour, sends us three sketches, from which we have engraved the illustrations on this page.

Lynchburg is situated on the south bank of James River, 191 miles west of Richmond. It is built on the hill-side, and the view from the river is quite picturesque, and would be more so but for the crowding together of the houses. In 1759 this place was a little settlement containing only five houses. It is now the great tobacco city of the Union. It was incorporated in 1805. The city suffered comparatively little from the war. Labor is in great demand; the freedmen are industrious, and the feeling of the whites toward them is in general kindly and sensible. The city of Lynchburg was not occupied until after the capture of Richmond.

Monticello, the home of JEFFERSON, near Charlottesville, is located on the crest of a mountain, the view from which is so quietly beautiful that JEFFERSON called it the "Heavenly Mount." He made this retreat his resting-place after the fatigues of public life. The mansion is fast going to decay; portions of it are in an extremely dilapidated condition. The present occupant charges visitors twenty cents for admission to the premises. The people of Charlottesville certainly can not be held responsible for the ruinous aspect of the home of the "Father of Democracy;" "for," says our artist, "we have not during our journeyings seen a more respectable and industrious community."



JEFFERSON'S TOMB, NEAR CHARLOTTESVILLE, VIRGINIA.—[SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

The slab of JEFFERSON'S tomb is of granite, and is the second one which has been erected, relic-hunters having carried away the first monument chip by chip. They have made some progress in the destruction of the present one. The inclosure is as little cared for as the mansion. Judging from appearances, a few years more will make the ruin of both complete.

SOUTHERN PICTURES.

"THERE is a large class of white men in the South," says our artist, Mr. A. R. W., "who do not work if they can avoid it, and Memphis is well represented in this respect; it is this class that the colored men seem to imitate rather than the industrious. How they live is a mystery. Not a little stealing is done, I suppose, for I have seen white men lurking among the negro huts and purchasing cotton stolen in small quantities from the levees. In some way they manage to pay the rent of their lots, which is often exorbitant. For a piece of land not fifteen feet square as much as ten dollars a month is asked and paid, not in situations, be it remembered, where land is valuable for any present purpose. All do not pay in this proportion, however, and there are not wanting generous people who have procured land and cut it up in small parcels at a reasonable rent.

"The colored people do not care to go out on the plantations, since by draying and working on the levee for 40 cents an hour they can make out a living; and so long as they support themselves it is supposed to be no one's business how much or how little they earn.

"FREEDMEN'S BUREAU, MEMPHIS.

"In this room, containing an army desk and some rude chairs, and principally decorated with hand-bills conveying the information 'that intelligence, or labor brokers—White or Black—entering this building, will be accommodated with 60 days imprisonment,' contracts are signed between the colored men and planters hiring them, and the thousand and one appeals, differences, and complained incident to the present relations of labor, heard and arbitrated, as far as my limited observation went, with strict justice and with no indication of that partial leaning toward the negro which I have heard the Bureau accused of. General ROWLEY, who superintends the department, shows a right clear head in his decisions, which unprejudiced people must admire, singularly in contrast to the injustice meted out sometimes by the civil courts of Memphis. The scene sketched represents a group of negroes and the contractor who had hired them discussing a breach of contract on the part of the latter, who had sold the plantation they were hired to till after the fact had done considerable work upon it, and had then proposed to turn them over to another plantation. The negroes demanded their pay, and the annulment of the contract, on the reasonable grounds that such an arrangement was not included in it nor contemplated by them when it was signed. The white man, the planter—I believe—had the recommendation of the Marshal, agreed to cancel the document. The cases which come before the Bureau are of very various kinds, and are often exceedingly trivial. Some of the negroes have applied to General ROWLEY for permission to carry pistols for personal protection, but he could only tell them that it was unlawful and a privilege out of his power to give, but that while the practice of carrying weapons is universal among the whites they were as much entitled as any to their possession. While I was at the office a negro boy came in who had been hired through its agency by a man some twelve miles from the river, in Arkansas. This boy had run away, his escape, and was applying for protection. According to his statement he had used an oath—not in anger—to another laborer. For this the master had beaten him with a pistol and a heavy stick about the head, inflicting a severe wound, then tying him up had set the dogs upon him, the latter still showing abundant evidence of the sharpness of their teeth. To be sure there was no counter-statement, but the boy gave his testimony clearly and apparently with truthfulness. A planter was there to complain of one of his hands, whom he wanted punished for answering him back by 'What! instead of 'Sir?' At one office I saw a negro whose complaint was against another who was a 'cutting him out' in a love-affair.

"A characteristic case was being fought through by General ROWLEY. JOHN HERRON is a mean specimen, who, among other slaves, owned before the war one HARRY HERRON, some nine miles from Memphis. JOHN HERRON'S estate was within the Union lines. JOHN H. personally found it healthy to reside outside that limit, and made a separate will. PRINCE to work the plantation on shares. PRINCE ran the farm well, fed his master's family through the blockade for two or three years; and when JOHN HERRON got into quiet possession again of his place he repudiated PRINCE'S claims, on the ground that a slave could be no party to a contract under the State laws of Tennessee. It was decided by the Freedmen's Bureau that PRINCE'S claim was just. JOHN appealed to General FISK, who endorsed the decision, and again to General HOWARD, who referred the decision to be enforced. The current this JOHN H. filed an injunction in the Supreme Court, which, I believe, decided against the Freedmen's Bureau. This is a test case of the powers of the Bureau, and it is not likely to give it up yet. The courts of Tennessee are sure to back up the white man against the slave in any case, but there are higher tribunals. The most enlightened men of the South are the officers of the army. As a rule, they are more liberal in their behavior to strangers, and certainly accept the situation with a better grace and more manly bearing than the vindictive non-combatants.

"The negroes know this well, and the consequence is that when General FORREST can get labor to work his lands while the citizen lands of lazy, unimproved planters have to go without. I met a gentleman on the Arkansas who had owned 250 slaves, had served in the war, and now accepted the situation. Instead of sitting gloomily down with the idea that negroes were of no use as freemen, and the country necessarily gone to ruin, he determined to decide the question for himself. He told me that it was doing well: he had already on his place 75 men at work, and when I met him he had engaged 40 more, of a regiment mustered out at Duvall's Bluff; not, it must be added, without opposition from the officers of the regiment, some of whom tried to dissuade the men from contracting with him. This plantation was an excellent one, a place as a negro intending to work could probably find. What better tasks were done then the men could do as they pleased. There was a teacher for them, a good fiddler or two, and every prospect for a jolly Fourth of July, and I have no doubt that this gentleman will make money. Who knows but the negroes, although they may not be induced to work the long hours that were required before freedom, may, on the other hand, quicken their step and learn to do much in shorter time? The old system was to blow the horn so early on the plantation that, by the cotton picking season, the hands would be all out, after cooking and eating breakfast, by the first appearance of light, ready in the rows to commence the work of picking while the dew was so heavy as to drench them from the laden branches almost at once. The first picking would be so wet as to require exposure on the staggings till noon, about which time the sun's heat would dry the clothing of the pickers. This was not a healthy practice for the fall of the year. Dinner, ready cooked, would be brought out in the fields and hurried over. Work was continued as late as 8 o'clock, when the hands would be dismissed for supper. This was a shilling system, and required all the overseer's watchfulness; but the result was an immense profit to the planter.

"Even with the present prospect of remuneration the inducements to plant cotton are great. Eighty hands, it is stated, can easily grow and pick 1000 bales of cotton. These are paid on an average 16 dollars a month and rations, which, at the present prices of cotton, would realize a handsome fortune in one year. Good cotton land will raise 1 bale to the acre, in some places 1½ bales. The introduction of improved agricultural machinery will, in great measure, make up for the low price of labor in the South, for the implements of farming in this section appear to have been modeled upon the primitive efforts of our forefather Adam.

"DOWN THE MISSISSIPPI.

"After the delay usual with steamboat men, in the category of whose virtues that of punctuality is a heretic, our boat left the wharf at the foot of Main at Memphis, and once more among wasted and deserted plantations we continued down the Mississippi. Hardly a plantation could be seen where there were any signs of life, and so on to the White River, which is a deep and narrow channel well adapted for steamboat purposes, as it scarcely varies in hundreds of miles and always has plenty of water. There was so much at this time that all the country adjacent was overflowed, and bank was visible among the trees except at places, few and far between, where the everlasting forest of cypress, gum, and cotton-wood, with its undergrowth of cane, gave way to a bluff.

"On the Mississippi are very few plantations in working order this year; the water in many places has overflowed, and the banks of the river are generally very low, and, in fact, the whole region is in even worse: there are not so many dismantled plantations and burned houses, but the back-water of the Mississippi has done its destructive work in a very slow to quit the fields. On the Mississippi it is not expected that the crop will amount to much; in the interior of the State it will probably about one acre out of four is the amount in cultivation.

"In Arkansas, judging from what I could see, something like half the land is under cultivation. The negroes there appear to be getting along amicably with the planters. The Little Rock Dispatch, which they are generally supposed to read, is moderate, while at the same time the employers show a disposition to pay good prices, and also to feed and treat them well. This is the sunny side of the picture, but away from the highways of travel in Arkansas it is not all couleur de rose. Here is a story of another kind: Some distance from Pine Bluffs, on the Arkansas River, lived a planter whose negroes did not know that they were free, but, on the contrary, had been taught to believe that the North was whipped, and slavery tighter than ever. A runner, however, reached them, and they determined to run for it, not daring to tell their master that they were free. They were all domiciled in a new house the master had built, with no other entrance than through his dwelling. That he locked securely at night, so that they were as good as prisoners. Nevertheless, however, they managed to get out, and to the number of 14, leaving many helpless ones behind, the late slaves started for the river, having provided themselves with means of money—the secret of whose hiding-place one of them knew—and appropriated $150, putting the rest back. A boat came along and they took passage for Memphis, charging them $5 each for passage, but finding them verdant and in possession of more cash, made another charge of $5 each for bed and board before they let them ashore. The woman who gave this narrative had $100 of money, her father's saving in Confederate currency, and she declared that the Yankees were victorious till the Memphis shopkeepers laughed at her money. The rest of the 14 that got away had hired out to a planter for 8? a month and rations.

"One curious thing about freedom is the manner in which it mixes up the relationships of classes of these people. Some of them, owing to the little idea effected by their masters, find themselves with two or three wives and families, and others had husbands sometimes claim one wife. Indeed, they are not just beginning to understand the real obligation of matrimony.

"North Alabama appears to keep up its reputation as a distinguished section. The people are poor and do not work, and the country is poor, and the people, being mostly worked-out soil. The intellectual condition of the white and blacks in this country is about on a par; and very little improvement is likely to take place in the negro till the white race are educated to a higher development.

"CHURCH AT CRAWFORD'S.

"On a Sabbath morning our boat touched at the landing-place of Grand Lake, on the Mississippi. There was the only church that had been thus far. It was located away from any considerable town, and how the inhabitants can reach it at this stage of the river without boats is a mystery. Near the church were many burnt chimneys, the remains of buildings destroyed in the war. Ruins of this sort were quite frequent all along the river.

"BLISSVILLE, ARKANSAS.

"Once on one side of the dilapidated capitol in Little Rock is a collection of log-huts and shanties known by the euphonious name of Blissville. As it is chiefly devoted to the colored population the name is significant. To this picturesque retreat in the very centre of the city Arkansas sends her unused colored soldiers betook themselves, their wives, families, or sweet-hearts having already secured habitations there, where they could seek out of doors and live inside in the highest style with the liberal allowance of room usually afforded by coffins.

"ARSENAL GROUNDS AT LITTLE ROCK.

"These grounds are described as having been very beautiful before the war. At present they show evidences of abuse, having been used as a camping-ground by the Confederate soldiers during their occupation of Little Rock. The band of the Nineteenth Regulars playing here of an evening renders the grounds an attractive resort, and as the trees and flowers put on their summer dress they will become quite pretty once more. The arsenal itself is the prominent building, while beyond it, behind the summer house, is the house of the commandant."

On page 345 a description is given of Mr. THEODORE R. DAVIS'S sketches of Carrollburg, Monticello, and the tomb of JEFFERSON.

A HOPELESS CASE.

I.

DOCTOR THATCHER paced the room anxiously. He was perturbed. He longed for the return of his adopted son. He scarcely knew why, but he also dreaded it. He took up a book; he could not read. Gradually as he sat before the fire, he fell into a restless doze. The sound of a door opening and the door-chain rattling awoke him. He rose and took the lamp into the hall. There was his nephew, John Harkness, fevered, and evidently with drinking. His face was flushed, his hat was crushed, his coat torn.

"Why, Jack," said the Doctor, reproachfully, "you've tired yourself in your rounds, and then taken too much wine. You shouldn't let those farmers tempt you. I used to find it hard."

"There, that'll do," said Harkness, sullenly. "I'm a man, and can take care. I drank because I lost at cards I told you, and your cursed stinginess never leaves me a shilling to try my luck with. I'll be hard up to-morrow. I'm over head and ears in debt, and money I'll have. If Aunt Fanny won't stump up, you must. I'll get money somehow, and pay it back. You owe for keeping me without a penny. No. I won't go to bed—go to bed yourself. I want brandy. Give me brandy!"

Then, with a volley of oaths, Harkness threw himself on a sofa, and fell, in a few seconds, into a drunken sleep.

The old Doctor stood over him, half paralyzed with sorrow and surprise. Could the rumors then be true?

"No," he thought to himself; "no, I will not believe it. This is a mere youthful folly. The poor boy has been led away by some of those farmers, who delight in showing the hospitality unless they make their guests drunk. Poor boy, how sorry he will be to-morrow morning! I shall lock him in my room, that the servants may not see him, and I will come myself and let him out, and then lecture him well. Poor boy!"

In the morning, when Dr. Thatcher unlocked the door of the room where Harkness had slept, he found the window open and the room empty. His old servant James informed him that Mr. John had come and ordered the gig at six o'clock, and started upon his journey.

"Poor boy!" said the Doctor, "he was too ashamed to meet me. Daren't face me after the unaccustomed liberty. Well, perhaps it is best so, too, without his breakfast, dear boy! Won't dare to see his Aunt Fanny to-day, I'll be bound. Of course he must come down to-morrow, perhaps to-night, at close. I must call at the bank and draw a check for him. Ha! I was bad enough at his age."

An hour or two after, the old Doctor rode westerly Doctor driving at a sober pace toward the bank.

"There goes Old Murder!" cried the pert chemist's assistant to a customer, who was talking to him at the door of the shop in the High Street.

"Yes. There goes old four miles an hour! Did you hear of that young Harkness, and how he carried on last night at the billiard-room? Swore he'd been cheated, got noisy drunk, and fought three of the men there with the but-end of a billiard cue. Oh, he's going the whole hog, he is! How he flashes his money, to be sure."

"Well, Jack," said the manager of the bank, as the Doctor alighted from his chaise, "what can we do for you?"

"I want a bank check, Miller, for one hundred and fifty pounds, cashed, and I want to look at my book."

"Certainly. Edward, get Dr. Thatcher's book from the parlor."

"I am going to the post-office, and will call in a minute or two. Pshaw! how cold it is. Seen my son to-day?"

"I drove by, Doctor, about half an hour ago, down Church Street."

"Always at work. That's the way. Early bird picks up the worm."

Thought the looked ill, Sir. Works too hard."

"Yes, it is a dog of a life, ours. One gets old before one has leisure to enjoy what one has earned."

The manager smiled deprecatingly, as much as to say, "Old people will have their joke."

The Doctor came to the post-office.

"Any letters, Mrs. Johnson?"

"Yes, Doctor. There's one for you."

"Hand it out."

The Doctor sat in the chaise and read it. It was from a hospital, the consumption hospital, to which he annually subscribed twenty pounds. The secretary wrote to tell him that two years' subscriptions were due.

"Stuff about due!" growled the Doctor. "Sent Jack to pay it into their bank a month ago. He never forgets anything."

"Here is your book," said the manager, handing the small parchment-covered book to the Doctor as he entered the bank. The former was scooping up a salmon-colored bag of sovereigns.

"No, it is not entered," said the Doctor, in a startled way. "Did not my boy Jack pay in seventy pounds the end of last month for Drummond's? Surely? The last check he paid in. I've not sent twice to you for any thing."

"No, Dr. Thatcher, but he called last week for the hundred pounds for you."

"The hundred pounds?"

"Yes, didn't he, Edward?"

"Oh, yes, Sir, and the week before for the fifty pounds."

"For the fifty pounds?" the Doctor stammered.

"Let me see the checks, Mr. Miller." The Doctor spoke quite calmly, but his voice trembled. "Will you allow me to sit down for a moment in your back parlor till this gentleman has gone? There has been some mistake about a subscription; a quiet minute or so will set it right."

"Certainly, Sir. Edward, show Dr. Thatcher in and get him a chair. Here, Sir, are the checks. Edward, put on a bit of coal, the fire's low."

The Doctor, as the door closed behind the manager, looked closely at the checks, turned the signatures up and down; then he rested his head on his hands and burst into tears. The signatures were forgeries.

"I see it all," he murmured. "Oh, that unhappy boy! and this, I fear, is not the worst. O Almighty, my son, my son!"

"There's something up," said the clerk to the manager, as he took a hasty peep over the green curtain of the glass door. "Why, good gracious, Mr. Miller, the Doctor's fainted!"

II.

"GOOD-MORNING, Mr. Miller," said the Doctor, when he had recovered, and retaken his seat once more in the chaise; "there is no blunder, after all. I see where the mistake lay. I have taken all the checks up to yesterday. Continue the draft. Young Jack, he kind enough to turn the chaise. Thank you."

The Spartan boy kept the wolf hid till it gnawed into his heart. The Doctor had a secret whose teeth were sharper than even the wolf. For a half hour he had suffered the pangs of death itself.

He drove straight to his sister's. Miss Thatcher's, whose neat little cottage was about a quarter of a mile from the town, and near the old parish church. Miss Thatcher was a maiden lady, Miss Paget ran out, looking very pale and anxious.

"Well, Letty, how's Aunt Fanny?"

"Very, very ill, dear uncle. No appetite, very weak, no sleep."

"That won't do; and has Jack been?"

"Jack has been here every morning, only larger doses; but I'm sure—I'm sure it does not agree with her. Do give your advice, uncle."

Dr. Thatcher, old Jack, only two days ago, never to interfere with his patients; but this once I will. Send some one, Letty, to take the mare round to the stables."

Mrs. Thatcher, the Doctor's sister, was sitting up in bed, propped with pillows. Her handsome features were disordered by illness; her cheeks were sunken, her eyes pale and anxious.

"Well, Fanny, and how is it with you?"

"Bad, bad, bad: perpetual pain, nausea, no sleep, no appetite."

The Doctor's face changed, a ghastly pallor came upon his lips.

"Let me see the medicine, Letty."

Miss Paget brought it. The Doctor looked at it eagerly and hastily. That mixture must be had flung the bottle on the fire. A dew of nervous exertion broke out upon his forehead.

"Uncle?"

"Brother?"

The patient's mouth too powerful for you in this weak state. Jack is a clever fellow, but he does not know your constitution as I do. You must have, however, pain but by telling him you have not taken his stuff, so I will send you a mixture that resembles it in color, but less violent. This was too much for you, and I'm glad that he was right, but he has not taken into account your age, Fanny."

"I could not take it yesterday, and Jack was very angry."

"You take the medicine I shall send you when I return directly it comes; take it every two hours as I have directed you. Now, come, lie back, Fanny; you are very weak."

The pale worn face turned toward him and smiled on him; the head sank back on the pillow, and the weary eyelids closed.

"I can not shake off this stupor, John. Good-by, old boy. Come to-morrow, Jack."

The Doctor signed to Letty to leave the room. When she had done so, and the door closed, he sat down by his sister's bedside, and prayed aloud and thoughtful; in that silence, broken only by the tick of the watch at the bed-head, and the deep breathing of the sufferer, he fell on his knees, and prayed for help and guidance from the Giver of all good.

Then he took out his repeater and waited till the minute-hand reached the half hour. It was three o'clock that had struck when Letty closed the door. Then he took his sister's hand and woke her.

"What, John, are you here still?" How good of you! I thought I was alone. I feel better now. It was that dreadful medicine, I'm sure."

"Fanny," said the Doctor, with all a woman's tenderness, "when you made your will in the summer, you told me you left all your money to Jack on his marriage with Letty. Now, I want you to do me a favor."

"I left it all to dear Jack; I told him so. What kindness can I show you, brother, a poor, dying old woman like myself?"

"After the will this evening, and leave me the money during my lifetime. It will be a check on Jack, if he grows extravagant, you see."

"Oh, he won't, dear boy! Yet, as you will, John. You have always some kind and good object in view, I'm sure."

"I will bring a lawyer and witness in half an hour. It might ruin even a well-intentioned lad, and make him idle. Later in life it will perhaps come better."

In the room below the Doctor found Letty, anxious and apprehensive of some evil, but she scarcely knew what.

"Oh, uncle, uncle!" she said, in tears, "auntie is not in danger, is she? Oh, do say she is not in danger!"

"By God's help, Letty, she will be out of danger in a few hours. It is well I came. Letty, you love me, and you love my son Jack?"

"I do! I do! you know how I do, dearly, uncle."

"If you love us both you will then do as I tell zen, and not deviate a single iota, for much depends on what I am now going to say. But first let your man George ride quick into town and get this prescription made up."

What the Doctor's instructions were must not at present be revealed.

III.

Twenty hours later the Doctor was in his surgery, examining a drawer of dangerous drugs that was generally kept locked. He had just closed it, and was musing with his head on his desk and his head on his hand, when there came a step behind him. He looked round; it was John.

"John," he said, and he said no more. But there was an infinite depth of reproachful sadness in that one word.

"Dear Doctor," said his adopted son, "I deeply regret the events of last night. I was tempted to stay at a farmer's harvest-home, and I talked more ale (stuff!) than I drank debt and wanting money. It was all wandering. Forget it all—it meant nothing. It was foolish, wrong of me. I'm sorry for it."

"Let it to the last time, Jack," said the Doctor; "it is harder to come up hill one step than to go down twenty. Do not break my heart by becoming a bad man. By-the-by, have you sent Aunt Fanny the medicine, and how is she?"

"Oh, pulling through all right. She's as tough as nails."

"What prescription are you using?"

"This," and John Harkness held up a bottle of simple tonic drops. "The old lady vents strength. Oh, she shall be fine—only get stronger!"

The Doctor sighed, and said, "The tonic is right. At that moment the surgery door opened, and an old farmer walked himself.

"Why, Farmer Whitehead, how are you?"

"Ailing, Doctor, thank ye, with the flinny. Un contrairy thing to say, and is my misses."

"Ah, I thought Jack here had been attending you for months; you are down in our books. How is this, Jack?"

The young man's color rose. "It is a mistake of mine. I am regular duffer for memory: it was Johnson at Woodcot I meant. I'll put it all right."

"Just see to Farmer Whitehead then, now. Give him a dicachium or preparacuanha to keep the pores open. I'll go and dress for dinner."

Stepped in lies," the Doctor muttered, as he shut the surgery door behind him. "I'd cut this serpent, and now he stings me; but still no one shall know his shame, for I may still, by God's help, save him from sin, and have him time and opportunities for repentance. Heaven have mercy upon him! Yes, still—still I may save the boy by one level stroke."

Dinner was over. The Doctor had been cheerful, as usual, and had made no further reference to the unhappy events of the night before. John Harkness had grown boisterous and social as ever, seeing the Doctor satisfied with so brief an apology.

"Jack," said the Doctor, warming to the conversation, "go and get a bottle of that thirty-two port: I feel to-day as if I wanted a specially good bottle."

John Harkness went, and returned in a few minutes with his bottle, carrying it carefully, with the chalk mark uppermost.

"That's right, Jack. Don't tilt like the country butler, who, when his master said, 'John, have you shaken that wine?' replied, 'No, zur; but I will,' and then shook it up like a draught. Ha, ha, ha! I'll decant it. I like doing it."

The Doctor rose to decant the wine, standing at the buffet to do it facing a mirror, and with his back to the room where the young man had again silently seated himself. In the round shining surface of the mirror the room was repeated in sharp clear miniature. The bottle was still gurgling out its crimson stores into the broad silver wine-strainer, when the Doctor, casting his eyes upon the mirror, observed John draw swiftly from his breast-pocket a little flat black vial and pour a dozen drops of some thick fluid into the half-full glass which stood beside his uncle's plate.

He took no notice of what he had seen, nor did he look round, but merely said:

"John, I'm sorry to trouble you, but we shall want some brown sherry; there is hardly enough for to-day. Just before we sit down to the real business of the evening."

The moment John Harkness left the room the Doctor, with the quickness of youth, spilt the wine, recognized the taste of laudanum, threw open the door leading into the surgery, drained the wine down a sink, then shut the door, and refilled the glass to exactly the same height.

Here is the sherry, governor. Come, take your wine."

The Doctor tossed it off.

"I feel sleepy," he said—"strangely sleepy."

"Oh, it is the weather. Go into that green chair and have a ten minutes' nap."

The Doctor did so. In a moment or two he fell back, assuming the consummate skill of the external symptoms of deep sleep. A deep apoplectic snoring breathing convinced the Doctor's adopted that the laudanum had taken effect.

A moment that hardened man stood watching the sleeper by him, falling on his knees, he slipped from the old Doctor's finger his massive seal-key

The instant he turned to run to a cabinet where the Doctor's case-book was kept, the old man's stern eyes opened upon him with the swiftest curiosity; but the old man did not move a limb nor a muscle, remaining fixed like a figure of stone.

"He's safe," said the coarse, unfeeling voice; "and now for the case-book, to fix it against him if any thing goes wrong."

As he said this the lost man opened the case-book and made an entry. He then locked the book, replaced it in the cabinet, and slipped the key-ring once more on the Doctor's finger. Then he rose and rang the bell softly. The old servant came to the door.

"The governor's taken rather too much wine," he said, blowing out the candles; "awake him about twelve and tell him I'm gone to bed. You say I'm out, if you dare; and mind and have the trap ready to-morrow at half-past nine. I'm to be at Mrs. Thatcher's."

When the door closed upon the hopeless profligate, the Doctor rose and wrung his hands.

"Lost, lost!" he said; "but I will hide his shame. He shall have time still to repent. I can not—can not forget how I once loved him."

Shortly the Doctor was roused to that task of self-devotion—stern as a soldier chosen for a forlorn hope. "To-morrow," he said, "I will confront him, and try for the last hard heart."

When the servant came at twelve the Doctor pretended to awake. "Joe," he said, "get my chaise ready to-morrow at a quarter to nine, mind, to the moment. Where's Mr. John?"

"Gone to bed, Sir, and—asleep."

"He makes beasts all liars like himself," said the old man, as he slammed his bedroom door.

IV.

"How is your mistress?" said the young doctor, as, driving fast through Crossford the next morning, he suddenly espied Mrs. Thatcher's servant standing at the post-office window.

The old coachman shook his head.

"Very bad, Sir; sinking fast."

John Harkness looked very coolly, but lashed his horse and drove fiercely off in the direction of the sick woman's house.

"It all goes well," he said, half aloud. "I had half a mind to stop the thing yesterday when I saw her; but these fellows press so with their bills, and the governor was so cantankerous. I really must press it on. It's no crime. What is it? Only sending an old woman two or three days sooner to the heaven she is always whining for. But she was fond of me, and it's rather a shame; but what can a fellow do that's so badgered?"

So reasoned the fallen man, steeped in the sophistries which sin uses as narcotics to stupefy its victims.

Arrived at the door he threw down the reins tossed back the apron, and leaped out. He was excited and trembling, but not with fear. He was ready found time to take. All at once, as he passed his fingers in a vain way through his whiskers and shook his head as he looked at the road rolls, he glanced upward at the windows. To his surprise, but by no means violent regret, he saw that the blinds were all down.

"By the Lord Harry!" he muttered, "if the old cat hasn't already kicked the bucket! Vogue la galère, then! Now for the two hundred pounds' legacy, and a white cambric handkerchief!"

He pulled at the bell softly. In a moment or two the door was opened by a servant, whose eyes were red with crying. At the same instant Miss Paget stepped from a room opening into the hall. She had a handkerchief to her face.

"Oh, John, John," she sobbed; "my dear, dear aunt."

Then she's really gone," said Harkness, with well-feigned regret. "Here, Letty, come into the back parlor and tell me about it. Why, I didn't think the old lady was going so soon."

"Not there, John, not there," said Letty, as she stood before the door.

"I'll go up and see her at once."

"No, no, John, you must not. Not yet."

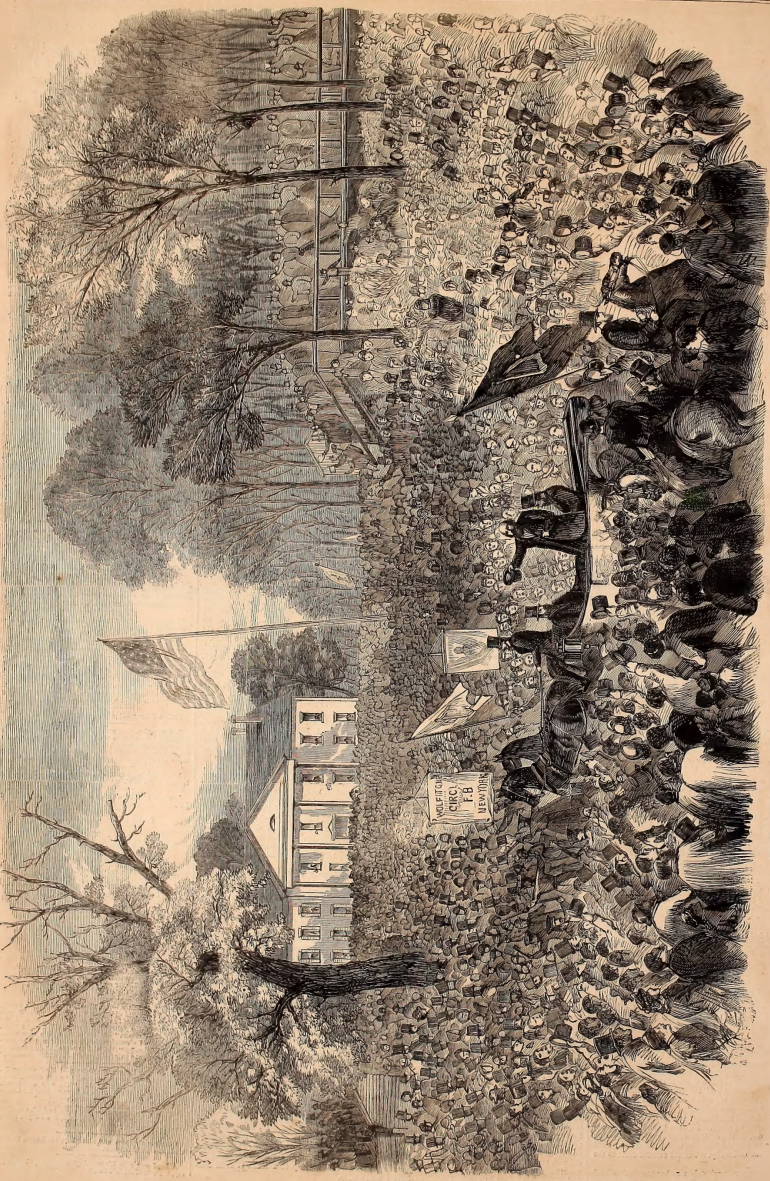
"Why, what all this fuss about, Letty?" said Harkness, angrily. "One would think no one had ever died before. Of course it's a bad job, and we're very sorry for it; but it must be, must be. It is as bad as crying over spilt milk."

"Oh, John, you never spoke like this before! You never spoke like this to me, John. John, you do not really love me!" And she burst into a passionate and almost hysterical weeping.

"Nonsense, nonsense, Letty, you know I do. We can marry now, now she's left me her money. I've got rather into a mess, and I want cash. It'll be a great blessing who lies up stairs, and my step-dad of governor, who kept me so long from marrying and being happy. We will marry in a month, we two now. Let who will say nay. By George! if there isn't the bureau where she used to keep her papers. I'll have a look at them. Mind, I'm not to have in having a look at it. Where are the keys, Letty? Go and get them from her room. She's no use, I suppose, for them now. Mind, I'm sure to use. Empress, Empress, she'd not even let me touch it. Where are the keys, Letty? Go and get them from her room. She's no use, I suppose, for them now. Mind, I'm sure to use. Empress, Empress, she'd not even let me touch it. I can not get the keys. Wait. Have you no love for the dead?"

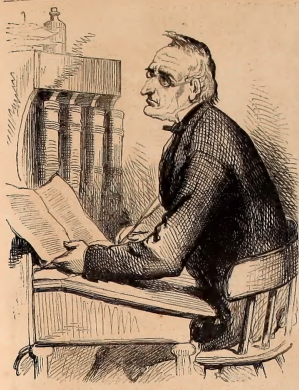
"Stuff and nonsense. I want no whining sentiments. I thought you were a girl of more pluck and sense. Get away from that bureau. I'll soon have it open. It's all right, I know. Mind, I'm sure this morning. Things haven't gone smooth with me lately at all. Get away."

He pulled the little girl from the desk, and, thrusting in the blade of a large knife, wrenched open the front of the bureau. A roll of bank-notes fell to the ground as it rent up the door opened, and the old Doctor stood before him. There were tears in his eyes as he looked sorrowfully at his adopted son.



"Oh, Lord, no, Sir. Dead six years since. Why, Sir, you seem to remember the people well?"

The stranger rested his head on his hand and thought for a moment; then he said:



"And Miss Paget, Mrs. Thatcher's niece—is she living—married—anything?"

"Living—yes, Sir. Lock, Sir; why, there is her carriage standing at the bank-door opposite. Here comes the coachman. Shall I open the door?"

"No

GRAND RECEPTION OF JAMES STEPHENS, THE FENIAN CHIEF, AT JONES'S WOOD, APRIL 15, 1866.—[SEE PAGE 340.]

THE MONEY-MAKER.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR MAY.

THE Parisian modistes have certainly produced a fair stock of novelties in the way of chapeaux for the present season, the most remarkable of which are the chapeaux Lamballe, Watteau, Bergère, Benoiton, and Printanier. The favorite materials of which these are made are tulle and fancy straw; but sometimes they are formed entirely of clusters of flowers, such as clematis and lilies of the valley, or vine leaves of different shades of color, with here and there a few small green or purple grapes arranged closely together. In the front there is occasionally a band of colored ribbon on a ruche of blonde, the strings of the chapeau being, of course, of the same color. When the chapeau is of tulle this is frequently goffered, and the crown is encircled with a wreath of flowers, hyacinths, moss-roses, passion-flowers, heart's-ease, forget-me-nots, or lilies of the valley, the ends of which hang down on either side, or, joined together, fall over the breast. The strings are for the most part of white ribbon, with frequently a second pair of strings of tulle; but strings of mauve, pale blue, or green, or other light color ribbon harmonizing with the tints of the wreaths are also worn. The chapeaux of fancy straw are trimmed with similar wreaths to those just described, and occasionally have the ribbon of the strings passed over the crown. A favorite trimming for these chapeaux is a cluster of ears of wheat or barley on either side, with a chaine Benoiton of straw passementerie falling down in front. The strings in this case would be of straw-color ribbon with, perhaps, a second pair of strings of muslin, crape, or tulle of the same color. Most of the chapeaux have glass drops suspended round the brim; the more elegant tulle bonnets being ornamented in a similar manner with pearl beads.

For robes several novelties in the way of foulards have made their appearance; for instance, the foulard Patti, with a border formed of musical notes; the foulard glaieuse, ornamented with ears of wheat knotted together; the foulard pastel, with small bouquets of flowers on a pearl or rose, gray or white ground; the foulard Oriental, with a double palm-leaf upon a rich colored or black or white ground; and the foulard Imperial, ornamented with wreaths of flowers.

There are two kinds of jupons now in vogue—the jupon à traine and the jupon écourté; the former is terminated with a deep flounce bordered with gimp, surmounted by an entre-deux, composed of small squares of gimp; the latter is ornamented with an entre-deux of gimp or embroidery, and a narrow piping.

Sunshades when made of dark-colored silk are invariably lined with white: the handles are mostly large, and are occasionally formed of a series of links resembling a somewhat heavy-looking chain. In place of a handle, some sunshades are armed with a formidable-looking spike, the use or purpose of which is certainly a mystery.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

HEADDRESS AND COIFFURES.

Fig. 1. Chapeau of puffed tulle, formed like the shell of a snail, with a cache of blonde in the form. Strings of pink ribbon.

Fig. 2. Coiffure de Bal, composed of an antique band of rose velvet studded with cameos, which are interlaced with chains of small pearls, that fall down below the chignon.

Fig. 3. Coiffure for a Bride.—Wreath of Orange blossoms, the two ends of which are crossed at the back of the head, and fall down on each side of the chignon.

Fig. 4. Catalane in tulle blonde, trimmed with a roche of blonde and flowers, with a double bouquet, likewise formed of blonde and flowers, falling down in front.

Fig. 5. Chapeau of gaffered tulle, trimmed with leaves of green velvet, which, formed into a chain, fall down over the bavant. Strings of green ribbon and white tulle.

COSTUMES.

Fig. 1. Morning Jacket of crimson velvet, bordered with a rouleau of gold passementerie. Body and sleeves foulard, without any trimming.

Fig. 2. Carriage Dress.—Tunic of green taffeta, open in front in the shape of a heart, and behind on a line with the waist, ornamented with a buttoned and looped rouleau. Sleeve of Chantilly lace. Robe of striped green foulard, with wide rouleau on the front, and bordered at the bottom with marchant, like the tunic. Chapeau Lamballe of Tuscan straw, trimmed with velvet and the straps of green ribbon.

Fig. 3. Indoor Dress.—Robe of coarse blue taffeta. At each side are two wide stripes of the same material, but of a darker shade of color, connected by a passementerie. Corsage-vest of the same color as the robe, and trimmed with a similar passementerie, with chain balls, and without sleeves. Bournous in an under corsage, which, with the sleeves, is white muslin. Small top sleeves. The sleeves are trimmed with a roche of ribbon matching the robe, and bordered with Valenciennes lace. Trimming of plain ribbon. In the hair is a simple bandalette of ribbon of the same color as the robe.

Fig. 4. Evening Dress.—Bournous de printemps of fine silk and net, striped with gold and silver tissue. The robe is of straw-color foulard, with stripes of a darker shade. The coiffure is composed of a cluster of ears of roses at the top of the head, which are connected by chains of pearls to an enamel plaque fixed in the chignon.

PHILOSOPHY IN THE CLOUDS.

THE other day we, in common with our quill-compelling brotherhood, received a polite invitation from Dr. Solomon Andrews to inspect an invention of his yclept, "THE AERIAN; OR, FLYING SHIP." Accompanying this invitation was a request that we should answer sundry rather intricate questions, as to the whole problem of aerial navigation should now be considered satisfactorily solved; whether there were any immediate probability that all railway and steamship companies would wind up, pay dividend and close their offices; whether henceforth all transportation of passengers and freight must of necessity be effected by the agency of the Aerian, and other machines of similar construction, thus "revolutionizing the commerce of nations;" and other equally mystical interrogatories, coming within the province rather of clairvoyance than of journalism.

The "flying ship's" magnificent volume is "bound in boards" at the corner of Green and Houston streets, a locality ill adapted for the success of heavenward experiments, inasmuch as the physical and moral character of that region has a decidedly downward tendency, and is "of the earth, earthy," to the utmost conceivable degree. Although the majority of the inhabitants are said to "live by air," or, more elegantly, to "become elevated"—in a metaphorical sense, of course—than occasionally, but few of them are likely to call upon Smith to verify the place of their bodily residence, as in the traditional case of the one man who went to heaven from Chicago.

On entering the lofty inclosure at which our readers may have wonderingly gazed from the University Place cars, we found ourself in the presence of three members of the press, of an enthusiastic individual evidently deputed to instill ecstasy into the minds of the said (and other) members of the press, and of—The Aerian!

The principal point of dissimilarity between this and other balloons (and the feature whereon the inventor bases his theory) is its peculiar shape. Instead of the "gaseous" pegs-top" pattern being followed, the Aerian reminds one forcibly, by its form and color, of a Brobdingnagian lemon suspended in air, its greatest diameter being horizontal. To a strap, which encircles its larger circumference and is controlled by a complicated congeries of cords and pulleys, a broad elliptical depression, or groove, may be made in its upper surface, for the double purpose of giving a line of direction to the atmospheric resistance (on an upside-down wingdale stick, so to speak), and also of regulating the capacity of the balloon to compensate for the expansion and contraction of its gaseous contents at different altitudes. Depending from this juiceless lemon is a wicker car, somewhat in shape, occupies the centre of this car, and from the "conwain's seat" two "tiller-ropes" lead to a conical three-cornered rudder, tacked at one of its angles to the after-end of the balloon. So much for the general appearance of the "Flying Ship." Now as to its modus operandi.

We were cordially and courteously greeted by the enthusiastic individual above alluded to, who, to our inquiry concerning the motive power to be employed, responded in substance as follows:

"The principle of gravitation, Sir, is what the Doctor mainly relies on for his motive power. You see, the buoyancy of the balloon imparts to it a tendency to ascend in a vertical direction; but by inclining the axis of the Aerian at a slight angle to the horizon, this upward motion is converted into one of progression. If you throw a piece of slate into the water it does not sink in a direct line, but descends with a zigzag motion; and just so the pressure of the air, either upward or downward, acting upon a flat or oblique surface, must produce the same result. For instance, this envelope," extricating that article from his pocket as he spoke, "will not fall edgewise to the earth, but will gradually descend, by reason of its weight, obliquely, and, in consequence, will be carried forward horizontally, exemplifying admirably the Doctor's theory." The envelope being here triumphantly launched into space, performed one or two hesitating gyrations, and then, getting an edge downward, plunged viciously and vertically to the earth. Nothing daunted by the failure of this illustration, however, our informant continued: "The same principle is beautifully manifested in the flight of birds, whose course through the air first suggested to the Doctor the idea which he has embodied in the Aerian."

We diffidently remarked that possibly the circumstance of birds having wings, and balloons being destitute of those members, might invalidate the force of the comparison.

"Not at all, Sir!" replied he, waxing even more enthusiastic than in our previous replies. "The Doctor denies that a bird's wings are organs of propulsion. They are simply for the purpose of ascending: the inclination of the feathers, when the bird is not ascending to the rudder which you see there. Now the Doctor sitting in the rear-end of the car, his weight induces a depression in the stern and a proportionate elevation of the prow of the machine. He ascends and advances thus obliquely at the rate of, say, four miles an hour; continuing then, having attained his highest point, he lets out a portion of the gas, and, pointing the Aerian downward—at the same time bringing the rudder to bear upon himself—he descends at a corresponding angle. Nearing the earth, the ejection of a few sand-bags imparts a second ascent, and so the undulation is reached."

"All very well," said we, "provided that the machine act as it ought to, and provided also that a trip be made on a perfectly still day; but suppose the wind should blow from an unfavorable quarter, what would he do then?"

"Track, Sir!" promptly responded the enthusiast, with an air of a man who has entirely overwhelmed an opponent in argument.

"But touching steerage-way," we modestly insinuated; "if a boat without sail or oars be drifting in a tidal current, is it possible to alter its direction by the helm?"

"Not at all a parallel case, my dear Sir," observed he. "The velocity attained by the combined forces acting on the Aerian (which the Doctor estimates at thirty miles per hour per hour) so far exceeds the rapidity of the wind that our rudder must meet with sufficient resistance to vary our course."

"Still, if a side wind—" we began.

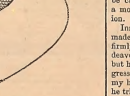
"A head wind, Sir," he retorted, "may be blowing at the rate of, we will say, sixty miles per hour; yet if our velocity be taken at one hundred miles per hour, it is a simple mathematical deduction that we will overcome that obstacle, and yet have fifty miles per hour headway."

"But," we interjected, "we referred more particularly to a side—"

"You perceive, therefore," pursued he, unconscious of our interruption, "that your objection founded upon the aerial currents is easily explained away."



Being, if not convinced, at least silenced, we cast a parting glance upon the gaseous giant, and wended our way toward home, pondering upon birds, balloons, lemons, envelopes, and natural philosophy. Our cogitations led us into a maze of suppositions, a few of which we now beg to transfer to the gentle reader.

Suppose, firstly, that there be some foundation in fact for the statement made in treatises on physics, that from two equal forces, acting at right angles to each other, a diagonal motion will result. Suppose, furthermore, that in the following diagram A is the point of departure, B the place Doctor Andrews

A B=5 miles; A C=25 miles. "From the square of the hypothenuse subtract the square of the other known side, and the square root of the remainder will be the third side." Performing this operation, we find B C=24½ miles; i. e., "the Doctor" would lose nearly a mile in every day, and slight six miles short of his point of delivery, with a large balloon and about 40 lbs. of merchandise to carry on the rest of the way. As a corollary, we may state that we do not think that the commerce of the world, in the matter of freight, is likely to be seriously affected by the invention of the Aerian.

Suppose that the Aerian, launched with a velocity of a hundred miles per hour against an opposing wind, should develop the tendency sometimes noticed in curved surfaces under like circumstances (e. g. a clam-shell "shied" by a small boy on a windy day), and turn bottom upward, thus, returning after the manner of a boomerang!

Suppose, finally, that the beneficent Board of Health, under their section 27 code which says "that no person shall throw or send up any kite, stone, or other substance whereby, or by reason of which, any human life may be put in danger or peril," should interpose its authority between Dr. Andrews and the "end" which might "crown his work."

MY PICKPOCKET.

"THE one great thing you want to guard against, Miss Howard, is pickpockets. They positively swarm on this line of railroad. Why, some gentlemen-house on every road in the land has its sign up, Beware of Pickpockets" (Miss Borey with expressive forefinger drawn in the air legend of the sign, as if it were visibly on the wall before her), "and they know what they are about, those railroad men. Why, there was Miss Newcome, only the other day, had her pocket picked in just coming from Yonkers; and when it was done she could not tell to save her; all she knew was that a most genteel and well-appearing man shared her seat with her, who was no doubt the thief. It is always the nicest-looking, neatest, most elegantly-dressed men who are the likeliest to be pickpockets, Miss Howard—always. Oh, they are so agreeable! and before you know it your purse is gone, and he is gone too. Why, it is not a week since my friend Mrs. Cadd, of Port Jervis, was robbed of her pocket-book in that long dark tunnel in the Jersey City by the handsomest young man you ever saw. He held her little girl on his knee and gave her nuts, and was mighty agreeable; and when they got out that tunnel he picked Mrs. Cadd's pocket of every cent she had, and got off before she suspected him. Why, bless me, Miss Howard!—with startling energy—if you have to go through that very tunnel, don't you? Well, be careful of your pocket-handkerchief, that's all; if you don't you may be sorry you didn't heed the word of one who knows. Beware of polite and genteel young men particularly if they are good-looking; I always do; I make them keep their distance, I promise you."

This homage was delivered by Miss Borey one day last June, and that night I dreamed I was robbed and choked and thrown out of the car-window in that dark tunnel, by the handsomest man I ever saw, with great beautiful eyes and the air and manners of a prince.

The battle of departure next morning did not drive these thoughts quite out of my mind. I had no sooner got across the river and taken my seat in the car than I glanced out the window and saw that staring placard:

"BEWARE OF PICKPOCKETS!"

It seemed as if the train would never start. I had come over in an early boat, so as to make sure of a good seat, and hence had half an hour and more to wait. Look which way I would, I could not get my attention off that black-lettered placard. My eyes would, in spite of me, wander back to it every other minute, and read it again, until it settled its shadow over me like a nightmare. In desperation I would shut my eyes; but I could not shut out that placard. There it was, and multiplied by tens. I opened a book and essayed to read; but in vain—I could not settle my mind on any thing but the nineteen letters that spelled those three words of warning. They began to jumble themselves up in my mind in the most aggravating way, till my head ached with their mad freaks: Beware—beware — pickpockets—pickpockets—pickets—pockets — pockpicket—wre—bewar—pickpock—pock—beware—

"BEWARE OF PICKPOCKETS!"

And back my eyes would go as if the thing were fascinating me, as a snake and I a bird.

Oh dear, how tired I grew of it!

It was a great relief when, just as the conductor called out "All aboard!" a good-looking young man came up to me with a shawl over his arm, and said, in a respectful tone,

"Ma'am, will you allow me to occupy this seat, Miss—?"

The car was crowded. I removed my traveling bag from the seat next to my side, and invited him to self by me. He said nothing to me, but took the morning paper from his pocket and read it.

I am not a physiognomist, as a conclusion—that their judgment is altogether intuitive, and that they can never give a reason for the belief that is in them. I also am, I repeat, respected Sirs, more than one reason for my belief that the man at my side was a pickpocket.

First, although well-dressed, he wore a peculiar pair of black pantaloons with narrow white stripes in them. Second, his hands were white, though they looked rough and hard, and he wore three gold rings on his fingers. Third, he wore a mustache, and no beard. Fourth, his manners were precisely of that quiet, unobtrusive kind that Mrs. Borey had named.

There! There are four reasons which influenced me in my conclusion. If they were not given out at once, in themselves, they were the basis of my judgment. So it was not intuition.

The train moved on its way, and presently we plunged into the black darkness of that long and gloomy tunnel. Shall I ever forget it?

All my senses became concentrated in that. I drew off my gloves to be prepared for action, if I should be called on. I had barely done so when I felt the movement of the hand and arm of my companion.

Instantly I put out my hand; it touched his; he made a motion to draw it away; but I grasped it firmly by the wrist, and with my other hand endeavored to take my pocket-book from his clutch; but he would not yield it. I felt as strong as a tigress in that exciting moment, and clung with both my hands to him, determined to scream for help if he tried to leave the seat.

Oh, how slowly the train seemed to drag on through that interminable tunnel! Would the light never come?

At length the light did come. I turned my eyes on the man with the look that I trusted would pierce him to the quick. He returned my gaze with interest.

"Well, Sir!" said I.

"Well, Madam?" he rejoined.

"My pocket-book, if you please, Sir," I uttered, with withering emphasis.

"Your pocket-book?"

"Yes, Sir;" and again I endeavored to draw it from his grasp.

"Gently!" said he; "I believe the pocket-book is my own!"

Why I did not faint I hardly know. For it was, indeed, true; the pocket-book he held in his hand was our mine.

I dropped his hand quickly, and as quickly thrust my own into my pocket. I found my porte-monnaie was safe.

"Oh, Sir!" I cried, in unspeakable chagrin; "what can I say to you?"

"You need to say any thing, Madam," said he, in the kind tones of a gentleman, "to express precisely the nature of your mistake. You thought me a pickpocket. It is uncomplimentary," he smiled, "but not inexcusable."

The remainder of the day's ride was a most delightful one. Works of ordinary acquaintanceship in society could hardly have existed on a more confidential footing than did this ridiculous blunder and I. I was determined to make my companion that I had a trusting faith in his true gentlemanliness, all the more unreserved because of the base suspicion I had entertained of him but a few hours.

We chatted all day long. He was going to Avon [illegible] and it seemed he knew Brother Fred quite well as a business man, having met him at Wall Street. He gave me his business card, by which I saw that his name was William Baird. When he surrendered me into my mother's hands at Avon, he said, with a droll look,

"Your daughter came near having her pocket picked, Mrs. Howard. Hence our acquaintance."

Then I had to tell the story; and, not to conceal any part of my folly, I did not even omit to mention the reasons for which had influenced me in believing Mr. Baird to be a pickpocket.

"The [illegible] Miss Howard," said Mr. Baird, "do look a little flashy—"

"Oh no," said I. "three such plain gold rings as those—"

"But they are each gifts from valued friends, and worn for their sake, not because I have a taste for such ornaments."

Well, this is the story of my adventure last June, and it was enough to last me a lifetime; for "my pickpocket" (as I often call him) stole my heart, and we are to be married in the fall. I need not explain who is to be my traveling companion next month in the ride to our summer resort.

TO MY DOG DASH.

BY WILLIAM ROSS WALLACE.

[Many poets have sung their dogs; and if the poem were an elegy, a reason for having the thought is strained and insincere. But the death of no animal touches the heart so closely as that of a dog which has been a domestic friend—not a hunter merely . . . but a flexible companion, part of the household, a playmate of children, an affectionate and perpetual presence. The kind welcome when you returned. . . . the universal dumb fidelity, never favoring upon a richer master, never winning to enter a finer gate than yours. . . . bearing even chastisement sadly and meekly—that is a friendship . . . which so often outlasts the human.—Harper's Magazine for February, 1866.]

Blessings on thee, Dash, dear Dash,
Blessings on thee, Dash, dear Dash,
Blessings on thee, Dash, dear Dash,
Of this flesh that seem to keep our Souls for the immortal stars—
Shaving by the links of Reason,
That there is a mountain climes
Where man's spirit noons forever
Far beyond the hills of Time!

Blessings, also, that his volume
Wrongly accurs'd a place,
Made by that All-wise Love-Father,
For the lower animal race—
When this dream of dust is over—
Where its nature, finer still,
May its own delights forever
Seek at its own chartered will!*

If the sun'd gives the immortal,
Why then, Dash, my canine friend,
Should this life of earth, so fleeting,
Be to you, alone, the end?
Have you not, unpublished Dogdom?
Dogdom with its friendship true—
Truer than most boastful humans
Ever in their bosoms knew.

How you have watched o'er the children
(One from death I owe to you;
This alone would give me yearning
That there's a Dog-Heaven too!)
How you always barked glad welcome
To me on return! nor drift
Did I e'er detect that you were
Only looking for some gift.

How when I might roughly chide you
For some act (would that above Worse of mine was not recorded!)
You would take it all in love,
Sadly, meekly, with side-glances
At mine eye—yea! but its day
Giving pardon—when it met you,
Oh, how grateful would you dance!

How you always were contented,
Though the morsel poor might be;
Never seeking richer matter
Richer in his store than me!
How—but I must stop the record
Of your virtues; and but scan
Them in silence—or you'll think me
Only satirizing man!

Come! the woods again are Edened
With the gladsome summer time—
Come! we'll scour the vales together,
Or the leafy mountains climb—
Come! and scare some fuller symbols
Of my coming life may meet me,
Than before I ever knew,
While, perhaps—for future dogrel—
Some may speak for Dogdom's too.

* See remarkable repetition on this curious subject in BUTLER'S celebrated "Analogy."

COMPLAINT ANSWERED.

COMPLAINT is sometimes made by those who visit the COLTON DENTAL ASSOCIATION (19 Cooper Institute) that sometimes they have to wait so long before they can be accommodated. Dr. COLTON says he must accommodate patients in the order of arrival, though it is seldom one has to wait more than half an hour. Even this can be avoided by securing an appointment. They extract teeth for about forty patients every day, as many as they can get through with. That the operation is pleasant and painless we can certify from personal experience. Quite an amusing scene occurred at their office the other day. A lady took the chair, inhaled the gas, and had her teeth extracted. On waking she spat out the blood, and in a few minutes was asked to vacate the chair for another patient. After a time she was asked to write her name on the scroll. On doing so, she asked, "Why, when are you going to take out my teeth?" The tooth had been out ten minutes.

MOTH AND FRECKLES.—Ladies afflicted with discolorations on the face, called moth-patches or freckles, should use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. It is infallible. Prepared by Dr. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by all druggists.

TUCKER'S PATENT SPRING BEDS.

There are some truths besides those enumerated in the Declaration of Independence that are self-evident, and though they may pertain to the less vital interests of the human race, they are by no means unimportant. Among them are these: A bed, to fulfill the purposes for which it is designed, must be comfortable; it must be so constructed as to insure cleanliness; it should, for easy transportation, be made portable; and, lastly, the greatest benefit demands that it should be both durable and economical. All of these essential requisites come in the spring beds invented by Hiram Tucker, and it is confidently that nothing has ever been produced for man's comfort which is at all comparable to it. A single night's repose on one of them will prove the most incredulous doubter of his skepticism. For sale wholesale by the TUCKER MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
115, 117, and 119 Court Street, Boston,
and 59 John Street, New York.

IMPORTANT QUALITIES.

They will cure a Weakness of the Back, Pain in the Side, a Lameness of the Knee or of the Ankle, or Cold Feet, sooner and with more comfort than any other application.

KNOXVILLE, ALBANY CO., June 16, 1863.

DR. T. ALLCOCK: Dear Sir,—Seventeen years ago I was nearly helpless for eight months. I was induced to use your plasters. I wore one constantly for six months, and did more hard work during that six months than in the preceding fifteen years. I have not worn a plaster for over eighteen months, and have had no return of the gnawing pain and weakness in my back, but have been entirely well.

I am your obedient servant,

CLOSING OUT SALE
OF THE
NEUFCHATEL WATCH CO.

Owing to the failure and sudden closing of the works and business of the

NEUFCHATEL WATCH CO.

A large number of fine Watches, manufactured especially for the United States, being heavy, first-class timekeepers, intended to stand the extremes and sudden changes of temperature, are left in our hands for immediate sale. As against all the Watches ever offered for sale, none of this stock for cash in the shortest possible time. We have, therefore, decided on the plan annexed as the one that will be productive of the desired result. This plan gives every one an opportunity of obtaining first-class timekeepers at a price that all can command. As every Certificate represents a Watch, there are no blanks, and every one who invests in this sale must get a Watch at half the retail price at least, and, in many instances, one to four times as much.

Remittances may be made at our risk in registered letters or by express, or post-office orders and drafts payable to our order, and we guarantee a safe return. FAIR DEALINGS sale delivery and sure return to every patron.

We warrant each Watch as represented, and satisfaction is guaranteed in every instance. Knowing the worth of the Watch, we are willing to warrant its genuineness. The price has been placed at the very low figure in order to insure immediate sale, and all who desire to improve the opportunity should make early application.

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS WARNER,
Author of "The Wide, Wide World."

CHAPTER IV.

"I'm afraid I may have to alter my list, Sam," said Clover; "I'm afraid mine is difficult. I wrote down just what I wanted at first without noticing how the seeds were to be planted; and now I see some of them must be 'under glass.'"

"Never mind," said her brother, "let's take the list first and the difficulties afterward. It is a great point to know what you want."

"I know that pretty well," said Clover; "only it was hard to want little enough. Well then, Sam, first of all, you know, I must cover my fence; and papa said I might have just as much fence as I liked."

"Fence ad libitum," said Sam; "yes, that's right."

"So first of all I chose some vines," said Clover. "This beautiful hyacinth bean, with dark purple flowers and varnished pods—it must be splendid, I think."

"Varnished pods?" said Lily—"where did you find that? I thought it was just a bean—and beans are so common."

"Well, maybe it is common," said Clover, "but I guess not; for Mr. Vick says it ought to be grown more than it is. And it will cover my fence grandly, for the shoots are sometimes twenty feet long. But then, Sam, I thought it would not do to have the fence all dark —so I chose next this pretty canary-bird vine, with fringed yellow flowers."

"Very well chosen," said Sam. "Don't you want a blue vine too? here are blue Ipomœas."

"I thought of that," said Clover, hesitating a little bit. And then softly bending down Sam's head to where little Primrose sat on the floor at his side, Clover silently pointed out to him in large, childish writing at the very head of Prim's list—"Ipomœa grandiflora superba."

"So I thought I wouldn't," she said, with a smile; "a second one might hurt the superb effect, you know, Sam. And don't you think yellow and purple go well together?"

"Nothing could be better," said Sam, twining his arm round the girl's waist and drawing her close to his side. "And I see you have got the start of me, Clover, and have planted your hedge before I have even the ground dug up."

"Planted my hedge?" Clover repeated. Then, with a smile and a flush, "I think mamma was the planter, Sam."

"And may God give the increase!" said her brother, tenderly. "Now what comes next? The fence being covered, what shall we do with the ground?"

"I thought," said Clover, a little shyly, "that my vines would show better at intervals, you know—not to see quite the whole of them at once. So I chose these tall zinnias and marigynias for flowers, and then to mix with them this pretty amaranthus — Joseph's Coat—with its three-colored leaves. I think they'll do for a back-ground," said Clover, with the same shy look at her brother's face, which somehow or other confused her and brought a blush into her own. But he only said as before—

"Well chosen. What next?"

"Next, in front," said Clover, "I want a whole mass of flowers, the gayest I can get. There's stocks, and salpiglossis, and gaillardia, and celosia, and balsam, and argemone, and helichrysum. The helichrysum flowers are good all winter."

"A first-rate list," said Sam. "Don't you want some very low-growing flowers just in front, to slope it quite down to the grass?"

"Yes, I wanted some very much," said Clover, "but my money gave out. And then I thought the taller flowers would show best from the house, and so that I had better keep them. But I can change my list."

"No, no," said Sam; "you are to choose, you know. And the list is capital. Now, little one," he said, lifting up Primrose and placing her on his knee, "what sort of a collection of sweets have you got together?"

"Oh, it's so difficult!" said Prim, knitting her small brows and turning the Catalogue leaves back and forth with perplexed fingers. "I wanted to get all the sweet things, but they are so many. And then Lily says some of 'em are so common. I'm afraid my garden won't look pretty unless I get some other things too; and I don't know what to leave out and what to put in."

"Your garden will look pretty, I'll answer for it," said Sam. "I never saw a collection of sweet things in my life that was not beautiful. What does Lily say is common?"

"Why, my sweet peas, for instance," said Primrose, studying her list.

"I'm glad if they are," said Sam, "but I never found it out. I think for every sweet pea you may find fifty fuchsias. Have them by all means."

"Oh, I'm so glad!" said Prim, her face brightening; "for he says they're so very sweet. And see, Sam, all colors. Then oh, Sam, I want this blue ipomœa!"

"Then have it," said Sam, smiling.

"But it costs twenty-five cents!"

"Well, you've got twenty-five cents to give for it."

"But I mean," said Primrose, "it leaves me so little money for any thing else."

"Yes," said Sam, "you must choose between one great beauty and four or five smaller ones."

"Is it a great beauty? Then I'll have it," said Primrose. "I don't signify if I haven't a great variety in my garden, I guess. But here's a beauty —a white primrose! That's what mamma likes."

Sam thought, as he looked down at the fair little face upturned joyfully to his, that mamma had excellent taste. Few prettier things to be found, to his fancy, than such a white primrose. But he only said, laughing,

"This one, Prim? Why, it has a name as long as you are—mother's acaulis alba."

"I know," said Primrose; "but it don't matter, I needn't say 'em all at once. Then here are my pansies, Sam; they're not sweet, but they're lovely."

"You extravagant little puss!" said Sam; "pansies cost fifteen cents!"

"Yes," said Primrose, sedately; "but I had to have 'em, you know. Then here is platystemon—I don't know what it is, but it sounds pretty, and it's sweet too. And here's datura. Oh, Sam, just look at this, with flowers seven to nine inches long, and sweet!"

"Must be a real horn of perfume instead of plenty," said Sam.

"Oh, but it's plenty too!" said Prim, "for it says 'very sweet.' Then here's alstœmia and calliiroe — that's not sweet, I suppose, but it sounds beautiful."

"That's a fine list," said Sam. "I'm not sure but it's the most troublesome one of the three; but as you are a patient, painstaking little body, you won't mind that."

"I like it," said Prim.

"But what's the particular trouble of Prim's list more than ours?" said Lily.

"There are more things that require transplanting, and more that must be started in heat."

"What's 'starting in heat?'" said Lily.

"Being very warm, and therefore beginning to grow."

"Now, Sam, don't be a tease! What is it really?"

"That is true which I said," answered Sam; "only it is the seed's side of the question. Your part of the work is to furnish the warm circumstances that bring about such a good result."

"Putting them in the sun, do you mean?" said Lily, "in a warm part of the ground?"

"The sun has very little heat to spare just now, and the ground is as cold as ice —being, in fact, frozen."

"Well, we can wait till it melts—I mean thaws—and gets warm, then," said Lily.

"And then some of your flowers, which need a long time to grow, would begin to bloom by about the end of summer. You must give them artificial heat, and make them a climate."

"Well, this is the hardest work!" said Lily. "Why, Sam, there isn't any artificial heat but the fire or the oven, and I shouldn't think baking would be useful."

"Sam," said little Primrose, looking very puzzled, while Clover silently knit her brows over the difficulty, "why don't you tell us what you mean at once?"

"Because I want you all to think and find out," said Sam. "You must not be ignorant little gardeners; I want you to learn."

"And do I want to learn," said Clover? "but how can we?"

"Now, here"—said Sam, taking up the three lists in one hand and the Catalogue in the other—"here I find, first, the Useful list—containing, we will say, two hundred and eight half hardy, and two which are sometimes at least called tender. The Easy—Useless contains six hardy annuals, two half hardy, one tender: while the Sweet list has four hardy and four half hardy."

"But what does half hardy mean?" said Lily; "and how can seeds be tender?"

"That is just what I want you to find out. Study your lists, and study Mr. Vick's Catalogue, and make up your own minds how the different seeds should be treated. Then you can tell me what sort of artificial heat you want, and I'll try if I can procure it."

"What delightful work!" said Clover. "Sam, you're very good!"

"Well, wouldn't it be wiser to choose seeds that don't cost so much trouble?" said Lily.

"Every one must judge for himself," said Sam, with a smile at his mother as he rose to go. "I shan't write the order for the seeds till to-night, so you can all make what changes you please. Study Mr. Vick."

And away went Sam, leaving the three children in a pleasant state of uncertainty, excitement, and business. Lily took up the Catalogue and lounged down on the window-seat, turning the refreshing leaves back and forth; Clover gave one loving look at her list, and then, folding it neatly together, laid it in her work basket, and took out her day's task of sewing; and little Primrose, bringing up a round foot-cushion to her mother's feet, sat down and rested her face on her small hand, and fell at once into a deep brown study.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 9, 1866.

THE SITUATION.

IT is strange that those who defend against all comers and at every hazard what is called the President's policy do not see that they weaken their case instead of strengthening it by claiming that it is expressly constitutional. On the contrary, the difference between its advocates and those who are unwilling to accept it is purely one of expediency. For what is the Presidential theory? It is simply that the condition of the country at the close of active hostilities compelled him to adopt certain measures for the preservation by the States of their local governments and of their relations in the Union, which they have accepted and are restored. But there is not a word of express warrant for these measures in the Constitution. They were what in his judgment the public safety required. They were limited, indeed, by a certain theory of the perpetuity of a State in the Union, but that theory made the measures themselves mere usurpation. If the States were never out of the Union—to use an expression which has become a cant—what right had the President of the United States to appoint a Provisional Governor? The reply can be only that the public safety required it. But if he had the right to take so radical a step as that, he had the same right to do whatever else he conceived the public safety to require. This position puts the subject exactly the same authority that his predecessor's emancipation proclamation had, and that authority is ample, and founded in the first necessity of society and government.

If now the advocates of the general policy which he favors, and which is in many respects admirable, base their argument upon its expediency merely as opposed to the expediency of some other policy which is founded upon a different estimate of the requirements of the public safety, there would be much less acrimony in the discussion. This is what we mean by saying that the difference in the Union party is one of mind rather than of principle. The President says that the late rebel States, having assented to the conditions which he tho ught the public safety demanded, are entitled to exercise their national relations. Those of the Union party who differ from him insist that some other conditions are essential. It is simply unwise for loss to insist that his conditions are the only ones which the Constitution authorizes, for the letter of the Constitution authorizes none at all. It is a question of expediency. The President thinks that he has gone far enough. There are those who think that we ought to go further.

Mr. SEWARD is certainly right in saying that prolonged reflection brings us all nearer to a common conclusion. Active hostilities ended so suddenly that opinions upon the questions which immediately became imperative were vague and uncertain. Opinions golden opportunities were lost, but once gone they could not be recovered, and regret was folly. The ship of state must be trimmed to the breeze of to-day, not of yesterday nor of to-morrow. Politics is the art of expediency. Statesmanship must strive for all of the best that is possible under a fair estimate of the circumstances. Don't jump until you come to the river, said Mr. LINCOLN, and don't try to swap horses in the stream. The first duty of every man is certainly, as Dr. CHANNING says, to ask not what is expedient but what is right. But his second duty is not less clear and imperative. It is to ask what is the present situation that he may best secure the right. Mr. BRIGHT, in England, believes in "manhood suffrage," but he supports with all his power the Reform bill which only enfranchises some 400,000 more of the population. Can Mr. BRIGHT be fairly accused of betraying the rest of the people?

Those of us who believe as we do that the national faith is pledged to the maintenance of the equal civil rights of the freedmen, who hold that justice is the best policy, and that the interest of the Union and the prosperity of every part of it require the earliest practicable establishment of impartial suffrage as the surest security of equal rights, may honestly differ as to the wisest method of reaching that result. To charge any man with infidelity to the end because he prefers other means than ours is the very stupidity of folly. Mr. JOHNSON is not proved false because Mr. VALLANDIGHAM praises him, as Mr. LINCOLN was still true although Mr. PHILLIPS denounced him.

The prospects of a reasonable understanding among Union men seem to us fairer now than they have been for a long time. If, as now seems probable, Congress shall ask only for a constitutional amendment equalizing representation, basing it upon voters, the President can hardly oppose it, for it is his own frequent proposition. We have no doubt that Congress, as the immediate representatives of all faithful citizens will accept and vote for it, and that a gladly abolish all political distinction founded upon complexion. But it is plain that this result will be sought not directly but indirectly by proportionately reducing the political power of the States that maintain such distinctions. Here, again, the President has often plainly declared his sympathy with the enfranchisement of colored citizens by the States. Unless he misstates his own opinions there is really no substantial difference upon this point between the policy he favors and that which Congress is likely to adopt.

We have all so much the habit of fighting that it is hard to realize that the new war of opinions upon each other. The President reaches his conclusions by other processes than many of us pursue. Congress, elected in the midst of a civil war, represents the exalted sentiment of a nation struggling for life. But it has won. Its life is secure and its whole system purified. The passions of war and of fighting the struggle are the measures of the prostration of the vanquished. They do not love us, and will not. They do not profess repentance; it is idle to ask it. All we can do is to secure the future not by conscriptions, confiscations, disfranchisements, executions, the utter futility of which the experience and human nature explains—not by any methods of vengeance, but by those equitable, political guarantees which the truly conservative component of the country and of mankind will approve.

THE PROBABLE WAR IN EUROPE.

IT is more than half a century since there was a general war in Europe. The last one was that of the overthrow of NAPOLEON and the treaty of Vienna in 1815. That treaty was Tory and reactionary. England, which was the sole truly constitutional power in that Europe, was chiefly represented at the Congress by Lord CASTLEREAGH, a Tory of the old school, and the distribution of Europe was made in the interest of the kings, and not of the people. "That the people are the property of certain royal families," said FRANCIS HORNER, "was to be established as a maxim in the system of Europe."

Time brings its revenges. One of the cardinal points of the settlement or 1815 was that the Bourbons should be forever ineligible to the French throne. In 1821 the great NAPOLEON died at St. Helena. In 1832 his son, the Duke de Reichstadt, died at Vienna. In 1848 his nephew, LOUIS NAPOLEON, was Emperor of France, with the consent of the European sovereigns, who, by acknowledging his title as Napoleon III., do tacitly recognize the Duke of Reichstadt as NAPOLEON II., and, by implication, his father as NAPOLEON I.; and LOUIS NAPOLEON holds in his hand the redistribution of power in Europe.

Prussia, under the government of a despotic King and a daring Minister, has been for some time plainly intending war with Austria, upon pretense of some Schleswig-Holstein difficulty, but really with the hope of becoming the dominant power of Central Europe. Austria, composed of several nationalities, and for that reason essentially the weakest of the great powers, alarmed and trembling, looks for the support of the smaller German states, which are important only as members of a confederation which the triumph of Prussia would destroy. But Italy, blazing with patriotic enthusiasm and sustained by a vast army, sees that the hour has come for reclaiming Venice, and is all in motion. The British Government, bitterly denouncing the impending war as causeless, proclaims its neutrality. But as half the supplies of food for England come from the Continent, which would force her to look to America for them, and as Russia has come to unsettled enmity, it is not plain that she could avoid a part in the struggle.

As for France, if LOUIS NAPOLEON could fulfill his traditional policy and push her border to the Rhine, he would incalculably aggrandize his dynasty and identify it with the glory of France. That result is impossible so long as the settlement of 1815 continues. But the war inevitably demolishes that settlement, and makes the bank of the Rhine attainable by France. Attainable, therefore, he must favor the war; but it was unnecessary for him to speak except upon extraordinary occasion, and that was furnished in a late debate of the French Chambers.

On the 3d of May one of the French Ministers, M. ROUHER, said that the Government preferred not to discuss the question of the war. But some days afterward M. THIERS, the poet of the old Napoleonic epopee, the pet of the bourgeoisie, or the Parisian shop-keeping class, and the leader of the Opposition, replied in a speech which caused such sensation that the sitting of the Chamber was suspended for an hour. In this speech THIERS asserted that the balance of power in Europe required that Germany and Italy should be composed of separate and feeble states. He said that this principle was proclaimed at the peace of Westphalia in 1648, and that it was confirmed in the next century by FREDERICK the Great, and again in this century by the Congress of Vienna. But the policy of Prussia was inimical to this intention. It would found a great empire in Central Europe which would be irresistible. France must therefore courteously protest against the action of Prussia, and must say plainly to Italy that, if she attacked the statu quo by seizing Venice and Trieste, the French force would not lift a finger to save her from Austrian vengeance. This speech M. THIERS called a last effort in favor of peace, of the good of his country, and the honor of his Government.

LOUIS NAPOLEON is not a fool. He heard the leader of the Conservative opposition to the Government declare that the true policy of France is the maintenance of the settlement of 1815, which excludes him from the throne upon which M. THIERS, Majesty, therefore, rolled smoothly with the Empress to the quiet old city of Auxerre upon the Yonne, ninety miles southeast of Paris; and when the Majesty told the Ex-Queen that she had told the Empress (Mademoiselle MONTIJO) that her son's ancient and loyal Auxerre would be forever at his service, LOUIS NAPOLEON said, "Thank you, your Majesty, you country people are the true France, and you hate as I do the treaty of Vienna." Paris swore terribly the next day at the Emperor for the remark; the lips of NAPOLEON's nephew that a war directed against the settlement which dethroned and humiliated his uncle, and which, if successful, could guide success, was a war with a treaty that he detested.

In my view the European settlement of 1815 is doomed. The question possible only upon condition of negotiations which would annul it, and war can not leave the situation as it finds it. Peace, however, is almost impossible when vast armies in neighboring territories have been accumulated, when a war loan has been made, and when conviction, passion, and apparent interest urge the combatants forward. The European war, which seems inevitable, is the hand of NAPOLEON BONAPARTE proudly tearing the treaty of Vienna and flinging it away.

OPINION NOT TREASON.

SENATOR DOOLITTLE is reported to have said in a late public speech, that "the union of the States under the Constitution is the corner-stone of the American Government, and he who denies it, let him come from the South, East, West, or North, is a traitor." Now that the Constitution is the bond of union is an undeniable proposition. It is as unquestionable as that respiration is the condition of human life. It was scarcely worth while for Senator DOOLITTLE to take a journey to Philadelphia or the sole purpose of saying that twice two are four. But when he proceeds to declare that any other opinion is treason, he commits a foolish error, or the Constitution to which he exhorts obedience expressly defines treason to consist in levying war against the United States.

An opinion can not be treason. It may be false. It may be dangerous. It may lead to treason as the doctrine of State sovereignty did. In a time of actual war its expression may be an efficient aid to the enemy, and therefore the expression may be properly repressed. But to denounce any abstract political opinion as treason is to commit the unpardonable sin of Rome against the human mind, and strike at the liberty of thought. The Southern school of politics in this country has always held and proclaimed the theory of State sovereignty, and it has always been plain that if reduced to practice that theory would lead to civil war. But that opinion was not treason until it fired at the Star of the West. If it were, Senator HAYNE was as guilty as QUANTRELL. It seems to us that a Senator of the United States should be slow to charge so cardinal a distinction. We pay Mr. DOOLITTLE the compliment of believing that he does not consider Mr. FESSENDEN equally guilty with LOUIS WIGFALL and JAMES M. MASON.

It is very necessary that this distinction should be observed during the great debate in which we are now engaged. The question of reorganization is to be settled by argument, not by rhetorical vituperation. When Mr. STEVENS says that the late rebels should be shot, or Mr. CONWAY informs us that they behave like saints, nothing is gained except a conviction that neither of those gentlemen are likely to give any valuable counsel in the emergency. So when Mr. DOOLITTLE declares by plain implication that those who do not agree with him are traitors, he also certifies his inability to treat the question as it should be treated. An argument which is adequately answered by saying "You're another," is not a very powerful argument.

THE LAST LESSON OF THE ACADEMY.

DURING the last sixty-eight years there have been forty-four theatres destroyed by fire in the City of New York. This is at the rate of one for about every eighteen months; but it is an agreeable fact that the loss of life has been very small. The most melancholy incident was the burning of the theatre in Richmond, Virginia, on the night of the 26th of December, 1811. It was crowded, and more than seventy persons perished, among whom was the Governor of the State. What horrors we were spared by the breaking out of the late fire at the Academy of Music at 12 o'clock at night instead of 10 we shall happily never know. But it was impossible to stand by the ruins on the morning after the fire and not shudder at the appalling peril to which the audiences in that building have been exposed.

It is shameful and incredible that any building liable to be crowded with human beings should be set up as fit for the Academy of Music by was, and as most theatres and public halls in this country are. There are many persons in all our cities and towns who never enter any place of public assembly because of their knowledge of the foolish risk. There are large halls in upper stories used for concerts, for theatres, and lectures, which will contain from a thousand to two thousand people, which are constantly packed with crowds, and from which, in case of alarm, the only egress is by a few stairs down and a staircase or two. The lives of those persons are at the mercy not only of a real peril but of a mere panic. When that peril is plainly revealed the easy public confidence is disturbed and often destroyed. Thus in Providence there was a large and handsome hall in a third story directly over a furniture warerooms, full of furniture and the most inflammable material. One night after the hall had been crowded at a lecture the building took fire and was consumed like tinder. There was a good Yankee sense enough in the city not to run that dismal risk forever, and a spacious hall was built upon the ground-floor open upon three sides to the street, and so arranged with windows and doors as to be emptied in five minutes. That hall, of course, is very popular.

But the structure of buildings should be regulated by law. The law does not permit a flimsy, palpably insecure wall to be erected, and it should require just as temperatively that every building designed for the assembly of crowds should be practically fire-proof. As the spectator looked in at the ruins of the Academy there was nothing to be seen but the four brick walls, and a heap of bricks, mortar, and rubbish upon the ground, with a few charred timbers. The roof forged itself a theatre in many vacant space; that it is only a floor and a series of galleries; but for that very reason the audience is more exposed to the smoke and fire of every part where at once. It is because the scenery and the stage appointments must be of such timber that the more care should be used in the other parts of the building.

It would be ridiculous if it were not mournful to see the ease and celerity with which fire consumes "fire-proof" stores and other buildings in the city of New York. A brick wall and an iron shutter apparently satisfy us as security against fire, when every floor and beam is of wood, and a passing fire in the free-center of the flames is left all through the building. Some weeks since an article appeared in these columns suggesting a little more sense in building; but the matter should be regulated by law before some ghastly accident convicts us of criminal folly.

Meanwhile, if the Academy is to be rebuilt as is announced, we trust that the reporters will not merely expatiate upon the munificence and taste of the enterprising committee of superintendence, but will closely observe the structure tendence, but will closely observe the structure and carefully inform the public whether the floors are all wood laid upon wood, and whether elaborate masses of wooden filigree are every where accumulated; whether the exit from the upper and most dangerous gallery is by a narrow door or two; and whether, in a word, the theatre is a fire-box, which, in case of fire when full of people, would be sure to repeat, upon a fearful scale, the Richmond tragedy of 1811.

THE UNIVERSITY MEDICAL COLLEGE.

We speak elsewhere of the lesson of the late disastrous fire. But it laid its wasting hand not only upon our opportunities of amusement but of instruction, and it is in this way that its consequences are most serious and deplorable.

In the University Medical College, which was next to the Academy of Music, were stored the complete chemical apparatus of Dr. J. W. DRAPER, and the many exquisite and costly instruments with which for many years he has conducted his experiments. It was impossible to save them, and such a loss is incalculable to any one but a patient and exact scholar. Many unpublished notes of experiments were here with them, and important parts of the great telescope of Dr. HENRY DRAPER. Every scientific man and student will sympathize profoundly with these gentlemen in a loss for which money can but tardily compensate.

Dr. MOTT'S Museum also, a collection of illustrations of the surgical operations for more than half a century; the Museum of the old Lyceum of Natural History; the medical and surgical libraries of Drs. BERRIAN, POST, VAN BUREN, and PAINE, all are gone. The duty, as we believe it will be the pride of New York, is to replace these collections. The country as well as the city is impoverished by the late fire; but it is not according to the Yankee genius to suffer it to remain so.

FINANCIERING EXTRAORDINARY.

About three weeks ago gold, which had been for some weeks steady at 125 @ 127, jumped up to 130. The Secretary of the Treasury held at the time over $70,000,000 of gold—much more than he needed for the payment of interest of the public debt. He determined to sell a portion of this surplus, and accordingly, for some days, fed the market with two to three millions daily, at the rate of 130¾ per cent. Speculators and foreign bankers, aware of the state of affairs in Europe, were confident that gold would rise, and bought all the Secretary was willing to sell.

A slaughtered contest thus arose. On the one hand, the Secretary, with $60,000,000 of gold on hand (allowing for $15,000,000 sold), was determined that gold should not rise above 130. On the other hand, the public, persuaded that gold could not be kept down by any Secretary in the world, in the face of the war prospect in Europe and the high price of all commodities here, were as resolute buyers as he was a resolute seller. Newspaper organs of the Secretary denounced the "Gold-room speculators," and declared that the Government would sell every dollar it held rather than let gold go up. Other organs of public opinion were less clear as to the result. We trusted that Mr. M'CULLOCH would have better luck than befell his predecessor, Mr. CHASE, in his contest with the Gold-room.

Matters stood in this position, when, on Monday, May 21, at 4.15 P.M., the news of the panic in London was flashed over the wires from Halifax. Any child could tell what such news portended. Every broker, and every speculator, and almost every merchant in the city rushed to the Gold-room. The Government broker, Mr. PETER M. SMITH, was there, peddling out the Government gold at 130¾. Neither the unusual throng nor the astounding character of the news disturbed his calm complacency. He had his orders, and he would obey them. It had been pretty generally expected that on the receipt of the news the Government would either withdraw from the market for a time, or at least advance its rate. Nothing of the kind was done. In reply to inquiry, Mr. MYERS said he would never sit the old price, and to any amounts desired. A tumult broke out even more tempestuous than the wild scenes which were so often witnessed in the Gold-room during the war. Mr. MYERS was besieged, hustled, crushed, almost throttled by eager buyers of gold. So fierce and furious was the demand that in twenty minutes he sold, at 130¾ and ¾, some fifteen millions of gold—representing a sum of nearly $20,000,000 of currency. As he left the room a few minutes after five the excited buyers bid up the price to 132¾.

The question now was—which had won the fight, the Secretary or the speculators? It was clear that, after selling in all nearly $32,000,000 of gold, the Treasury had lost the control of the market. Its reserve was now reduced so low that it could not afford to sell any further amount large enough to frighten dealers. In a word, it had done what its friends had threatened it would do—poured out upon the heads of the speculators its gold by the ten and fifteen millions in a day, and the market had taken it, and the premium had advanced. Thus far, then, clearly Mr. M'CULLOCH, like Mr. CHASE, had been beaten.

But the question remained—how were the $15,000,000 in gold sold by Mr. MYERS on Monday afternoon to be paid for? Mr. MYERS had the right to deliver every dollar of this gold on Tuesday, and to demand greenbacks in payment. This was what Mr. M'CULLOCH'S friends said he would do. Had this been done, there was a money pressure which would have ensured that gold would inevitably have fallen back below 130, probably to 125, and the Treasury might at this figure have taken back some of the coin so recklessly sold on Monday afternoon at 130¾@¾. The banks were in the wildest trepidation. A renewal of the panic of April 1864 was expected. The speculators themselves trembled at the position in which they had got, and began to regret that they had undertaken to fight the Treasury. They entered the Gold-room on Tuesday morning feeling any thing but exultant.

But there seems to be a futility in the operations of our Treasury Department. On Tuesday morning, before the appearance of the Government broker, gold sold at 132¾. When he showed himself the premium fell to 131¾. Last price he offered was 131¾ demand. It was taken, and in a few minutes he had sold a million. Then his courage or the courage of his principals failed, and he declined further from the room. The premium instantly leaped to 134¾; and the parties who had to pay for gold, reassured by this indication of intimity of purpose on the part of the Government, began to hope that the Treasury would not exact its right of insisting on payment that day.

The event justified their hope. It was much over one-third of the gold sold on Monday was delivered on Tuesday; another portion of the amount was delivered on Wednesday, and the balance not till Thursday. The reason generally assigned was that the Sub-Treasurer had not certificates enough to deliver all at once. But the sale of the gold was continued, as may explain that gold is invariably delivered in the shape of gold certificates of deposit signed by the Sub-Treasurer, and of the denomination of $20 each, or $100, in bags or bulk, was long ago declared to be not a good delivery in consequence of the frequent discussions arising as to the weight of coin and the dangers involved in the transmission of bags from office to office. To deliver $15,000,000 of gold 3000 certificates would be required, and it was said that the Sub-Treasury had not so many on hand, and had not time to sign new ones in season for Tuesday's deliveries. This was lucky for the Bulls, but very bad unlucky for the Secretary. By distributing the deliveries over three days the money pressure proved much less severe than it would have been had the delivery been made on Tuesday, and the Secretary's victorious antagonists were enabled to hold the gold they had bought of him at 130¾.

But this matter of delay was not the only favor granted by the Secretary to the parties who had defeated him in the Gold-room. Lest they should experience any difficulty in paying for their gold, the Sub-Treasurer was authorized to receive as money debt-certificates not yet due, certificates which bore upon their face value with interest, and deposit certificates without notice. Of the two latter classes he did receive about $7,500,000; of debt certificates, including 5-20's, about $3,000,000. The Secretary not only sold to speculators fifteen millions of gold at 5 or 10 per cent. below the price which he refused on Monday, to pay for it had he not been bent on keeping down the premium to 130, but he actually furnished them with the means of paying for half their purchases by discounting for them paper before maturity. They naturally took advantage of such extreme complaisance, and on Thursday the premium on gold fell to 128¾. Quite a few of the lucky buyers realized their profits —having netted some $3,000,000 at the cost of the Government in an operation of a fortnight.

It used to be a maxim among the gamblers who thronged Wall Street and Exchange Place in Mr. CHASE'S time, that "Chase always wanted he did or said. When he tried to contract the currency the gamblers knew it was going to be expanded: when he tried to put gold down, they bought it. He professed an intense love of public stocks, they sold them. And, as a general rule, they were right. He meant well and honestly, but he could no more control events or contravene the laws of trade than King CANUTE'S courtiers could check the flow of the tide. Every time he interfered with the natural movement of affairs he made an error, recoiled against himself. When Mr. M'CULLOCH became Secretary better things were expected of his practical experience as a banker. But, thus far, he seems to be following pretty closely in the wake of his predecessor. He told us, at Fort Wayne and in his Treasury Report, that the currency was going to be contracted, instead of which it has been growing steadily more abundant, so that money has been cheaper this year in Wall Street than ever before, and prices are so high that we have nothing whatever to export to Europe. He undertook, with a surplus at his command much larger than the average reserve in the Bank of England, to keep gold below 130; it is nearer 140. His friends assured us that the speculators who had beaten him in the Gold-room would never be able to pay for their gold; he furnished them the money. Here is financiering with a vengeance!

THE COPPERHEAD AS A SIREN.

It would seem could sing a Copperhead might be a very Lorelei. But FATE has forbidden them the faculty of music. They can not escape themselves, nor conceal their true character from human gaze.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM, who dictated the policy of the Democratic party at the last Presidential election, by preparing the famous Dixgrace and surrender platform of the Chicago Convention, has just opened his arms fondly to embrace the President at the Convention of his party in the State which proved out Mr. VALLANDIGHAM by a hundred thousand majority three or four years ago. During the war Mr. V. was a bland apostle of peace, but now that peace has descended he sounds the note of alarm; he talks valiantly of "thrusting them [Congress] from the Capitol," and of using "the power of the purse and sword." He use these powers to save the country from armed rebels seeking to perpetuate human slavery shocked the gospel- ecklesses of Saint VALLANDIGHAM; but to apply them to drive out the representatives of the people legislating for the security of equal rights—that joyfully commends itself to his Democracy and Christian forbearance.

The Peace Democrats come understands the offered embrace of Mr. V. A kiss was long ago the sign of betrayal. When ARDEMUS GARDINER pulls true Democrats like Mr. CLEMENT VALLANDIGHAM, faithful citizens of the United States may well shudder. But while he remains as his advisers those whom Mr. LINCOLN called to Washington and the country the Copperhead charms in vain.

At the same Convention Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON also made a speech "praising the courage and the patriotism of Mr. JOHNSON." But Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON, who extenuated and justified the rebels during the war, and who was nominated at Chicago as the distinctive candidate of the surrender party, has also no mercy for Congress. He denounced the "malignant counsels of the radical Central Directory," and declares upon that theory that the Constitution even now, and who intended to throttle it. He is of opinion that the "radical majority of Congress has the Government and desire its overthrow." The same majority he also defines as "blind and bigoted Jacobins."

Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON was not always of this zealous turn. When it was not a question of loyal representatives legislating, but of armed rebels seeking the heart of the nation, Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON had no hard words for them. They were not malignant. They had no fact upon the throat of the Constitution. They were blind to no intention of ruling. They did not hate the Government, nor desire its overthrow . . They were not blind and bigoted Jacobins. Oh no! When in January, 1864, a resolution was introduced in Congress branding the rebellion which had already flooded the land with blood to destroy the Government as "causeless, wicked, and bloody," Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON voted against it. Three years before when the conspirators were planting their batteries over would not have melted in the blind mouth of Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON when he spoke of them. He acknowledged the right of Secession. He begged Congress, if the rebelling States could not be conciliated, to let them depart in peace. He had no rhetoric about "malignant councils," and throttled Constitution, and hate and desire of overthrowing the Government. He did not roar and scold, and stand with his fist clenched and foot raised to help them go. No, no! for from it! Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON was mild, he sobbed, he wept. It was the very ecstasy of maudlin grief. "If they must leave the family mansion," he whined and stammered, "I would bid them farewell so tenderly that they would forever be touched by the recollection of it."

Is it strange that General JOHN A. LOGAN said: "I would as soon vote for JEFF DAVIS as PENDLETON?"

Does Mr. PENDLETON suppose that the loyal people of this country have forgotten these things? Does he suppose that they have forgotten how he deserted the country in its hour of extremest peril? Does he suppose that they do not know that he was as radical a disunionist as JEFFERSON DAVIS? Does he not know that his opinion and advice upon the Constitution and the reorganization of the Union have exactly the weight that Mr. ROBERT TOOMBS'S or Mr. LOUIS WIGFALL'S would have? And if his party could not carry Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON while the event of the war was still uncertain, do they suppose they can win a race with him on one shoulder and VALLANDIGHAM on the other, now that the Union they despised is safe and the Government they spat upon is triumphant?

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

May 23:

In the House, the Bankrupt bill was passed, 68 to 59.

May 24:

In the Senate, the Report of the Committee of Fifteen was brought up, Mr. Howard opening the debate.

In the House, a resolution was adopted for repealing the Income-tax law, extending the amount exempted from $600 to $1,000.

May 24:

In the House, the Senate's amendments to the House joint resolution to prevent the introduction of cholera into the ports of the United States were concurred in, so that the joint resolution is passed by both Houses.

May 25:

In the House, Mr. Schenck reported back a substitute for the Bounty bill, which temporarily meets the previous question. The bill was passed by a vote of 119 to 8. It limits the promised bounty where the soldier died in the war, and there is no widow or minor children under sixteen years of age. It gives to each soldier, sailor, and marine eight and one-third dollars for each month of service, or $100 a year, deducting bounties already received for service.

VIEWS OF THE CABINET.

On the evening of May 30, Secretary SEWARD, at Auburn, made a speech in which he declared his views of our present political situation. The Secretary first alluded to the origin and progress of Democratic tactics upon the secession of President JOHNSON.

"This movement, he said, by the loyal expression of the Southern people, was accepted with the conditions of partial amnesty and restrictions to reinstating allegiance which were provided by the Administration, all of which recognized the principles, practices, and policy of secession and disunion, and required a new exercise of loyalty, reckoning their oaths, and brought forward with alarming rapidity the same parties heretofore hurried into rebellion by any chicanery there them to be turned upon the Constitutional Union which they had so recently destroyed. The unexpected changes in the attitude of political affairs at once so disheartened the recently excited conspirators, and apprehensions among loyal and tried Union men.

"Secretary SEWARD said Mr. JOHNSON, on the part of many in the Union party whether this co-version was sincere. How could Democrats and rebels be reconverted to the support of a triumphant Union administration? This question was answered where put by the united leaders of the Union party. It was at that moment that I announced that secession by taking effect was; 'For could Democrats and rebels avoid being converted? Is it not now convincing that you are converted? Is it not just now desire? I expressed the opinion that the condition of peace with the new opposition must be overwhelmed in its good faith accepted. I advised prompt and complete reconciliation, but to be reformed in case of new constitutional supremacy of the Union. Rejecting the ungenerous counsels that the rebels and their Democratic abettors were only changing their political strategy with traitorous purposes, I urged that, with the loyal and patriotic citizens, they were now to be received and accepted as fellow-citizens and brethren. I argued that they would be safely done if only the tried friends of the Administration, and those who had been compelled by force of the revolting their justly-acquired prestige, should themselves prosperity and constitutionally recure to the people the enjoyment of soberly-desired peace and independently-required energy.'

The Secretary then spoke of the rapid progress of peace and reconciliation. He said that in the States the Federal Government and these restored and reorganized State governments there was now a harmonious and practical harmony than has ever before prevailed between the General Government and the members of the Union established."

Mr. Seward then alluded to the conflict between the President and Congress. He said that there was no writ, nor difference between them. What the latter needs "is reconciliation, and just now it needs nothing more. It needs, moreover, a loyal little of fire. It needs a reconciliation between the Senators of the United States who are now acting in the Senate Senators of the United and qualified for membership of the Senate, have been already in the House declared by the votes of the loyal States which were latter involved in the rebellion. It needs a reconciliation of the same kind between the members of the House of Representatives who are now acting and loyal members already elected or to be elected by the people in the same before-mentioned States. It needs just this loyal and practical reconciliation, and nothing more.

"A failure of reconciliation for an indefinite period could and could be nothing less than a practical abandonment of the nation to the rebellion. It would be disunion and restoration would be Slavery and Secession again."

In regard to the Civil Rights Bill, Mr. Seward said: "There is no room for doubt that in our political system if the personal or civil rights of each member of the State, native or born, free-born or emancipated, naturalizers or naturalized, are not more secure under the administration of the General Government than they can be under the administration of the National Government. Harmony is essential to the existence of the Union, and this is the reason if every State is not left free from constitutional interference in the exercise of its civil rights. Nevertheless, the Civil Rights bill inflicts on the late disaffecting States, now that slavery has ceased to exist. The very aggression which, through the Fugitive Slave Law, the slave States committed upon the States."

The day after this speech was made by Secretary Seward he left for Washington a reconciled man. President and his cabinet, and in nearly every case their political views were altered.

Secretary Welles was brief: "You are one and all," he wrote for the Union, I agree, and the Constitutional rights of the rights of the States. These are my views."

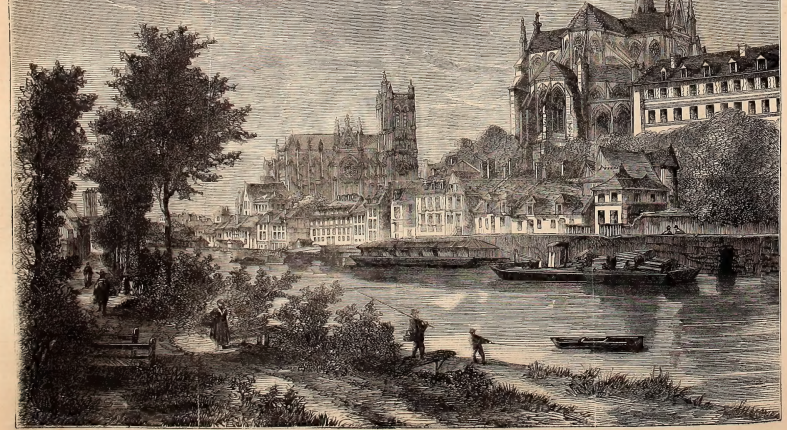
Secretary Stanton spoke at length, and at first bent in favor, he said, that negro suffrage ought to be demanded of the States, but he had concluded it was not imperative. He had advised the President to approve the Freedmen's Bureau Bill. He opposed the consolidation of the Civil Rights Bill, neither did he condemn it but he seemed to think there was room for hesitation that military rule in the South might result in legislation unfavorable to Southern citizens and to the Union. He was opposed to the disfranchisement clause of the amendment proposed by the Reconstruction Committee.

Secretary M'Culloch's speech was a capsule and hearty endorsement of President Johnson's policy in particular. He concluded thus: I have desired and hoped for the continuance of this great Union during my life, which I have ever been identified [cheers]; but if the leaders can not command success in the present session of the Committee, I am greatly apprehensive that its days will be shortened. I trust, fellow-citizens, that this will not be the case; that it will discard its hostility, and its attempt to create antagonism between the two departments of the country, and that it will embrace those principles, which look to harmony, to restoration, and to peace. If it should do this, it will still continue to be the great and controlling party of power, and will continue to fulfill its honorable glory. If it does not, its days are numbered, and the republic will be overthrown. I will be the last here to prosecute the war with vigor, but it lacked the wisdom to avoid the evil of the benefits of victory."

Secretary Stanton feared that if the differences between the President and Congress were not adjusted the Union party would suffer dissolution. The situation was better than at the beginning of the session. There was no longer any talk of holding the Southern States as conquered provinces. "The work of reunion," he said, "calls for every concession authorized by the Constitution. And I am sure that this concession will be made, and the results of the war by which the nation was preserved will be secured and perpetuated on the basis of peace and concord between the people of all sections of our country."

OSSIP IVANOFF KOMMISSAROFF KOSTROMSKOI, THE ENNOBLED PEASANT WHO SAVED THE CZAR'S LIFE.

COUNT BISMARCK, PRIME MINISTER OF PRUSSIA.
[SEE PAGE 366.]



OSSIP IVANOFF

KOMMISSAROFF KOSTROMSKOI.

As the enthusiasm about the newly-made nobleman who was the means of saving the Czar's life continues in St. Petersburg, we give his portrait, and a few particulars of the man who is for the time being the idol and subject of conversation of all Russia.

OSSIP (JOSEPH) IVANOFF KOMMISSAROFF, a young man of twenty-five, was born in the village of Molvitino, province of Kostroma. The village belongs to BARON KUSTEN to whom KOMMISSAROFF stands in the relation of a liberated annuity-paying serf. Having been lately allowed to go to St. Petersburg and work in a hatter's shop, he soon rose in his calling, became foreman, and married a peasant girl. The 16th April being his birthday, he went to say his prayers in the chapel near the house of PETER THE GREAT. Going to the river-side, close to the Marble Palace, he perceived that the bridge was removed and the passage temporarily interrupted. Retracing his steps, he then made his way to the Summer Garden, at the gate of which a crowd was assembling round an Imperial equipage. Knowing the carriage to be the Emperor's and longing for the happiness of beholding his Majesty, he joined the crowd waiting for the monarch's arrival. Presently there was a stir in the crowd, and he saw the CZAR in an overcoat. His Majesty approached the carriage, and was putting on his cloak, when a young man, who had been standing behind KOMMISSAROFF tried to push him aside. This individual had repeatedly attempted to penetrate through the surrounding crowd and get nearer the carriage; but KOMMISSAROFF, wishing to see the Emperor, would not suffer him to squeeze through and plant himself before him. At the moment when the Emperor was putting on his cloak the individual, pushing KOMMISSAROFF forcibly aside, made his way to the front ranks of the multitude. KOMMISSAROFF followed him closely. Hardly had the assassin got near the Emperor when, drawing a pistol from underneath his overcoat, he leveled it at the Emperor. KOMMISSAROFF, who had noticed the movement, instantly caught him by the arm, and, diverting the pistol from its aim, caused it to discharge in the air.

The family name of the Czar's deliverer has been changed into that of KOMMISSAROFF KOSTROMSKOI, in memory of the province which has twice furnished saviours to the Imperial house in moments of danger. He finds himself suddenly enriched and ennobled by the favor of the grateful CZAR, and he is the object of a romantic and passionate enthusiasm on the part of the loyal population of the Russian capital. Whenever he shows his face in the streets he is pounced upon and kissed by moujiks; his door in the Kirpitchnoi Pereoulok, where temporary apartments have been taken for him by the Crown until his new house shall be ready, and where he is waited on by servants in the Imperial livery, is besieged day and night by an eager crowd, all anxious to catch a glimpse of the saviour of the CZAR'S life; he has been enrolled honorary member of all the clubs at St. Petersburg and Moscow; his health is drunk at all entertainments, many of which are held solely for the purpose of doing him honor; his photograph and that of his wife meet the eye in every window and are hawked about at every ten steps. Besides the original grants of money and estates from the Imperial purse and the public subscriptions opened for him in all the great towns, golden swords, estates in land, given by private individuals, precious images, and every imaginable kind of present continue to pour in upon the ci-devant hatter's apprentice. His patent of hereditary nobility has been made out, and the ukase from the Emperor ALEXANDER on the subject has already appeared in the public journals. The most astounding feature in the whole business is the fact that General TODLEBEN, the talented defender of Sebastopol, has been selected, as a kind of tutor, to look after, advise, and generally educate the bewildered young man.

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XXII.

It really must not be indulged in, this tendency to loiter along the way—a tendency caused by birth and long residence under Southern skies. We must quicken our pace over these pages to keep up with events falling in rapid succession.

There is the march of the Federals upon Atlanta. The Somerville Star has kept all of us in Somerville fully aware of every thing relating to that. It is a thrilling narrative as told us from Star to Star. Let us think. We give up Chattanooga, a place of no use to the Federals, and the abandonment of which is a positive advantage to the Confederate cause in every way—there is a motive in it. That motive we all understand and exult in when we have the Star and all the bells in town triumphant over the total defeat of Rosecrans soon after, and the reoccupation of Chattanooga, capturing therein stores and munitions of war enough to supply the whole South for two years.

Captain Simmons, standing in Jem Budd's shop, is full, as Jem, in paper cap, dirty face, leathern apron, files and tinkers away at his gun-making and mending, of it. During two hours he discusses with Jem the splendid strategy of General Bragg, and its complete success; to all of which Jem says, at intervals, "As you say, Captain." "Exactly so, Sir." "Just what I say." "Precisely." "Yes, Sir; of that we may be sure."

Yet when, not a week after, Dr. Warner, in attendance upon poor, pale little Mrs. Budd, upon whom he is always in attendance for that matter, says to Jem, sitting in the room, by the fireside for the convenience of spitting as he smokes: "And so it turns out that the Federals were not driven out of Chattanooga, Mr. Budd. Having read the accounts of the way in which they had fortified themselves there, I really did not for a moment suppose that other report was true, did you?" Jem spits and replies, "Certainly not," and weaves in his habitual affirmatives to all that Dr. Warner has to say.

"Eighteen months!" the Doctor ejaculates a moment after. "People at the North wouldn't believe it. And the way you have managed to keep it close, too! I have feared a hundred times—"

"See, Doctor," breaks in Jem, taking his pipe

THE DOCTOR HAS GOOD NEWS.

from his mouth in order to lower his tone, "Alf couldn't get shet of conscription any other way. You know how we hammered at it for ever so long before we could fix it up. The cotton-mill Mrs. Budd's notion; we laughed at it, Alf and I, at first: Then we all thought, when Alf first hid there, the war would 'a been over long ago. He's there, and there's nothing else to do but stay there that I can see;" and Jem resumes his pipe.

"Why, he's making a fortune in shoes, man, if your wife does get the credit of it. But what preposterous letters he writes! Dr. Ginnis was giving me all the contents of that last one from New York," says Dr. Warner, with glee. "I could hardly keep it in."

"Oh, that's Alf's fun; only recreation he has, Doctor," pleads Mrs. Budd, whose whole existence is invested in Alf and Jem. "But you can't tell how comfortable he is down there. Often comes up after night. Alf's got as fair as a girl there out of the sun. But oh! if the war would only end! I am so tired, tired! And Mrs. Isaac Smith came so near finding Alf out that day. It would kill me if they was to get Alf," adds poor little Mrs. Budd. "And he won't go with the Federals now he has a chance. Says he wants to see it out here in Somerville; as if he sees any thing!"

"You see, Mr. Budd," says Dr. Warner at last, perfectly grave as he rises to leave, "we Secessionists are pursuing a masterly policy. You will not forget to give Mrs. Budd the powders; those last bells were a little too much for her."

"And you really, really do think—" says pale little Mrs. Budd, smiling through the borders of her preposterously beruffled night-cap. With her preposterously berufflied night-cap. With her clergymen, sea-captains, and physicians women are always confidential.

"I really, really do, ma'am," replies Dr. Warner, with unctuous energy. "Just wait a little. Yes, a masterly policy. We are retreating toward Atlanta only to draw the Federals deeper into the country, away from their base, their gun-boats, and all that. Oh, don't let any fear of that keep you sick; we are bound to whip them. Your husband will tell you the same." And Jem Budd, with a responsive grin upon his usually sedate countenance, says, "Exactly what I say, Lucy. Oh, we'll whip 'em, we'll whip 'em!"

Only there is more smiling all around than the conversation, apart from its peculiar tone, would warrant—a degree of cordiality, too, among the parties.

"And Alice Bowles is actually teaching school?" asks Mrs. Budd as Dr. Warner is drawing on his gloves.

"Hard at it, ma'am. You mustn't think badly of her when I tell you, with her absurd raising, it was death almost to her to do it. She always was a noble girl. They are very much pressed, you know we all are now, but very much pressed indeed. The discipline she is enduring is the very thing for her, be the making of her," says the physician.

"I always thought so much of Alice," says weak little Mrs. Budd, "because she is so pretty and strong. She often comes to see me. She knows all about Alf. How she laughed when I told her! Ah me! Doctor, I never was very strong; but once, years ago, Jem there, at least he said so—"

"Thought you were very pretty, ma'am," interrupts the Doctor, "and was perfectly right, ma'am. Only wait until you get your health again, Mrs. Budd—until our glorious independence is secured, you know!"

"Just what I tell Lucy," adds her husband, with a smile. Mrs. Budd is not the only pretty girl whose beauty gives place to ill health within a very few years after marriage in southern climes—fair, frail creatures, whose day is like that of the butterfly in more respects than one.

"I tease Alice about Tim Lamum and Mr. Neely and all her other beaux," says Mrs. Budd, whom Dr. Warner's visit has greatly enlivened, "but I never dare mention Mr. Arthur to her."

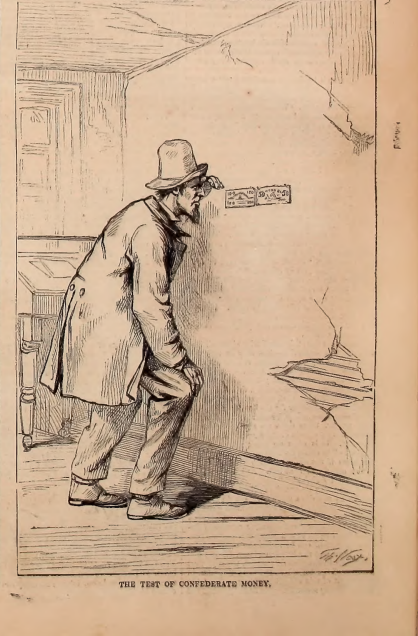
"Such a traitor, you know," adds Dr. Warner. "Pity, pity!"

"Exactly so!" says Jem Budd, reflecting the Doctor's smile.

"Not much worse than Jem here, I'm afraid," puts in Mrs. Budd, with the same light upon her face. "He never says a word to me, Jem don't—not to a soul since this thing began; but I'm afraid Jem's a bad, bad man!"

"Exactly as I say!" adds Jem, following the Doctor to the door with a candle and a grin.

And there is many another among the men still left in Somerville, who has none so sedate and non-committal as he. Very often have Dr. Warner, old Mr. Adams, and the like been favored with a wink and an aside smile which said as plain as words, "A good joke, ain't it?" by individuals in the very heat of jubilation amidst a crowd over foreign intervention, glorious victory, iron-plated Confederate fleet, Northern sickness of the war, and all the rest. The number of these equivocal individuals in Somerville is great, is increasing, their facetiousness becoming more undisguised every day.



And so the times roll on. We are not without news in these days in Somerville. Sure enough, the Federals are being drawn slowly but steadily away from Chattanooga. With unprecedented folly they persist in walking blindly, madly into the fatal trap. We whip them at Dalton, we rout them with terrible slaughter at Marietta, yet they still have enough left to follow our army, fallen back to entice them still further in. Such a series of Confederate victories we have never yet enjoyed. Full details by the column; little items, like grains of pepper, in all the corners of every paper. "The destruction of Sherman's army is more complete than had been supposed." "We have totally destroyed Sherman's line of communication with Chattanooga." "It is now well known that at Kenesaw Mountain Johnston will spring his trap, the enemy being drawn sufficiently into it."

MISCEGENATION ARGUMENT.

Then follows the brilliant victory achieved by Hood, now in command, over Sherman at Atlanta; of this we have the official accounts and the—bells.

THE TEST OF CONFEDERATE MONEY.

It is just following this that Mr. Arthur, rising in to the Post-office very early one morning, goes direct from the office to Mr. Ferguson's room. So early, in fact, that he finds that gentleman still in bed. As to Mr. Arthur, he is wide awake, very ruddy and fresh.

"If you please, let me have the key of your safe," he says, in high spirits, to his friend.

"Key of my safe?" And the Scotchman, drawing on his trowsers, hands that implement to his friend, taking it from under his pillow, watching grimly the futile efforts of Mr. Arthur to unlock the safe, or even to find the keyhole when he has the key.

"I wanted to make an entry in your Scrapbook," he explains at last, with boyish eagerness.

"An entry?" And Mr. Ferguson, holding up his trowsers with his left hand, has opened the safe in a moment.

"Atlanta has fallen!" His visitor can keep it back no longer; beginning with enthusiasm, his voice faltering as he says it, though. "Oh, Mr. Ferguson, Atlanta has fallen at last!"

Not a syllable from Mr. Ferguson, not a smile. If possible, more grim than ever. Yet, by a singular coincidence, he remembers, doubtless merely from the safe being open before the vista he is indicting, which he is not, to Mr. Arthur, and pays him two double eagles on account upon the spot. And Mr. Ferguson spends the whole of that day upon the streets—no particular business at all. For there is this peculiarity of the Union men—that when you never see them abroad, so far as they can help it, when the news is good, as it generally is in Somerville hitherto, for the Confederacy; so sure as it is bad, which will happen in spite of the Star occasionally, out they all swarm from their retreats, meeting each other, clinging warm hands and shaking doleful heads, with smiling faces, over the tidings at every turn and corner. Secessionists run unaware of it either.

The very next time Mr. Arthur rides in to the Post-office he is hailed before he can get from the iron yard of Dr. Warner's house. When ever he conveniently could Mr. Arthur rather avoided that residence. He imagined black eyes watching him through the windows, and, from mere sight of him, a terrible tongue set agoing. More than once Miss Rita and Miss Ivy Simes withdrawn from the Sunday-school, hailed him in opprobrious terms in passing, saluting him on one or two occasions with their political sentiments in the shape of pebbles. Until he is safely past the house he is not sure but Mrs. W. may herself emerge and send scourge him with her tongue. For he often hears of the frequent and various ways in which she has expressed her ardent desire that Arthur may be disposed of. Truth is, he has a mortal terror of the lady in question.

So that when he is hailed this morning, as he rides by as was to the Post-office, he nervously starts until he sees it is Dr. Warner. The Doctor, while shaving at the glass in his room, has seen the family passing, and now comes out in his shirt-sleeves and the soap upon his fresh, good-humored face to say, "Don't be in such a hurry—Arthur. And, leaning over the fence, Dr. Warner does not wait for an answer as to the health of Mrs. Arthur before he says, glancing behind him at the house and in a lowered tone of voice,

"Have you heard the news?"

"No. Some glorious Confederate victory?" Where was it?" deeming it best to show the Doctor and himself thereby that he expected and is prepared for the strongest news of that nature.

"Idoble has fallen!" pressing still closer to the fence, and speaking in a still lower tone.

"Are you certain?" Ah, what relief and satisfaction! You at the North supposed you devised pleasant news of Federal success—you knew nothing about it!

"Oh yes; that is, Farragut has captured the forts without a shot indeed. Of course the city fell at his mercy. We will hear by the next mail of his occupying the place." Which they didn't, nor for long after.

"All well!" asks his friend, for they both feel that they are standing in point-blank range of a battery, so not sure to protract the conversation.

"Yes; and, by-the-by, I will send out a barrel of sugar to Mrs. Sorel's this morning. I have been owing you"—which here, too, is not the case—"a long time. Well, good-by. Haven't got time to stop in, I suppose? I'll see you on the streets in the course of the day." And, sure enough, all the Union men are abroad to-day again, swarming forth in this last burst of sunshine like bees, with scarcely subdued buzz, too, the weather getting so pleasant!

"Thought I didn't see you?" is Mrs. Warner's sarcastic remark as the Doctor resumes his shaving. "I know the Doctor did not think how ever. "I'll bet a thousand dollars, when I come to hear it, there's bad news for the South. Something out there is moving like a great big log in your shirt-sleeves and half shaved to talk to a man that never enters your house. There's some bad news you needn't tell me! I can't see laughing when you told him; and I as good as heard him say, "Thank God, I'm glad of it!" Humph, I know one by this time!"

Which was the solemn fact; but the Doctor, with his head fallen into its old droop, shaves on, making the soap upon his mouth the best excuse for not saying any thing in reply. But, at last, Mrs. Warner has had so much to say as to call, nor half the bitterness in saying that which she used to exhibit.

There is, indeed, this peculiarity about all Secessionists in Somerville—it is only as they are excited that they are confident; the instant they cool they become doubtful. As a large number gathered to hear Colonel Ret Roberts or Captain Simmons, for the Captain, with a firm hold upon the desk in the Brother Barker's church—"Attention, one silver dollar for the benefit of the soldiers"—makes orations, Brother Barker opening with prayer, these days, we are enthusiastic, and positively certain of the success of the Confederacy. It is when we break up, go home, and are left to ourselves individually, that we get the ideas if not dialect of Bob Withers, "Are not to certain of it at last. At least, for one, by George I'm not sure."

Of one thing we are, thank Heaven! perfectly certain as the days glide by. We do not pretend to understand what Sherman and Hood are about marching hither and thither. Davis has told us at Macon that Sherman's capture of Atlanta is to be to him a Moscow defeat at last. Leaving out of consideration the conflagration of Moscow and the Russian winter, rolling discrepancies in the historic parallel, we only pray to hear of the total destruction of Sherman in fulfillment of the official prophecy. After the first sickening sensation upon hearing of the fall of Atlanta we recuperate, confidently counting upon Sherman's great disaster as only a question of time, for Davis has said it.

Of another thing we are even more certain—the defeat of Lincoln at the approaching election. For months the Somerville Star has been filled with articles from Northern papers—themselves so replete with denunciation of Lincoln, so confident of his speedy fall, that we only wonder the Nation, in its intense and unanimous hatred of Lincoln, is willing to wait until election day to hurl him headlong from his place. We know that the Democrats propose to bring the bayonet to bear upon the polls: there may be a few votes cast for him by office-holders; but there will be no universal fight at every election precinct in the North. We would prefer Mr. Clellan should be elected by open accounts, as it costs a good deal upon neither candidate being elected, but the whole mockery of a government there being another war, exploded, totally wrecked by the convulsions sure to shake the land upon election day.

Lamunn Jarticles, a series of them, to prove it. Captain Simmons made a description of these approaching convulsions a thrilling point in his oration, the earthquake in Lisbon being the tremendous illustration thereof, himself tottering in the stand as he spake, in a manner exceedingly embarrassing to the boys at the approaches there is a slackening of public certainty somehow.

"I have hoped M'Clellan might be elected, Dr. Warner has said to Mr. Arthur in the security of Mr. Ferguson's room.

"You have?" exclaims that gentleman, with as much surprise as pain.

"Why, yes," says Dr. Warner, rubbing the phrenological organ, whatever it is, immediately behind the ear with his fowzinger. "I see no end to the bevilment. Secessionism cannot party might conciliate in some way, compromise, arrange the thing," continues the fat, slovenly, thoroughly excellent physician, in a strong, generous, undecided manner. "Don't you?" he asks, doubtfully.

"I?" asks Mr. Arthur, with indignation "No, Sir! May Heaven forbid! There is only one plain rond: to carry the war steadily, unflinching till the rebellion is crushed. Which is accomplished. The election of M'Clellan I would look upon as the election of cavillation, weakness, the triumph of Copperheadism, anarchy, ruin! I am really amazed that you, Doctor, could look at it any other way. Don't you regard it in that light, Mr. Ferguson?

"Of course!" growls the Scotchman, in accents scarcely polite to Dr. Warner, considering as being at the moment a guest. "Not a sensible Union man North or South thinks otherwise. And yet when we hear in Somerville that Lincoln is actually elected, no man can answer clearly by that time than Dr. Warner that the Union men have greater cause to rejoice in this than in any other victory attained by the army. In fact that victory was the Waterloo of the whole war.

"If you can use it, or if you know any person —only you are a Secessionist, you know—who can use it, send out a wagon, send half a dozen negroes, and Mr. Adams says he never pay we hear in town of the re-election of Lincoln, to Mr. Arthur, whom he meets, as he might and did meet every other Union man in Somerville, upon the streets. "I've plenty of rye and oats left; you or any body, any body you can recommend, is sure of employment."

Very remarkable. Thin, and sharp, and cold as a razor is old Mr. Adams. A tough time of it Sam Barker had with Brother Barker before half of it before the war in getting a cent for any object out of old Mr. Adams, strenuous communicant of that church as he was. And Brother Barker's communion well knew and bewailed Brother Adams's stinginess. It was as well, as proverbially, known as his piety, and neither of which did most easily beset him, as was lying known to be Brother Peters's weakness. Only the latter, in times of temptation, which he often confessed, and, in terms so highly colored as to show the old vice ran in the very blood, bewailed it, while, heaven knows, it was the virtue of the kind. We all knew Brother Barker meant him in all his many hits at the penurious and close-fisted in and out of pulpit—all of us except the individual aimed at himself. Or if he knew it he only gripped his bivalves more firmly together, and, with his mouth impacted sides, like so much mere water.

But all that was before Secession. If any Secessionist, embalmed, either alive than by physical force, a horse, or a bottle of fodder, or a steen of corn, or a single ear of corn, or one ounce of meat from old Brother Adams, that fact is not upon record. To Union people, on the other hand, he has ever been thought to be liberal, and never possessed than he thought of going to hear Brother Barker or any other Secessionist preach. Strange and kind, also, to his servants, he was, sour and close, old Mr. Adams had hidden among his bones, like gold among the straits, a pure, strong love of country in the vein once struck was inexhaustible. How can we tell how much it cost his friends to elect Mr. Lincoln to the seat in No Neck? How many the way of bribes, the Star said. It certainly cost old Mr. Adams, when ever, in pork and corn and potatoes, hundreds, to get him out.

But we have no time in Somerville to reason about the results of Lincoln's re-election, the better exulting in it as to certain means—as hundreds of events have been before—of at last making the South a unit, and thoroughly arousing the people. Ah, how many, many theories were manufactured at the South during the war, such perfectly symmetrical and beautiful! Bubbles? Yes, but there we could blow them as fast as they burst, you know. Yet we have no time to discuss that question in our intense curiosity in reference to Lamunn just now.

"Yes, he has cut loose from Atlanta," Captain Simmons demonstrates the matter, newspaper in hand, to Dr. Gimis and Mr. Ellis collected in Jem Budd's shop out of the rain—"cut loose from Atlanta in sheer despair of getting out of Georgia by the way he came. Hood, you see, having got behind him. He is making—you see what the paper says—frantic efforts to escape by way of the Atlantic coast, his only hope left, sheer desperation."

"Oh, Lee from Richmond!" begins Dr. Gimis, excitedly.

"And the militia of South Carolina!" adds Mr. Ellis, still more eagerly.

"Of course we'll close in upon him. I have no more doubt of the capture of his entire command than I have of my existence. Davis's idea of having Atlanta become a trap on all who was good, as every thing from his consummate statesmanship is, but," continues Captain Simmons, "Sherman's position is worse than Davis supposed. Why, gentlemen, look at it, not one man, not a single gun he has but we are bound to get. In a certainty."

"A special Providence," says good Mr. Ellis. "I love to trace the hand of Heaven in our cause."

"That's just what I say," puts in Jem Budd, as he hammers away at a pair of pump-hard clenched in its vise upon his work-table. "Exactly what I say." Consequently while we are rejoiced thereby and glad to see the expected when we soon read in all the papers of the capture of Sherman. And, to make this good news complete, the same dates give tidings of Hood's capture of Nashville.

"What I always said," Jem Budd remarks to Dr. Gimis, who has entered the shop to see, in a languid way, if his revolver has all the silver mountings he has ordered for it; and who, cigar in hand, is lounging in a leathery drawer as he sits on Jem's work-bench, gives him all the details of these two glorious events as they have been coming in for some days past.

"Seems to me," Jem Budd ventures at last, punching and hammering away, none the less, at his work, "Brother Barker isn't as chirky as he used to be." He only says this to say something.

"An old woman!" vituperates Tim, with prompt profanity. For Brother Barker does not occupy the position in Somerville he used to be has in other unperceptible, incomprehensible manner dwindled and shriveled. Very few, indeed, at church those Sabbaths. Sabbathschool long ruinously closed.

Even grim Mr. Ferguson almost pities them, his respected fellow-citizens of the Secession persuasion, when he comes upon them at last! Comes upon them so suddenly, and with double blow! And herewith a fresh, and, alas! the worst one in store during in human nature, is evolved. As this:

"Any thing new in the paper this morning?" Dr. Warner asks, the very day after Tim Lamunn's conversation with Mr. Budd, of Dr. Gimis, with whom he has professional relations.

"Why, n-n-no. Some rumors, I believe; I have not had time to look carefully over the paper," says the Doctor, "some, what do you think now of that negro's wound? Not lockjaw supervening, do you think?"

"Have you seen the paper there, Captain Simmons? Any thing in it?" Dr. Warner—easy, good-natured Dr. Warner—frayed as to the edges of shirt-bosom and cuffs, gone as to half-dozen buttons or so on vest, neckerchief and hair disheveled and scattered abroad as by gusty winds, the only man in Somerville, so unanimous in opinion about him as we are in sentiment in reference to his wife; being on good terms with every body—every person in town, the Doctor asks the question in an indifferent way of the Captain.

"Nothing of any interest, Doctor; nothing at all," replies the Captain, folding up the paper as he speaks and putting it in his pocket, obliviously in a gold-mounted morocco case Barker extended for it. "The solemn truth is," continues the Captain, seriously, steadying himself, as he says it, with his right hand, and solemnity eyes upon those of his auditor, "there is no truth in the whole war. False hood I learn early in my infancy have I loathed it. Lying? Next to a Yankee, my soul abhors it. Sainted parents taught me that, and the printing press, Sir, has put into my earliest being. Sir," continues the Captain, "it is painful to say it, but men of my standing, of my years, of my position, have grown tired of laying a Mentor's hand upon his shoulder, 'should not hesitate to utter at the risk of their own personal reflections. Sir, I may repeat it, Sir, as from Captain Simmons, Lamunn is a Yankee, and Lamunn is a liar. Never had I the slightest faith in his success. No, Sir, was not failing. When I require your assistance to enable me to maintain an upright position—Sir, I say, Nothing new, Sir, in the paper, save foolish rumors—nothing at all."

"Nothing new, I'm told," Dr. Warner remarks to Mr. Ferguson, into whose room he next enters. "I was up all night with one of Judge Wright's boys who has given himself an ugly cut, or got ope some way."

"Nothing at all," replies, concisely, the Scotchman, who is busy with his accounts and note at his collection, "except that Sherman is in possession of Savannah with trifling loss, and Hood's army has been entirely routed before Nashville!"

"Bless my soul! and it must be true!" exclaims the electrified Doctor, his face ablaze with satisfaction.

"I beg you will let me pay you that little amount, Doctor," Mr. Ferguson says in conclusion of their professional business, a very animated conversation.

"Not one cent, Sir; not one cent. I will be positively offended if you ever mention it again," and both offer and refusal are in strict coherence with the news; and the Doctor leaves him a happier and a wiser man.

"I tell you just what it is, gentlemen! Why not say it if a fellow thinks it, by George! You all know I'm not a bad Southern man, but we are whipped, gentlemen, whipped, by George! and well whipped." It is Bob Withers makes the remark that same day in the presence of Captain Simmons and Mr. Ellis, in the store of the latter.

Only a few days ago, in Jem Budd's shop, I think it was, I said I was afraid about Sherman. You see I didn't see where the supplies were to come from to stop him. Besides," adds Captain Simmons, "Georgia is rotten—you mark my words, rotten, gentlemen. The short lived I don't see into. I can't believe it, and I won't. Sometimes we say of news 'It's too good to be true,' and that's true—with heavy swearing—"is too bad to be true?"

"For me," says Mr. Ellis, too nervous about the news to interfere with profanity, as he is ordinarily would, the profanity, "I endeavor to trace the hand of a just God in all events. It can't be we are to be subjugated, on one hand. It would be unjust, unjust, grossest injustice in—I mean the Almighty will not permit it, should not, will not" very much excited indeed.

"But look at it, gentlemen," reasons Bob Withers; "we've got our last men in the field, don't we? Every both knew as well as I, not a soul goes to the front if he can help it; neither of you gentlemen has the least idea of going, and you don't catch me going, by forever! Details for this, details for that, nothing but details. Then, it wouldn't do to talk this way about things before Uncle Sam, but we know that the soldiers are deserting, shoot them as fast as you please; but they will desert, sick of the war, want to get back to their sweet-hearts and wives. Lincoln elected for another four years, being whipped in all the fights, what's the use? they say. And, it's more than a recruiting officers dare to do, arresting them around here. Six enrolling officers shut down lately in my own knowledge by repeated soldiers.

"Mr. Withers," begins Mr. Ellis, excitedly.

"People are sick of the present war, except enough to pay taxes. Impressment is scaring people, by George! a little too fast; they shoot them down, by George! I know you won't take office as impressing officer!" Bob Withers continues.

"Mr. Withers, you really ought not," good little Mr. Ellis begins again, emphatically. Only more emphatically than he Mr. Withers professes.

"You hear it on every side, openly, 'I do this to keep out of the army,' 'I do that to keep out of the army.' As many now there as they by whole ranks at a time for desertion, it does no good, not a bit. Then, look at the country people—returned soldiers, I suppose—breaking down people's houses by night, demanding of old men, even of women and children, their money, or their their lives, and, let alone the cursing, every thing they can lay their hands on in ouess day. Then—"

"But what is the alternative, man?" Captain Simmons breaks in upon Mr. Withers, with energy enough to drown and overwhelm him. "Submission. Acknowledge the Abolitionists. Ab-o-lition-ists! gentlemen, people who make the negro our equal, actually associate with them! There is, gentlemen," adds Captain Simmons, with an air, "a new issue at the North, miscegenation," tucking a thumb in the arm-hole of his vest on each side as he speaks, "they call it, the abominable intermingling—"

"How any man can suppose a holy God will—" vainly attempts Mr. Ellis to put in.

"Oh, shut up, Simmons!" interrupts Bob Withers, with energy in honest face and voice, triumphant over both. "Who do I see riding to water late of an evening, with the middle-aged bachelor chap on the pommel of his saddle before him? Oh, by George! Simmons, be consistent, man. Tuscaloosa? Is that the Abolitionist last—never mind what day it was. Simmons here will tell you who it was I saw driving out a-fishing in his buggy with a yellow woman—and she ain't even pretty, Simmons—dressed up as nice as you please, and that same little bald-face chap—Ed—Ed—Simmons, as I ever saw—in her lap. And it's been so for years—we all know that here in Somerville—less so now since the revolt in secession, you mind. And you know whether or no you did send that oldest yellow boy of yours to Oberlin before the war began. And you ain't the only one South, only you are more steady to one, Simmons—steady, by George! to one."

"I consider your licentious remarks, Sir, as personal," says Captain Simmons, reddening and swelling like a turkey-cock.

"Don't take any offense," Bob Withers rattles on; "but I appeal to Dr. Peel, dropped in just in time. No, I won't; Dr. Peel is one of the sincere, like Simmons and myself. But here's Mr. Ellis—regular church-member and all that, now, Mr. Ellis. Look here! If a man gulf like all the matter of Southern men, it's that way myself; but if a man will live for years —you ain't the only one, Simmons—with a person woman, and have a family—and a pretty one, I believe—this is the point, Mr. Ellis—is it worse to do that illicitly, illegally, or legally? As to this whole Secession, I always said it was only the grandest sort of a spree—a tiresomendous spree, by George! Smash up in the end, see if there ain't."

"I consider, Sir, your whole strain of conversation as treasonable," Captain Simmons recited Mr. Ellis gets room to say at last. "Your sentiments are dangerous, Sir, dangerous for you to utter in the present crisis, Sir. They will not be tolerated, Sir, not for an instant, Sir—"

"There is a nervousness, an excitability of manner, a feverish motion of hands and feet and eyelids with Mr. Ellis which attracts more attention than what he says. But Bob Withers, in the very midst of Mr. Ellis's excited speech, after contemplating him curiously for a while, utters a loud and long-continued Whew! turned violently up in the ending, and with an "Oh, by George!" walks coolly out of the store.

"Pshaw! Withers must be drunk this morning." Gossips exclaim in a dignified manner to Dr. Peel, after Mr. Ellis's excitement can be got a little under control. "Not a bad fellow poor Withers, only he will find when too late that"—and the Captain says it with tearful pathos—"it biteth like a serpent, it stingeth like an adder."

"The association of the whites and the blacks, it was he was talking about?" asks Dr. Peel, magnificent in usual broadcloth, hair-oil, and jewelry. "Sherman and Thomas have whipped Bob into that, have they? By George! gentlemen, we are getting along," says Dr. Peel, in condescending imitation of the person just departed. "How any man," Dr. Peel adds at last, adjusting the gold studs upon his snowy shirt-cuffs, "can look upon an intermingling of the races without loathing unutterable, horror beyond words, I can not imagine. It is done every where else in the world, which is one of the many reasons I have for looking upon our country as the purest and noblest on earth in that it so regards—what is it?—miscegenation." And there is moral force in the solemnity of Dr. Peel's oaths in continuance of the conversation.

"Speaking of marriage," says Captain Simmons, exceedingly mahogonys, "come, Dr. Peel, tell us when it is to be?" he asks; for, on the strength of his recent public speech, with very complimentary notices of the same in the Star, Captain Simmons is on more familiar terms with Dr. Peel, splendid Dr. Peel, than of old.

"When what is to be?" Dr. Peel brings his left front to bear on his questioner. Dress, splendid is the word, in his fine and perfectly-fitting broadcloth, sumptuous satin vest crossed with massive links of gold, diamond pin, heart and whitest linen, superb teeth, large, authoritative eyes.

"Oh, come, come, Doctor," says Captain Simmons, not drunk enough to be sufficiently a match in dignity with Dr. Peel, "every body in Somerville knows it. We all hope General Wright won't let the war prevent his having a real, old-fashioned, grand time of it. You and he have so many personal friends, too, in all this region. A regular handsome thing of it, Doctor. I haven't sat down to a good table for four years." Adds Captain Simmons—who is evidently only less than he does drinking—mournfully and with watering lips.

It was beneath the delicacy of the matter. Of course it was that. It could be nothing else, you know. All men about to be married are nervous and diffident. On this occasion Dr. Peel, for a man of his mould and metal, seemed for a time remarkably teased and taken aback. But he controlled himself.

"Oh, nonsense, gentlemen," waving the matter off with a regal hand. "But I can tell you a little news worth your hearing."

Captain Simmons is wide awake in an instant. His little gets over his existence to be nearer the Doctor, listens to him with eager eyes. Yes, there is a pleasure. Bill Perkins finds mere commendation in that man in his five hundred Confederate dollars a month, in being the hearer of news, especially good news.

"Well, gentlemen," says Dr. Peel, with a fatalizing dignity, "a friend has sent me a letter in advance of the mail. No mistake this time—Bragg's official dispatch. The Rebels have made an attack upon Fort Fisher by land and by sea. Fort Fisher is the outwork, you know, of Wilmington. I am happy to say they have been repulsed. The attack was under command of Braxt Butler—repulsed with terrible slaughter. They won't try that game again in a hurry."

"I knew it!" exclaims Mr. Ellis, with intense delight, rubbing together his almost trembling hands. "Our reverses were only for our trial, you know. The turning-point is reached at last. You will see that we will, from this out, have an uninterrupted career of victory. The loss of Wilmington, our last important port! Why, gentlemen, it would have ruined us. But it been closed. I would have given up our glorious cause as gone. But no; if Heaven be at times against us it is not enough. It is only who rules us could not, would not permit so terrible a wrong." And Mr. Ellis's eyes glitter and roll with an excitement almost painful to behold.

"No, as you say, Sir, they will not attempt that again."

"What will you bet of it?" replies Dr. Peel, suddenly, and with singular inconsistency. "Oh, pshaw! I am only joking, you know. Come, Captain Simmons, I know of occasions when I are not dry—you never are—but I am. Let us see if Staples has any of that whisky left. Won't you join us, Mr. Ellis? No? Oh, you don't know what is good for you! Good-morning! You will see Bragg's congratulatory address to his troops in the morning's paper. I'll tell that little sanctified chap don't touch liquor, Simmons," Dr. Peel remarks, with oaths, before they have well got out of the store. "He will find he would be in the Lunatic Asylum in two months. He's the sort—he and Barker—they make raving Spiritualists, Abolitionists, Free Lovers, and the like, out of up North. Hurrah for old Bragg! he's up once more; wonder how long he'll stay so!"

But Mrs. Warner. The whirlwinds of the last few months have seized upon her, have lifted off her feet, given her the most wonderful twist that can be imagined. Even before the repulse of Banks on Red River she began to insist—inflicting that opinion upon the Doctor like a scourge—that we are whipped.

"We are whipped, Doctor Warner, whipped! and you know it as well as I, only you are too great a coward to say so. Sitting among people who are bragging about our success and all that stuff; going about with those old saddened looks over your arm, never daring to contradict even that old fool of a Doctor Ginnis!"

The repulse of Banks upsetted but did not wholly silence Mrs. Warner. If it did, the fall of Atlanta, of the Mobile forts, the re-election of Lincoln, and the capture of Savannah seized this Cassandra up again as in a Delphic blast. Poor Doctor Warner!

"We are whipped, Doctor Warner, whipped, whipped!" She insists upon it, as if perpetually contradicted by her husband therein—breakfast, dinner, supper, and supper again. Painful coach the Doctor goes to sleep almost every night to the same reiterated assertion.

So that when the gestures, the morning after, Dr. Peel has electrified good Mr. Ellis with the Fort Fisher news, to read to his wife at home is but the official illness of the Secretary of Butler from that outwork, Mrs. Warner justly regard it as a personal insult.

"It's all a lie, Doctor Warner, and you know it. You only read it to me to contradict me. Repulsed! and a man of your sense! I tell you we are whipped, and if you had had an idea of your own, or half a tongue to speak it, you would have said so long ago, and really think you would now in the end say it. I've no patience with you! Even that meek, poor-spirited Mr. Ret Roberts had energy enough to tell me so. Almost in so many words, when I was there last. They do say that brute of a Roberts treats his wife contemptuously. Well, I am not sure any sorry that with me. Dare not go to hear Mr. Archer, her own minister, preach these ever so many years; afraid of your opinion, I really think! I very boy, with his bold eyes, growing up just like his father. Yes, whipped—if you only had sense to know it!"

So that when, not three weeks afterward, Dr. Warner reads to her, over his forgotten coffee and cold steak, the news of the last shoot upon Somerville, almost deranging Mr. Ellis and extorting terrific blasphemy from Dr. Peel, that Fort Fisher has been captured, suddenly, unexpectedly captured, when we in Somerville did not even know that another attack upon it was in contemplation—no fact is more important—the news in a cheerful tone to his wife what is his reward?

"And now, Dr. Warner, from this time out, I do hope you will hold your tongue. There you sat not one week ago, arguing, disputing that we were not whipped, actually taking the side of those stories about the Federals being repulsed. Can you look me straight in the eyes and tell me I didn't tell you it was a lie? I know you can't. You tire my very life out with your eternal contradiction. It's enough I take one view of a thing, it is for you to take the other. I tell you, once for all, we are whipped; if you persist in saying we are not, I solemnly declare, if His aid does not arrive at tuldest—be-hove yourself, Ria—I could box your ears with my own hands. There's that man Neely; you know he was gone crazy on the very confusion of property right and left. The fact is, he got his hands so full of Confederate money with his wedding contracts that he died of it one way or the way. Well, Mrs. Ginnis herself told me yesterday that Dr. Peel had told her that Neely was leaving heaven and earth to get rid of all his property of that kind. He don't care what he so he can trade it off. As if he can find any body fool enough to take him up! That old Staples, too, they tell me he was a tailor once; you body would have supposed from the airs he put on he could that by the twist in his legs, his hair sticking out in every direction—they tell me he making desperate efforts to get some thing off all the rest of them, if the truth was known. You may thank me you didn't buy any. Confederate scrip won't remain at par over one thing I say; but if I said to you once, don't touch confiscated property, I told you so ten thousand times. And there's Ret Roberts, poor fool, too, as they call him. The man looks as if he had seen a ghost. Not that he doesn't richly deserve it in the way he has treated poor Ria—that poor creature is shameful. But you ought to see Dr. Ginnis; you know how he swells up sometimes; the consequential manner he has when I was there yesterday—flabby. Always so full of talk too; and yesterday—you know I never in the day time—he was so very full of it to say. But I did. I ain't afraid if you are. I told them we were whipped, whipped! They may bluster and bully as they please to contradict arguing it as a reason why the South should hold out, that, if the Confederacy is whipped, it is all over with their denominations blessed radiance I thought, though I didn't say so. The only thing Dr. Ginnis could say was some stuff about not being discouraged, and so on. If—What is that you say? Rumored that the Confederacy has been recognized by France, England, and Spain? Stuff! You may be fool enough to believe it, I am not. If we are doing so well as you say, why did not Jeff Davis remain at Richmond to fight? There was that Bob Withers—Mr. Ginnis told me about it yesterday—went and tacked up a fifty-dollar note on the door of the post-office, just to see, he said, if any body would steal it—stealing as they are every thing else. Left it there all night. What do you think? Next morning he finds it there still, and a one-hundred-dollar bill stuck up beside it by somebody else. Oh, hold your tongue, Dr. Warner, I tell you we are whipped! That a man of your sense—"

Sparkling stars! Let us run.

Dr. Warner did. At least, did not run, he is altogether too fat for that, walked away in a disheveled condition of hair and attire; but he has the appearance of being blown about rather by gales genial, though violent, than by stormy blasts. And he meets upon the streets the bracing February morning of sixty-five—who does he not meet in fact?—old Mr. Adams, who hooks his long finger into the Doctor's button-hole to tell him that he is sending a wagon with "a few things"—that is a hundred dollars' worth, by-the-by—up to help Silas Jewett's family, which Mrs. Adams says has been in a needy condition. Mrs. Jewett is sick, perhaps Dr. Warner will make out a little bill of such medicines to go in the wagon as, by the by, may think acceptable. Which the Doctor gladly promises to do, laughing off the earnest offer on the part of thin old Mr. Adams to pay for the same. Fact is, among the Union folks just now each lip is quivering so with Hail Columbia and cheer to so many Hail Columbia mingled Banner struggle, so to unfold itself, that a man jumps at any way of showing his feelings.

He is still engaged with old Mr. Adams when Mrs. Smithers passes them, tall, red, savage, and powerful, her arms akimbo, as if they were forging sarted, with a tremendous fire of wrath against—it must be—Mr. Adams. A talk in which she takes occasion to bewail the infatuation of Dr. Ginnis, Barker, Lamum, Wright, and others in the Union cause, to hint his stars that though "a man in my position would not dare openly and violently to oppose them, you know Sir, I all long regretted their folly, and kept off from the whole thing just as much as I possibly could. And now, Dr. Ferguson, if any man in Somerville, as I have said a thousand times, has hard sense, you have, when do you think this thing is going to end, Dr. Ferguson, now?"

Truth is, as the scale goes down with the one side it ascends with the other. The joy of the hour thrills through the town heart in Somerville, tradiating even the cellar of Alf Morgan. If things improve at the present rate it will require a mansion for the little Mrs. Bell possesses to keep Alf much longer in bounds. Do what she can, he will hum Hail Columbia and whistle Yankee Doodle at all his subcarnuous shoe-shaking. The foolish fellow actually has a Union flag down there "to feel of," he says, for it is too dark in the cellar to see it.

Mr. Arthur can not refrain from going up into Mr. Ferguson's room to have a laugh over matters; for the Union people in Somerville feel a deal more like laughing these days than we used to. Even Mr. Arthur, Mrs. Bell's checks now than for years past, as Jem says.

"Every Union man tells me the same," Mr. Arthur says, "and I know it is true of myself. People that haven't spoken to you for years, people that have cursed you, people that have been denounced publicly by the Hand that withheld Saul from the murder of David from killing you, will now hardly let you get along the streets for greetings. I can notice how it is at Sunday school and church, how they are sending back their children and coming back themselves? Liberty, I dare say, if shame would let them. Not Mr. Ellis though—he is grummer, gruffer, more distant than ever. I don't know how many who voted against Secession, but went back on it and became the most bitter, have taken occasion to remind me, and every body else, I suppose, of their original ground; though once they be-wailed having voted for the Union as the greatest of their shortcomings."

"It is not that because the frogs, lice, flies, murrain, boils, hail, locusts, thick darkness have come upon them, as upon the Egyptians," says the money lender, solemn. "You know as well as I in each interval of disaster these people are as infatuated as ever. I would not be surprised if the hand of God is lifted from them yet again, with the same result. Perhaps when the last plague, the very climax of the plagues, has fallen, even Ellis and his like may be convinced. I never thought that under the New Testament Dispensation—going into it too—in such a Christian land as this also—there could be such a revival of the Mosaic Dispensation, as it were. I don't know, Mr. Arthur, I don't know," the Christian solemnly, "when I consider the awful judgments of Jehovah—the same God who sent the Deluge, who destroyed the Cities of the Plain, who slew the Canaanites, who dealt so terribly with the Hebrews, upon his land during this fearful war as I tremble to think of the Almighty's full wrath perceived in Jesus Christ, He is a just God still. This is the new dispensation, I know; but His present terrible manifestation of wrath against—as yet to be made—the destruction of this globe by fire. The Pope and the Turk are to fall in sixty-six, are they? The Apostle says there are many Antichrists; who knows what awful times may be in reserve for England, and Scotland even, to say nothing of other parts of the world, for who of you here had before supposed that Slavery was an Antichrist which had to go down in fire and blood and earthquake, as well as the Pope?

"Hold on a moment!" Mr. Ferguson adds, to his friend, at last rising to leave. "I want to prove to you that the universal insubordination all through the Confederacy, which all the papers are bewailing so, is an inevitable fruit of the very principle of Secession. It struck so effective a blow at the very idea of Law, Order, Government, as to kill that vital thing even for their own use. Besides, I want to show you from my Scrap-book that no two men South, however devoted to Secession, can agree on any one thing under Secession. Truth, you know, is one, while Falsehood is as millionfold as the shifting clouds. So sure as one man advances his opinions upon foreign intervention, employment of negroes in the army—whatever it is, another is sure to start up and vehemently dispute it. It is like the consequences of infidelity—"

But if Mr. Arthur can listen to such treason we can not.

"RING DOWN THE CURTAIN, I CAN NOT PLAY!"

[A painful scene recently occurred at the Terre Haute (Ind.) Theatre. Mr. M'Kean Buchanan and daughter were announced to appear in "Hamlet;" but Mrs. Buchanan was at that time lying dangerously ill with meningitis of the heart, and it was stated to the audience that the young lady consequently could not appear. The audience, however, desired the play to proceed, omitting the part of Ophelia; but when Mr. Buchanan appeared and commenced the soliloquy—"To be or not to be," he had not proceeded half a dozen lines when he suddenly stopped short, and, falling into a chair, he exclaimed: "My wife is dying. Take your money. Ring down the drop, I can not play." Mrs. Buchanan was shortly afterward reported the hotel.]

Oft I painted gaudy and mimic scenes,
And poured out thick that smiling woman's
Oh! glaring light and shouting crowd,
And love-words in derision vowed!
Oft I crowded long with strangers eyes,
And dying swain who never dies!
Oh! hollow show and empty heart,
Great mockery of tragic Art!

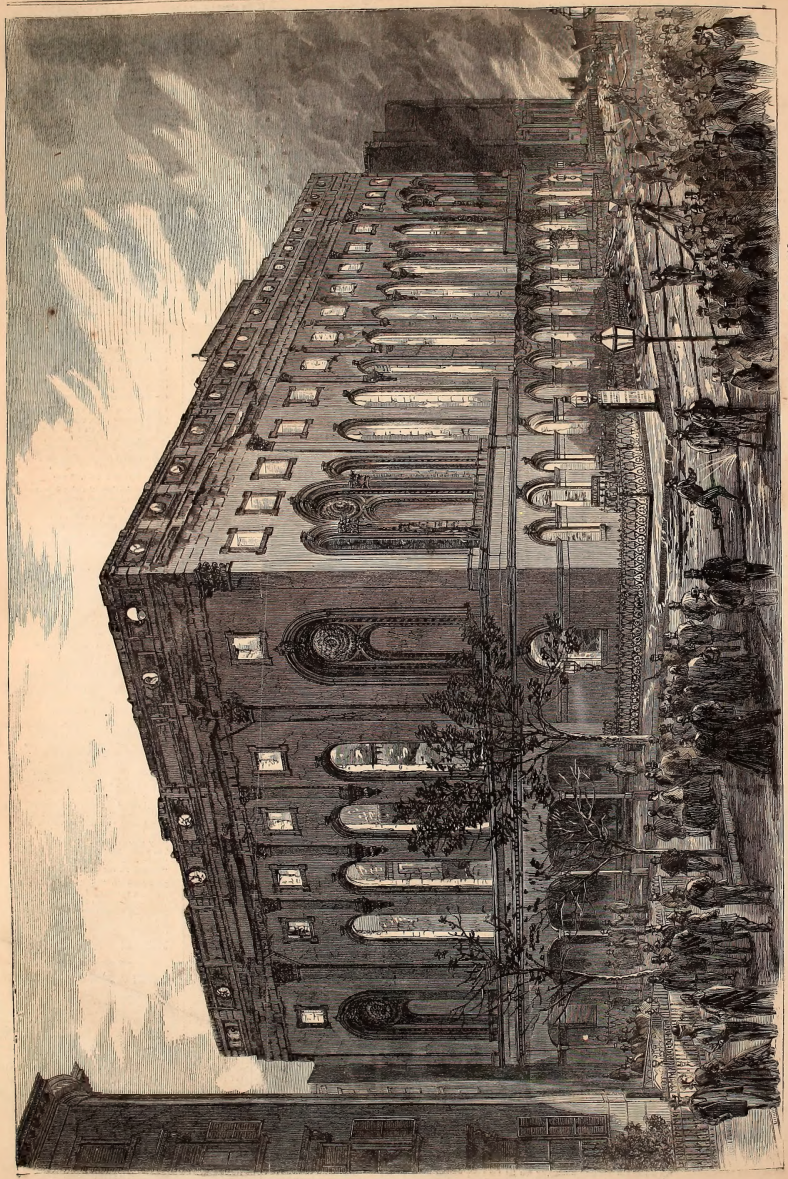
"There's that within which passeth show:"
The days they come, the days they go.
We live two lives, on either page—
The one upon the printed stage;
With all the world to hear and gaze,
And comment on each changing phase;
The other, life and life within,
Where love may purify a sin.

Ring up the drop, the play is on;
Our hour of entrance comes anon.
Shake down the yearnings of the soul;
Weak doting fool, art thou the whole?
The stage is waiting, and the part;
Forget to-night then hast a heart;
Let sunshine break the gathering cloud,
And smile down on the crowd.

Hear how their plaudits fill the scene.
Is not thy greedy ear full keen?
Is not a thousand shouts a balm
For all thy trembling heart's alarm?
"To be or not to be"—the screed
Is listened to with breathless heed.
Oh! slumber with a painted mask,
Is thy brain wandering from thy task?

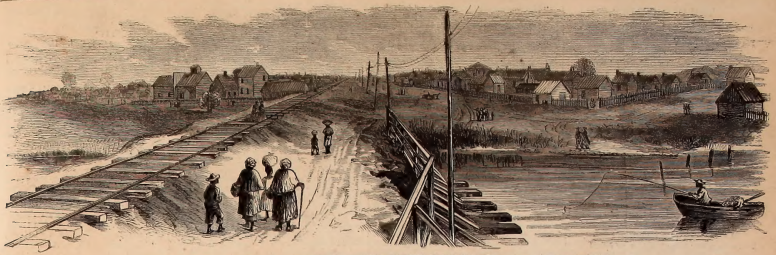
Can it be true that scores of years
Do not suffice to murder tears?
Can it be true that all of one
Has failed to teach the human heart?
Can gaudy, and tricks, and shout, and glare,
The deadliest pangs, the keenest, bear,
With all their wild, delirious din
Not stifle this sad life within?

Pah! man, the eager people wait,
Go on with all thy studied parts,
Shall you not feed their longing eyes
Because—because a woman dies?
What cares the crowd for grief or woes,
For broken hearts, or blasted lives!
They paid their money, and—they say,
Laugh or applaud—as 'tis the play.



What! staggering man, why, where's your art?
That stare was good; that tragic start
Would make your fortune, were it not
That it evokes the truth of thought.
"My wife is dying!" he ne'er wrote
The words that struggle in the throat
"Take back your money," did you say?
"Ring down the drop, I can not play."

Ring down the drop, the act is o'er;
Her bark has touched the golden shore.
While, resting from life's many rage,
Stands there the actor of the stage;
But not upon the cold, cold earth
Falls there a work of sad remorse
From all that crowd who heard him say,
"Ring down the drop, I can not play."



"WHEN GREEK MEETS GREEK."

THIS graphic and lifelike sketch, from which the illustration on our page is reproduced with originality, is painted by J. G. Brown, Esq., whose painting of "The Little Queen of the Woods" we illustrated last week. The photographs from which we engraved both these spirited pictures we are indebted to MESSRS. GELLATLY & LUCEY, 835 Broadway, who have established these and many other interesting photographs illustrating especially works of art.

Mr. Brown, after conceiving the design of this painting and wishing to paint the picture from life, advertised in the New York Herald for "two ragged boot-blacks" with their boot-blacking apparatus, offering them $2 each per day for their attendance at his studio in Broadway. On the morning when his advertisement appeared Mr. Brown, upon arriving at his studio, found the street lined with a procession of ragged shabby, and dirty boot-black the New York Herald before breakfast and promptly responded to his advertisement.

THE OLD CRADLE.

And this was your Cradle? why, surely, my Jenny,
Such slender dimensions go somewhat to show
You were a delightful small Pic-a-ninny
Some nineteen or twenty short summers ago.

Your baby-days flowed in a much-troubled channel;
I see you so then in your impotent strife,
A tight little bundle of wailing and flannel,
Perfected with that newly-found faculty called Life.

To hint at an infantine frailty is stanid;
Let by-gones be by-gones,—and somebody knows
It was like such a baby to dance and to dandle,
Your cheeks were so velvet—so rosy your toes.

Ay, here is your Cradle, and Hope, a bright spirit,
With Love now is watching beside it, I guess;
They guard the small nest you yourself did inherit
Some nineteen or twenty short summers ago.

It is Hope gilds the future—Love welcomes it smiling;
Thus runs this old world, whether sire may rest in ask—
"My future hits fair, is my future beguiling?"
If marked, still it pleases—else rubs not the mark.

Is life a poor cell some would gladly be doffing?
He is riding post-haste who their wrongs will adjust;
For at most life a footstep from cradle to coffin—
From a spoonful of pap to a mouthful of dust.

Then smile as your future is smiling, my Jenny!
Though lonesome of parents are lot in the most,
I still see the face of my small Pic-a-ninny
Unchanged, for them cheeks are as blooming as those.

Ay, here is your Cradle! much, much to my liking.
Though nineteen or twenty long winters have sped;
Pish, hark! as I'm talking there's cry of baby striking,
It is time Jenny's baby should be in its bed.

BETSEY'S BONNET.

"WELL, Uncle Abel, now you are off for home. I suppose: trading all done, crops all bargained for, eh?" said John Dare lifted his hat and pushed back his thick hair as he stood on the hotel steps talking to a plain country farmer in a suit of homespun gray.

"Wa'al, no, not quite yet, John. I want to get Betsey a bunnit; a real nice one; just as good a one as a Yorker might want. 'Cause Betsey's worked awful hard this spring. Tim s are good too. So I guess we'll see if my Betsey 's'ain't look as good as my body. S'pose you 've got to go along with me, do you?"

"Let me see—four o'clock—yes, I'll go, Uncle Abel. I'll look at the pretty girls, though; you won't mind that. Come on."

So they walked off up the street, the fashionable attire of the young lawyer contrasting strongly with the antiquated cut of the farmer's garments, which at home were worn to his solemn state in the open room all the week, only to be worn on Sunday with becoming carefulness. There was little likeness in the face—a trifle too fine and regular beauty, with its blonde mustache and setting of close brown curls—to the tanned and beardless one, with the fine locks, spare and gray, beneath the well-brushed hat; but the clear blue eye was the same in both, and like those that were closer however under the red by the spreading of the uncle Abel's farm, where his dead sister was laid when John was a tiny child. It troubled John not a whit to be seen with the plain countryman. In spite of his perfumed hair and well-gloved hand his heart was true and leal to the good friend of his boyhood, and the surprising glances of his companions gave him no annoyance whatever.

They reached Madame Rozette's at last, and John lounged in the doorway and admired the engaged in the laudable employment of finding out the prettiest face among the girls in attendance. Uncle Abel, refluent with smiles and good will, made his little artificial bloom, came forward with ser most bewitching glances to wait upon the old farmer who brought so attractive a person with him; and, fancying that she would show her superior ability by so doing, made up her mind to quiz Uncle Abel unmercifully. Poor old man! He never was so miserable in his life. In Hogtown he would have been no trouble whatever. Miss Cordelia, in her plain dress and cap with lavender ribbons, would have told him at once what to get, and her little gray eyes would have enforced him to buy it. But here was a fine lady with a great circumference of black silk trailing out along the carpet, a waist no larger than a wasp, a head on which the hair seemed struggling in crimps and curls to get away from shining bands strapped tightly around it, and a pair of great black eyes staring straight at him. While the damsel held up one style after another, or tied them on coquettishly, Uncle Abel looked at him imploringly, but found no help from him.

"Your young woman, show me some of your best bonnets—real good ones. None of your old fashioned poor things for my wife."

Having said this Uncle Abel felt that he had stated the case clearly and should have no further trouble.

Miss Rosie smiled about and returned with a white chip gipsy trimmed with blue, a shirred green satin with a red rose on it and a gray straw trimmed with scarlet poppies.

"Now this will be just what you want, s ... sure; only twenty-five dollars too—so cheap and so becoming."

Uncle Abel confessed afterward that he felt quite confounded at the great price, but did not mean to let that troubled light of love go so, so he only said, "Oh, that's the style, eh? It isn't a bit like Betsey's old one though."

"Oh, no, Sir, the fashion has changed entirely. Now this gipsy is just the newest thing out, and your wife would set the fashion in the town, I don't doubt."

She looked up at John Dare merrily, but could not interpret the look in his eyes; so, taking it for granted that it was an expression of admiration, she pursued the same strain:

"And fresh from Paris; I am sure your wife would like that. Shall I try it on for you?"

"Wa'al yes, I can tell better how it looks then. Now it looks just like a dish."

"There—it goes on in this way;" and Josie pitched the little thing over her rosy face, tied the strings in a big bow knot, and swept down the length of the room. "Don't you like it?"

"Wa'al, it's kind o' pretty; but it's awful queer, ain't it, John?"

John Dare appealed to could only answer that he knew nothing in the world about women's bonnets; and took up his reverie, whatever it was, just where it was broken off. But looking idly in the long mirror opposite he saw Josie making signs to another girl, and he soon found that they were amusing themselves vastly at the expense of their customer. He saw, too, that a pale, quiet girl, with smooth brown hair looked up from her work occasionally, and he rather saw than heard her say, "For shame;" and grew crimson as she spoke.

His own face flushed a little as he became aware that Uncle Abel was being made the butt of their jokes—good Uncle Abel, who was looking so admiringly at the ridiculous headdress which in his old heart only fell of the thought how he should make his present worthy of the patient soul for whom it was intended.

Then John was greatly perplexed; for as he said truly, he knew nothing about all that mysterious and bewildering arrangement of dress that is the new every day.

Still he knew that Aunt Betsey's spare locks, thinly sprinkled with gray, were not dressed in modern style, and he could not for the life of him see wherebouts on that dear old head any of those gipsys or flanchons would rest. He remembered that long ago Aunt Betsey was wont to twist her hair with the same severity in her arrangement of her movements, and that this operation resulted in a hard knob at the back of her head, like a doorhandle, which certainly would not harmonize with these capeless head-dresses.

Just as his brow was overcast with this thought the pale girl came toward Uncle Abel, her cheek flushing as she did so in defiance of the other girls, holding in her hand a plain Leghorn bonnet, trimmed quietly with violet ribbon.

She wore a mourning dress, and the plain brooch at her throat he'd a lock of grey hair.

"I think that this might suit you, Sir," she said. "If your wife don't dress her hair in these fashions those bonnets would not do at all. This is rich and plain, and covers the head well, and her cheek."

"Wa'al now, tell me, for I have got so bothered with these things that I don't know one from t'other. I want to get a nice bunnit for Betsey, and there 's no. Now jest tell me if you would like your mother to wear one like this?"

"Oh, yes, indeed, indeed, ma'am. I didn't see;" and he touched the sleeve of her black dress. "I—I—am so sorry!"

The pretty girl brushed off a tear quickly as she said: "I have no mother now; but if you'll trust me, Sir, I think this will suit."

She had caught the kindly glance of the range of John Dare's vision, and had not seen him at all. Something in the sound of her voice attracted him, and looking up he saw her face clearly.

"Here, John Dare!" he stepped hastily enough toward them. The girl thrust back the bonnet into Abel's hand, and would have been out of sight if her dress had not caught on one of the branching stands and held her fast.

"Amy!" and John Dare, with a hot flush on his face, caught her hand and so detained her. "Amy Egbert, have I found you at last?"

The girl's face grew white and red by turns, and the words she spoke came so low and broken that only John could catch their meaning.

Uncle Abel pushed his spectacles up on his forehead, and, still holding the hat in his hand, looked open-mouthed from one to the other.

"I guess you must have known this young woman afore, didn't you?" he said: but John was too busy with another matter to heed him, and only bling and flushing as the tried to speak calmly, and so his question was unanswered. Pretty Josie was dividing her attention between the two customers on the strange scene beside her, and between anger and mortification she looked in no need of help from range as she heard the girl's name pronounced with uncourteous remarks in regard to "that Amy Egbert and her beau."

Uncle Abel held the hat a while longer quite patiently, but at last despaired of the interview being ended, so he coughed and then he said:

"I'll take this bunnit, Miss, and thanks is a good deal, but Betsey's worth it. ain't she, John?"

John need not have started so, or said "Yes," which wasn't a courteous reply at all; but Uncle Abel laughed a little to himself, and said, softly: "Oh, boys will be boys" He was obliged to tell Miss Egbert the direction of his farm, and that it was quite uneasy lest it should not arrive at his hotel in time.

Outside the door John turned to leave his uncle, and looked as shy as a girl as he said, "It's all right, Uncle Abel. Amy Egbert's now honest, and I've found s—as old friend!"

Uncle Abel held his hand fast, and looked a moment, without speaking, at his face. "I'm glad on't, way; then said, looking in the young man's eyes, "She's a motherless girl, John?"

"Yes, Uncle Abel!" and John turned angrily war, or would have done so if the detaining hand had not held him with a grasp which sixty years had not weakened. "Uncle Abel, you must not take offense. None of my blood turn villains," he added, proudly; "but you see she's young and pretty and friendless, and, when I was a boy and sure of her she might get to thinkin' more of you than would be good for her. and if you ain't in earnest I guess I would stuss try to give you good advice, and the last words a'most that she spoke, says she, 'Abel, I speak over my boy.'"

"My dear, kind uncle, I thank you—indeed I do —for all your kindness; but I could not bear to think that you should misjudge me. I knew Amy long ago, when her parents were both living, and she had all that wealth could give her. I loved her then in a quiet way, but I was too poor to tell her so. Then came reverses and death, and in her poverty and pride the girl hid herself from us resolutely until now. She tried to earn her bread by her accomplishments but failed, and gladly took this means to do so. Now, if I can win her for my wife, I shall bring Mr. John Dare to see you some fine day this summer—may I, Uncle Abel?"

So they parted, and the passers-by little dreamed of all that hand-grips spoke.

"Wa'al, wal, if things don't turn out queer!" soliloquized Uncle Abel, homeward-bound, with a bandbox awfully placed on the seat before him. "To think how easy I was gittin' one of them gipsys for Betsey. Why, she would have laughed a creek about it. And then to think that painted picture of a girl was a daughter of me all the while. And then the other one, with her gentle way, taking the trouble to tell a stupid old fellow like me what was the fashion. I guess she'd be a good wife make our John a nice wife; and after Betsey and me has passed away there'll be a nice bit of property under the hand that'll help him on."

How pleased Aunt Betsey was, to be sure, when the old man gave her the new bonnet! How "fine and young" she looked in the fresh ribbons and soft blond around her face! And how she laughed at the idea of wearing "one of them dish-covers on her head!"

Just when the country was in its June glory John Dare brought his bride to the farm-house where he had spent so many childish hours, and he led her to all the old familiar spots, from the well to the brook by the orchard. She must stay so long as straw and ribbon may endure to keep them both in mind how John Dare found his wife, they tell the story of the time when Uncle Abel bought Betsey's bonnet.

A DASH INTO YORKSHIRE.

IF any body with ordinary powers of observation and description will go any where and relate what he sees and hears, he will, by an unerring law of interest those who listen to him. It is when people write all out of their own heads that they are dull and incomprehensible. Human nature is always interesting to human nature. I feel confident, therefore, that I shall not bore the intelligent reader by simply relating what I saw, heard, and observed in my scamper through the county of York. If you put yourself in my place, which, being an unmarried man you will have no difficulty in doing, you will feel it quite a new sensation to be walking into a strange town with a little knapsack on your back, but with no purpose in your mind, seeking adventures, and trusting to the chapter of accidents.

The reader must come to entertain the notion that Leeds was rather an elegant sort of a town for a sort of commercial. I approached Leeds with that impression. Perhaps it was owing to something that I had read in a geography-book at school, but I had entertained a sort of the same notion made would naturally be soft. But the first glimpse I had of a forest of tall chimneys lifting their heads above a canopy of black smoke, was an unpleasant sort of harmony with my ideal that I began to think I had got into the wrong carriage and been carried off by mistake into the midst of Birmingham. Fancy did I expect me, evidently; for there was no fly waiting to convey me in triumph through the town. Three or four were in attendance, but they were all engaged beforehand; and there were none for chance travelers. I felt it to be entirely my own fault. I should have written to the principal people notice. I not remember ever before this occasion emerging from a railway station with a carpet-bag in my hand without being assaulted by a mob of cabmen competing for the honor and profit of carrying my luggage. But here not a boy appeared. Not a single cab was in waiting for any chance comer whatever. Good sign, I thought. All employed in the wool-trade. Plenty of work, good wages, no idle hands. So I trudged away with my carpet-bag, until it began to rain water, soot, powdered bricks, and grit, when I thought I had better look out for a cab.

I went straight to the smoking-room to calm my feelings with a cigar. The room was full of drovers. They were enormous creatures, for the most with large, long heads and high cheek-bones, and they all wore brown leggings and bad whips. They were standing in front of a bagnio to warm themselves—in silence when I went in; but presently they began to talk. What is the matter with them? I asked myself. Are they not comprehensible? let me? I do not understand a single word they say Ah, I see now; it is the dialect. Having had long experience of the stage I readily believed that real Yorkshiremen would speak it so ill. I listened very attentively, but I could make nothing of the conversation. If they had only mentioned the word "yell," or said "dom it," I might have felt that I was in Yorkshire; but they never said any thing that was intelligible, and I felt that I was in Yorkshire. I spoke to my next neighbor in real Yorkshire, which I learned from a celebrated comedian in the ignorant yokel did not understand a word I said. I observed too, with disappointment, that their hair was not flaxen, and that they did not wear a smock-frock or a fustian bag with waistcoat. One man had so far outraged his county and the well-known habits of his people as to come out without a waistcoat. He had a thick flaxen wig that curls all over his head, and a waistcoat so big that he says "dom it," how can a man be a Yorkshireman?

I went in search of new adventures, and wandering about for some time among huge, gaunt redbrick woolen warehouses—unrelieved by a single bright shop or cheerful dwelling—I met with an adventure. I was getting very depressed, and thinking of going back to London by the very next train, when I heard somebody cry "Hoy!" I turned round and saw a tall, gaunt, ruddy-faced woman of a man standing at a green gate about twenty yards off. He cried, "Hoy!" again, and seeing that the signal was intended for me I went toward him. He seized me by the hand, shook it heartily, and said he was glad to see me.

"How was I?"

I said I was quite well. How was he?

"First-rate."

"And how were all friends in London?"

I ventured to say that all friends in London were in a satisfactory condition.

"And now come in," he said; "dinner will be ready in a few minutes."

Now, the reader can believe me or not, just as he likes, but I can honestly assure him that I had never seen this gentleman before in my life; that in looking at him, and listening to his voice during the above brief scene to which I have given a name that I had known him for a long time, that he had been expecting me, and that I should find every thing prepared for my reception. Nothing occurred to dispel that notion, but every thing to confirm it. My host introduced me to his wife. She shook hands with me, and said she was glad to see me. Would I take a glass of wine after my long journey? If I wished to change my clothes, I would find my room—right-hand door on the first landing. The cloth was already laid, and it was laid for three.

"We expected you at two," the lady said; "but as you did not come, I put the dinner back."

"It was very kind of you, I'm sure," I said.

"Oh, not at all," she protested. "Would I take my pudding before or after my meat? Yorkshire fashion was to take it before the meat."

I said I would take it Yorkshire fashion, for I loved the Yorkshire fashions.

"Had I seen Polson lately?" my host asked.

"Yes, I had seen him last week."

"Still at the old shop, I suppose?"

"Yes," I said, "he was still at the old shop."

"And what was he doing. Still at the old game?"

"Yes," I said, "still at the old game."

And so the dinner passed pleasantly away. When we were sitting over our wine, my host said, "I have invited a few friends to meet you this evening. All people that you know. Marsh and his wife. Dawson and his wife. Everybody, in fact, that Old Cockle is coming, too,—you remember old Cockle, of course?"

I said that it was very kind of him, that I should be very glad to see all those people again, that I knew, and that I particularly remembered, old Cockle, formly believed at the moment that I did know all those people, and that I should be delighted to meet all on the instant. Looking round the table, at the "tea fight" (which was a pleasant Yorkshire meal of tea, coffee, hot buttered toast, and muffins) cakes) every face that I saw was familiar to me, so was every voice I heard. Shutting my eyes I knew them all by their voices. The room was also familiar dentally mention that he had never been in London. Until this day I had never been in Leeds. Yet I knew old Cockle and old Cockle knew me. This is not a story that begins with an indigestion and ends with that most unsatisfactory disillusive device, "a will and testament." There is not a single fact that I am relating. The town-hall is a magnificent building, perhaps the handsomest townhall in the kingdom. But it is no fact to me for the town. It stands like an exquisite marble statue in the midst of a builder's brick-yard. Briggate, the principal commercial street, is a sort of two-storied Tottenham-court-road. The woolen mills give you the solid idea of business sufficient for Manchester. All the goods sold in the shops seem to be soft goods. I wanted a penknife, and searched three streets in vain for a cutler's shop. I certainly do not say that had a slight look of hardware, and when I asked for a penknife they tried to pet me off with a woolen comforter. I am told that the cutlery is cut out to procure the article I wanted, and he was so long absent that I think he must have gone to Sheffield for it.

I was much struck with the paucity of public houses—good phrase that "paucity of public houses"—in Leeds. The absence of gin-palace on the pleasing fact as being a testimony to the temperate habits of the people. I regret to say that he should not accept my commendation. He set me into a secret. The public houses in Leeds are mostly situated up courts. There is no sign of them in the main streets. You have to go up the court before you find them. And every street was pierced with these sly little courts, like rabbit-holes in a sandbank.

The young ladies in Leeds are all in the fashion; but they overdo the thing a little. Their chignons are nearly as big as their heads, and their shape year when in the streets to have two heads, one with a hat and one without.

I found at a public-house an old friend—whom I had never seen before in my life—who had made arrangements to conduct me over a woolen mill. One proprietor of these mills was in the room when my suspicion that it was my design to take the pattern of his new machinery. A cloth-maker is very reticent and shrewd on every thing. The history of a yard of doeskin would fill a volume, so I am not even allowed to enumerate the steps. From the wool back to the final rolling of it up in a bale it goes through a score of elaborate processes, and changes its appearance every time. It is first picking into a machine, or a tub, or a boiler, and coming out like a comic entertainer—in a new form. It is torn to pieces by the "devil," and spun and twisted, and teased, and boiled, and dyed, and pummeled, and shaved, and hot pressed, and I don't know what all. The manufacture of a pair of sixteenshilling trousers would beat the exploits of the seven-leagued boots all to nothing.

A word as to shoddy. I thought it was a term of reproach, a thing to be ashamed of, a slur deprecatory of the duffer. But Leeds is not ashamed of shoddy, it talks about it openly, uses it openly. What is shoddy?

I was not quite clear on this point before I went to Leeds, but I know all about it now, and will give others the benefit of my newly-acquired useful knowledge. Shoddy is old wool made as good as new. Every manufacturer keeps a devil, a raveningest beast with a fearful set of iron teeth, and an insatiable appetite for coats and old woollen rags; all any thing that is made of wool. Toss him an old garment and he will tear it to pieces in no time. The spun and woven threads are separated, each wool again, and are worked up into new threads to be woven once more into a piece of cloth. Cloth so made is the substance of new wool—looks very well and wears very well. I defy you to tell which is shoddy cloth and which is not. We all wear shoddy without knowing it. For light wool shoddy cloth will serve every purpose; it will not even stand strain and exertion. You must not venture to practise gymnastics in a pair of shoddy trowsers. Here is the weakness of shoddy—the shortness of the staple. You know now—if you did not know before—why the old cheeseman is so eager and anxious to buy any garment, however ragged, which is composed entirely of wool. The old suit goes to the mill and comes back to you in a new shape. Your trowsers to-day may be your waistcoat to-morrow. Such is the economy of modern trade.

The cloth-hall at Leeds is a huge shed, a quarter of a mile long; the area of which is divided into streets of stalls, at which, on market-days, the manufacturers exhibit specimens of their goods. It is a curious place, well worth seeing. Let me impart to the reader how I picked up here. How to tell if there is cotton in a piece of cloth. Take a small piece and tear it both ways, against the way and against the woof. The wool in tearing makes a dull soft sound; the cotton fends with a crackling noise. Do this when your tailor swears "it is all wool," and see for which he will look when he hears the rattle of the cotton threads. The price of broadcloth ranges from a shilling a yard to three shillings! At wholesale prices you can get cloth enough to make a suit for five shillings.

Having seen Leeds at work, I was curious to see it at play. With this purpose I made the round of its night amusements. I went to a theatre. It was poorly attended. It deserved to be; for though the house was large and capable of being made bright and attractive, it was in an inconceivably dirty and dingy condition, and the performance was dreary in the last degree. When will provincial managers be brought to understand that people do not go to the theatre for a duty, but to be made cheerful and to be amused? Why should any one come away from any where to sit in this dingy den, and be solemnly bored by nuisance which, by money and skill, is below the mark of the busker who executes a clog dance on the cellar-flap in the street?

I visited a music-hall. It had evidently been a floor-cloth factory, or something of that kind; but with bright lights and a lively band of musicians, it was tolerably cheerful than the theatre. This Leeds music-hall has its peculiarities. The people are admitted to the body of the building gratis, paying for their entertainment in the price of the beer they drink. The charge for admission to the galleries is sixpence, and there is a seat or pew at the end of the hall set apart for mothers with children in arms. The entertainment was of the usual character. A weak-kneed young ladies in a dingy evening costume, showing a lanky length of red arm, came on with pieces of music—of which they could not read a note—and sang sentimental ballads in shrill notes, which set your teeth on edge. Then the all-pervading irrepressible comic man, with the red hat and the long-tailed coat, contrasted us to Slap-bang and Kafoodlum and Umdoodle-day, and always when he failed to make an effect, knocked his face over his eyes, and by that triumphant stroke of humor invariably brought down the house. It was not exactly an elevating entertainment; but it admitted of great variety, and the audience seemed amused. It was at least a lively place, and well ordered of its kind, which the theatre was not.

In the course of three hours I pretty well exhausted the night's entertainments of Leeds. They included an organ performance at the town-hall, a concert, and a reading at the Mechanics' Institution.

They are a musical people in Leeds. From almost every court leading to the public houses tuneful voices reached the street, and in some of the houses fiddles were going. In the bar of a little beer-shop, which I was curious enough to visit, I found a handsome piano jammed up against the beer engine, and a man playing it for the delectation of half a dozen yokels, who were drinking their beer at the counter. It was a mean, shabby little beer shop; but the piano was in a fine rosewood case, and the performer played remarkably well. There was nothing to pay for the music. I had half a pint and a grand fantasia for twopence. Nay, more; a gentleman at the bar did a little double-shuffle for the entertainment of the customers generally. They seemed to me that the piano was a pleasant mitigation if the mere drinking and getting drunk purposes of the ordinary public-house bar; and I have observed that where music, singing, dancing, and other amusements are dispensed with liquor, they have the effect of keeping people sober.

My kind host offered, when I went over to Wakefield with him, to show me a lunatic; the said curiosity being the whole of the original manuscript of the Pickwick Papers, which, I was assured, is in the possession of a printer there. I was informed, too, that a Yorkshire schoolmaster advertises himself as the proprietor of the real original Dotheboys Hall, which is now conducted on principles of the most boundless liberality. My new old friend in Leeds—whose hearty hospitality and kindness I shall never forget—pressed me to stay a day or two longer; but as I was cured of my vanity, I was anxious—selfish person that I am—to get back to town. I took Hull in my way, though it was a good deal out of my way, and took a glance at the lions there. I had shared in the impression, which, I believe, is the popular one, that Hull was in the last degree a dull, smoky, dreary town. I had heard it associated with another place whose name begins with H and ends with two I's. But I found that Hull had been much belied and shamefully traduced. The Humber, if it were not normally of the color of pea-soup, is as fine a river as any in the Kingdom. As to the town, I prefer it to Leeds. The latter does not stand over the coal; the streets are busy and bustling, and the surrounding country is really charming. Hull has a stately, a marvelous statue. It is situated in the market-street, in the midst of oyster-stalls and fish-barrows, and it represents William III. on horseback. Will, and it represents William III. on horseback. Will, the hero of the battle of the Boyne, both gilt all over. The golden man and horse have a curious effect prancing over the fish-trucks and baskets. The first time in Yorkshire, I was gratified by hearing somebody say "d'om'd." I asked a native why Hull was called the Venice of England. He said he could not be was "d'om'd if he knew." I believe William did Hull the honor of landing on its shores, when he made a triumphal progress over from Holland to govern England. It was there that first he showed his lamplaback face.

Hull is maritime, and has docks, and ships, and sailors, and is all the more lively in consequence. It has two theatres, a circus, and several musical halls. From the latter I judge that Hull is in the full ample of what may be done, even in the provinces, by enterprise and liberal management. It is a handsome, roomy, well-lighted, well-aerated and luxuriously furnished, and the pieces are dressed and mounted in first-rate style. The result is, that the better classes go to the stalls and level, and that the local shareholders find their account in a well-conducted company. Take the pretty park, with pleasant walks, and flower-beds, and ornamental waters; and the roads leading to the country are macadamized and kept in order. The streets are by bold house comfortably and elegantly for thirty pounds a year. So never believe any one who says that there is not a good audience of a letter between Hull and the internal regions.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

ABOUT this season of the year, when "lovely June" is ushering summer in, a great "hue and cry" is raised about Hoboken. What does it mean? It means that though June is often one of the most charming months of the year, it is often one of the most trying. Hoboken one has a commodious, airy house here, and country boarding-places are crowded and ridiculously expensive? Is a fortnight's trip to the country; and this is the most hectic himself and secure some spot where the entire family can be located during the heat of the summer and the "season." This is frequently all they do enjoy. Long Branch, Newport, Saratoga, and the more fashionable resorts are, in the "season," over-crowded, even if it were prudent for every paterfamilias whose household-hope for country air and comfort to make his home there. Of course all fortunate hotel-keepers. So none more quiet retreat is often sought for a summer home. Many go to the banks of the Hudson, or even away in Vermont or New Hampshire. But this is a matter of expense. Even the man whose merchant was about right, who said to his young wife when she begged him to take her into the country for the summer:

"My dear, it is quite impossible at present; but I'll tell you what we can do. We can go to the Croton and move our bed up into the attic!"

"What is that?" asked the wife, eagerly.

"We will turn off the gas and the Croton and move our bed up into the attic!"

Now, this is more than folly to abandon comfortable homes for mere fashion's sake, nevertheless the real, genuine country air, with a good shady lawn, is very tempting wherever they can consistently. Especially for the children; it would be worth almost anything, to be in the country all the time. The freedom of outdoor life is blood, bone, and muscle to them. If half of our pale city boys could hide their sad schoolbooks in a dark closet, and spend an entire year in "roughing it" on a good farm, the world would be the gainer by getting a race of men with physical strength and vigor.

For every one change, to a certain extent, is beneficial, and the denizens of the city naturally reek it in the country. And that is just as it should be. The thing that is bad is the pale faces which annually fill sleepy people on the approach of the summer solstice to flee the city—any where, any how—and be revivified at least the mere sense of relief through wanting the quality. Our magnificent Central Park is a blessing to those who remain in numerous sources of enjoyment, with plenty of fresh air and delightful scenery, which one may luxuriate in without any fear of a bill to be presented to him on leaving—unless, by chance, he passes by the Astor!

The recent discussion between the Allopathic and Homœopathic physicians in regard to the treatment of the cholera brought to mind a recipe we saw long ago, which may be useful to our readers. We give it now, and hope though wanting the quality. Our magnificent Central Park is a blessing to those who remain in numerous sources of enjoyment, with plenty of fresh air and delightful scenery, which one may luxuriate in without any fear of a bill to be presented to him on leaving—unless, by chance, he passes by the Astor!

The recent discussion between the Allopathic and Homœopathic physicians in regard to the treatment of the cholera brought to mind a recipe we saw long ago, which may be useful to our readers. We give it now, and hope it will never be used:

HOMŒOPATHIC SHORT.—Take a spring chicken, and let it walk to the kitchen door. Then call loudly and it will be cooked. Let the shadow fall on a kettle of water, and boil four hours. When it is done, take out the chicken and let it stand in a quart of pure spring water. (Filtered Croton will answer very well.) Shake the mixture, taken in small doses of a pint of warm water, at intervals of three hours, will be found very nourishing. If a physician cannot be obtained to prescribe this treatment of a nurse can soon be supplied with.

By way of contrast, we are reminded of a good lady of the Allopathic persuasion, whose minister came to comfort her after the death of her child:

"My friend," he began, "I am sorry to hear that you have lost your baby."

"Yes, sir," replied the mother, "we did every thing to save it, but in vain. We had five doctors, and they gave it calomel, and physic, and blisters, and what not, and it didn't do any good, they gave it ipecacuanha and calomel, and then they put a mustard poultice on the stomach and chest, and a blister on the back and side, and applied leeches to the head. But it was of no use; the poor little thing died after all!"

Suffering often leads to crime—far more frequently even in our very midst than those imagine who never know what it is to want for bread. Not long since a very respectably-dressed young man was brought before the Court of Special Sessions on the accession of stealing a book from the Astor Library. The prisoner pleaded guilty; and upon inquiry there was every reason to believe what he said to be true—that he had received a liberal education, and had come to the city to look for a situation; but had spent all his money; had been two days without food, and had walked the streets for two nights. In the morning he thought he would steal a book, sell it, and get something to eat; but he resisted the temptation. He looked over the morning papers, went out again in quest of a situation, and found on an clerk in a grocery store, but he was not to commence work until the next day. This, he said, was a long time for a man to wait who had walked the streets for two days and two nights; and as he concluded his story he burst into tears, and said, "The gnawing at my heart made me steal." Measures were taken by the judge to ascertain if the man's statements were true. And it is to be hoped that before this time the young man has found a good situation, and is earning an honest living.

An Eastern paper gives the following suggestions in regard to the cholera:

"Don't run; be on the brain, and, to this end, avoid reading the daily papers. Endeavor, if possible, to keep a clean conscience, and to wear clean shirts. Rise with the lark, but avoid larks in the evening. Be slow-ground in your habits. Take a long and shovel-board in all your dealings. Love your neighbors as yourself, but don't have too many of them in the same house with you. Amen."

Country newspapers, by-the-way, seem to be under the impression that the Asiatic cholera has broken out in Paris and in Berlin. We have not, and that the entire pestilence is in imminent danger. Some of those above-mentioned papers have settled one of the little boy who came running into the house just at dusk, one evening, exclaiming, "Oh, my mother was on a Assorted cake out in our yard!" "A mandrel cake! Oh no, my dear," returned mamma. "Well, I am sure there are as many as fifty." "Oh no, you are very much mistaken." "Well, my way," persisted the boy, impatiently, "there is one cat in the assorted cake!"

The health of New York city is reported to be unusually good.—Ex. Of course it is! May our unusually cool—and the city is unusually clean.

The New York Observer says:

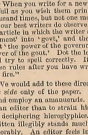
"When you write for a newspaper write all your words in full as you would in private. This has been said a thousand times, but ask one man in ten observes the rule. All our best writers deserve it. In this paper we print an article in which the writer abbreviated the word 'governor' to 'gov.' Now, we have often wished it gone, so that 'the power of the government was changed from the power of the gov.' Ask the letter 1 and count the letter 6, and try to spell correctly. If you can not comply with this rule, you can not write for your country; put it in the fire."

We would add to these directions: write legibly, and on one side only of the paper. If you do not write a plain hand you can not expect to be printed correctly. Nothing is more vexatious to an editor than to strain his eyes and puzzle his brain in deciphering hieroglyphics. No manuscript which is written illegibly ever gets much chance of being regarded favorably. An editor feels inclined to reject it before he has mastered the first half page.



Colored starch, says a London paper, is the latest and greatest novelty of the season. It is made in pink, buff, blue, and every shade of green, and blue will soon cease to be produced. Any article starched with the new preparation is completely ruined; but as it washes out, the garment that was pink to-day may be green to-morrow, and buff afterward. It is recommended especially for those bright and commonly-colored residue that are costly, wash out, and perplex their owners. If the pattern has been printed with fast colors (and where starch) if green, green starch; and they can be rendered one even and pretty color. The preparation is a favorable again, but very stylish. White antimacassars or lace curtains may also be colored in the same way, and infinite variety effected.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

HARD ON TRUSTEE.—One day during the late Anniversary Week a well-known ecclesiastical structure that stands in the neighborhood of Broadway and Tenth Street, was accosted by a prim-looking country gent, evidently from the rural districts, who inquired the distance to Wall Street. The gent looked especially for those bright and commonly-colored residue that are costly, wash out, and perplex their owners. If the pattern has been printed with fast colors (and where starch) if green, green starch; and they can be rendered one even and pretty color. The preparation is a favorable again, but very stylish. White antimacassars or lace curtains may also be colored in the same way, and infinite variety effected.

A DARK COUNTERPOISE.—"Say, why is the Bible like a dark lantern?" asked Jenkins of his friend Smith. "Because they store every light," was the reply.

Question.

Can you tell me why
A hypocrite sly,
Is better than every Man you or I,
The eye of deceit
Can best counterfeit
And so I suppose
Best deceive our foes.

"The post-office in our village," writes a Vermont lady, "was kept in the bar-room of the tavern, a great resort for mechanics. An old chap, more remarkable for his size and habits than his piety, had ordered a paper, and for a long time one day with a lot of boisterous fellows, when the Methodist preacher came in. The old fellow entered, and asked for his paper. Quick as lightning, Sandy Rose asked, humbly: 'Are you the Methodist parson just come here to preach?' I am, replied the minister. 'Well, you old hoss-thief, you'll go to hell as sure as the devil is, and you can have your own family record,' replied the preacher, and had left the room ere I heard the roars of the company."

A CONJUGAL CONUNDRUM.

Which is of greater value, pr'ythee say,
The bride or bridegroom? Most the truth be told!
A matter of debate is given away!
"The bridegroom's often regularly sold.

Two men fired at us eight at the same time, and killed him. An Irishman observed: "They might have saved their powder and shot, for the fall would have killed him."

NO SPEAK.—A lady writes to ask us whether her husband, who is by profession a soldier, is justified in sitting up all night in the exercise of his vocation. He can, at all events, be a very delightful pillow-prop.—But it is never too late to mend.

Said an old toper to his comrade the other day: "If one pint makes me tipsy, what a tropical region would your stomach be, old fellow?"

AN EXTRAORDINARY CURE.—Gulphoy, who has been afflicted with that curse of the many, gaiety and conviviality, has been entirely cured by a course of stay-at-home sympathy.

"Toby, what did the Israelites do when they crossed the Red Sea?" "I dunno, but I guess they dried themselves."

"ANOTHER WAY."

When lovely woman, Lump of Folly,
Would show the world her valiant traits,
Would treat herself as child her baby,
And warns each man of some away.
The surest method we'll discover
To prompt a wick from every eye,
Despite all fashion's dress decree,
And spoil a scalp-skin is—to dye.

"Will you have some catup?" asked a gentleman of Aunt Priscilla at a dinner-party. "Some what, sir?" she replied, with a shudder? "I'm fond of eats in their places, but I should so soon think of eating dog soup!" The gentleman did not urge her.

DOMESTIC BLISS.—A FRAGMENT.

I am
A married lady of thirty-odd?
Every evening I am in their beds
At "leaves" about 8 o'clock, I should.
Every morning my slumbers greet
The earliest patter of every sleeper's feet.
Thirteen little hearts are always in a flutter.
Till thirteen little mouths are filled with food and butter,
Thirteen little tongues are busy all day long;
Thirteen little heads, with doing something wrong,
Till I fain am to die,
Or wish I were dead.
And when my poor husband comes home from his work,
And I say, "I am tired," he just looks a shirk,
What do you think is the picture he sees?
A legion of devils, all in a breeze—
Johnny is crying,
And Mary a-sighing,
And worn-out mamma, with her hair all a flying;
Sewing and angry William beating little Nelly;
Charley in the pantry eating currant jelly;
Richard strutting round in papa's Sunday coat;
Harry at the glass, with a razor at his throat;
Robert gets the scissors, cuts short Jane's hair the door,
Mitigates their aching with a forty-pound cane;
Baby at the second bureau in the night,
Throwing in his mite to the universal din.
And I, my lord and husband, being rather weak of nerve, he Begins to lose his patience in the stunning topsy-turvy,
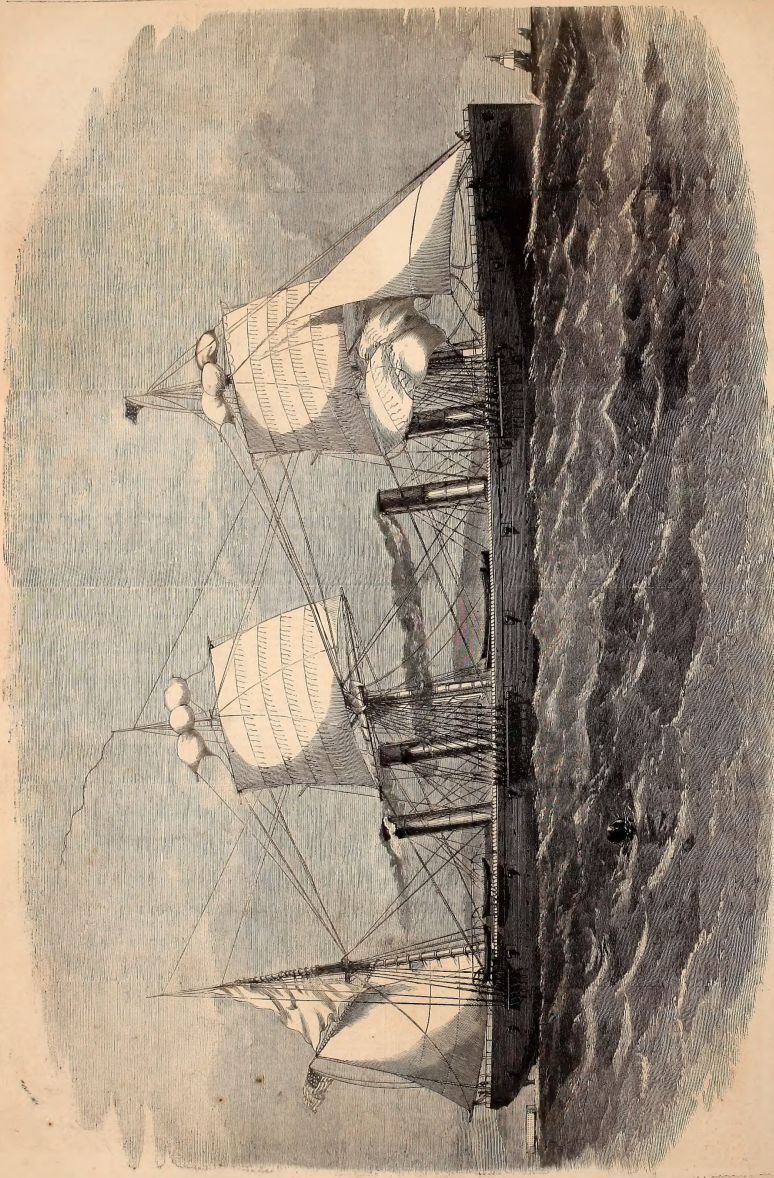
And then the frightful little sense all fly out for shelter,
And on the drama closes 'mid a general batter-shatter.
I'll give you my excuse, let you find me a myth;
Yours, very respectfully, MRS. John Smith.

"Now, pass, tell me what is humbug." "It is," replied pass, "when mamma pretends to be afraid of me, and puts no buttons on my shirt till reminded of it a dozen times."

There is a man in Pennsylvania who is so forgetful of countenance that his wife is obliged to keep a wafer stuck to the end of her nose in order that she may distinguish her from other ladies. Even then, he occasionally makes a mistake.

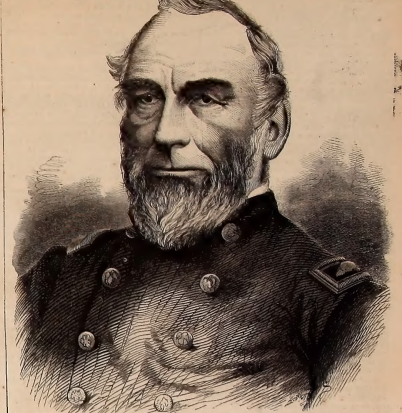


A recent criminal trial at New Orleans had a rather novel catastrophe; the prisoner was acquitted, and his own and the counsel for the prosecution committed to jail for contempt of court.

THE WAY TO BE HAPPY.—The best way to be happy is not to worry any thing until you have got it, and then to worry of it. Pudding and milk are good things to have, so one has not too much of them.

The Irish people ride so much in cars that Ireland might be called the carnivora.

VERY LIKELY.



"YES, JENKINS, I HAD BETTER WEAR MY VEIL. CHURCH IS NOT THE PLACE TO DISTRACT THE ATTENTION OF YOUNG MEN!"

THE UNITED STATES STEAM SLOOP OF WAR "WAMPANOAG."—[SEE PAGE 365.]

GOVERNOR THOMAS SWANN, OF MARYLAND.

COLONEL WILLIAM B. THOMAS, COLLECTOR OF THE PORT OF PHILADELPHIA

GOVERNOR SWANN OF MARYLAND.

THOMAS SWANN, the present Governor of the State of Maryland, was born in the city of Alexandria in the State of Virginia. His father, THOMAS SWANN, was a lawyer of ability and distinction, and during the Presidency of JOHN QUINCY ADAMS held the office of United States Attorney for the District of Columbia. His son, Governor THOMAS SWANN, the subject of this sketch, was educated at the University of Virginia, and commenced the study of the law in the office of his father in Washington. He, however, never pursued the practice of his profession, and having married a lady from Maryland, came to the city of Baltimore, where he has since resided. A gentleman of fortune and liberal education, firm and decided in his convictions, and of great promptness and energy of character, he became interested in all works of public improvement then being projected, which might in any way tend to promote the prosperity of his adopted city and State. A man of boldness and determination was required to undertake the completion of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and Mr. SWANN's election as President, in 1848, was hailed with satisfaction by the public authorities, as well as by those of his fellow-citizens who were familiar with his character and the previous services he had rendered to the Company. At once turning all his energies to the accomplishment of the work he had undertaken, and boldly contending with those difficulties that had at one time appeared so formidable, he had the satisfaction of seeing fulfilled the prediction he had made as early as 1851, of the completion of the entire road on the 1st of January, 1853.* On the final completion of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, Mr. SWANN resigned his position as President and became the President of the North Western Virginia Railroad, whose work diverging from the Baltimore and Ohio Road in the mountains, extended itself to the Ohio River at the mouth of the Little Kanawha, some ninety miles west of the city of Wheeling. This road also was opened for travel under his auspices, and he only retired from its management in 1857 to become Mayor of the city of Baltimore, to which office he had been elected by a large majority of his fellow-citizens.

In this position, to which he was twice chosen, Mr. SWANN did much for the advancement and prosperity of Baltimore. He proposed, and was able to carry by his paramount influence with the Councils of that city, a change from a volunteer Fire Department with all its irregularities to a paid Fire Department with all its promptness, order, and efficiency. He introduced into the city the new system of police and fire-alarm telegraph, which adds so much to the safety of persons and property, and which has since been generally adopted in all cities throughout the Union. When Mr. SWANN came into office the jail, which had been of sufficient size when the population did not exceed some fifty thousand inhabitants, had long been found totally inadequate to the requirements of a city of nearly two hundred thousand people. When he left office a noble edifice of great size and striking architecture had taken its place. The water-works by which Baltimore is supplied, at an elevation of 217 feet above tide, with pure water by natural flow, was another of the works for which that city is indebted to his administration.

The last public official act of Mr. SWANN's Mayoralty was the inauguration of the Park on the 19th October, 1860. Soon afterward the Southern States seceded and the war for the preservation of the Union began. Mr. SWANN took a firm stand on the side of the Federal Government, and advocated at all times and under all circumstances the strict maintenance of the authority of the United States. When the plan of the National Banks was developed Mr. SWANN was made President of the first bank established in the city of Baltimore. And when the Constitution abolishing slavery forever in Maryland was established in 1864, he was chosen by the people to fill the highest office in their gift, that of Governor of the State.

Notwithstanding that Mr. SWANN is still in the prime of manhood, with enlarged and liberal views, few men will be found who have identified their names with undertakings of more practical and lasting benefit to his State and people.

COLONEL W. B. THOMAS,

COLLECTOR OF THE PORT OF PHILADELPHIA.

COLONEL WILLIAM B. THOMAS was born in Upper Marion township, Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, May 25, 1811. In 1843 he became a citizen of Philadelphia, where he was among the first to apply steam-power to the manufacture of flour. His business largely increased, till he now owns one of the largest manufactories in the world, using upward of 1,500,000 bushels of grain annually. Mr. THOMAS soon took an active part in all great business movements. He was one of the founders of the Corn Exchange Association, and was its first President. He is also a leading member of the Board of Trade. In early life he was a Democrat, but left that party many years ago because of his anti-slavery principles. In 1852 he voted for JOHN P. HALE, and in 1860 for the nomination of LINCOLN at Chicago. His career since the rebellion began entitles him to a place in that noble column of men whose names are written on the glorious pages of the war.

Mr. THOMAS was in Washington when the Capital was cut off from the North by the rebellion in Baltimore. He volunteered for the defense of the city, and, musket on shoulder, paced the streets during the memorable April of 1861. Those were the days when loyal men scarcely knew whom to trust. At midnight the President sent for Mr.

RELICS ON A BATTLE-FIELD.

THOMAS, and offered him the Collector-ship of the Port of Philadelphia. He accepted, but that he was never an office-seeker his manly course after-ward has proved.

In 1862, after M'CLELLAN and POPE were defeated, Mr. THOMAS grew weary of merely civil duties, and in August he formed the employés of the Custom-house into two military companies, and equipped them from his private means. In September he accompanied the call of Governor CURTIN for troops by marching his companies to Harrisburg. Here he was given the command of a regiment, and sent at once into Maryland, where he remained till the danger was over.

In June, 1863, when LEE invaded Maryland, Colonel THOMAS at once marched his regiment, then twelve hundred strong, to Harrisburg, and was ordered to guard the Northern Central Railroad, of vital importance to the movements of the Army of the Potomac. His regiment was after ward engaged with the enemy at Wrightsville and at York, and Colonel THOMAS, in command of all the forces at the latter place, prevented the rebels from crossing the river. He then joined MEADE, to aid in the pursuit of LEE. In July, 1864, Colonel THOMAS organized a new regiment, the Hundred and ninety-second Pennsylvania Volunteers, one of the largest ever mustered in Philadelphia. He placed himself and his command at the disposal of the Government, and was ordered to garrison Fort M'Henry, at Baltimore, then to Johnson's Island, and next to guard the large military stores at Gallipolis, Ohio, then threatened by the rebels. He remained at this important post till November. Then Colonel THOMAS, from 1862 to 1864, was engaged in four enlistments, in each of which he displayed many of the highest qualities of a soldier.

This military record would be honorable to any soldier; it is doubly so as that of a man holding a responsible civil position under the National Government. His duties as Collector of the Port would have excused Colonel THOMAS from any active part in the war, but he refused to throw off one responsibility by finding another. His administration of the Custom-house at Philadelphia has given entire satisfaction to business men as well as to the Government, and there is no citizen of Philadelphia in whom a deeper trust is more worthily reposed by the community.

BURNING OF THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

On the night of May 21 a disastrous conflagration occurred in this city, resulting in the destruction of the greater portion of the block between Fourteenth and Fifteenth streets, and between Irving Place and Third Avenue. The Academy of Music was laid in ruins; the New York University Medical College, including the valuable museum collected by the late "Dr. WORTHINGTON MOTT, shared the same fate, and the fire extending across the avenues burned down the St. Matthew Lutheran Church.

The scene presented at the height of the conflagration was grand and imposing. The huge pile of buildings comprising the Academy were thrown into strong relief by the seething body of flames raging within, and the reflection of the fire was thrown over the entire city, gilding every prominent steeple in sight, and throwing every street into the glare of noonday. Two firemen who had at an early period of the fire entered the Academy failed to make their escape in time, and perished in the flames. The loss from this fire is estimated at over a million of dollars. We hope that our principal and most valuable edifices hereafter constructed will be fire-proof buildings.

THE NEW NAVAL SLOOP "WAMPANOAG."

On the 25th of September, 1864, the first frame of this beautiful vessel was raised in the Brooklyn Navy-yard, and on the 15th of December of that year she was launched. Her dimensions are: length over all, 334 feet; extreme beam, 45 feet; depth of hold, 23 feet 6 inches; tonnage (old), 3300 tons.

Being built for high speed she is very sharp at the ends, carrying a graceful curve from stem to stern, and having the appearance of a model more than of a vessel of war. In strength she can not be surpassed. She is diagonally strapped, fore and aft, with iron straps 4½ inches wide by 1 inch thick, upon the outside of the timbers, in two sets, one set crossing the other at an angle of 45°, and both riveted to a bead-strap 5 inches wide by 1 of an inch thick. They are also riveted together where they cross each other, in an opening between the timbers. The vessel has also compression straps at the ends to take any strain she may be subject to there.

On each side of the four bolld-hatches there are two "A" truss-frames of yellow pine, built to relieve the ship as much as possible of the great weight below, and also to help support the decks at these points.

The ship's frame is of seasoned live-oak; the keel in of white oak in one depth; and the main keelson is composed of live-oak plank in five courses, each cooked to the other. On each side of the main section run the sister keelsons, also of live-oak. Outside of these keelsons are six more for the bolting and engines to rest on, three on each side, resting at the forward end aft as the shape of the vessel will allow.

The stops occupied by the boilers and engines is 104 feet in length. They were designed by MR. ISHERWOOD, Chief Engineer of the Bureau of Steam Engineering. The boilers, of which there are eight large, besides four superheaters, are MARTIN'S. The fire-surface is 35,000 square feet, and the grate-surface is 1170 square feet. There are four smoke-stacks—two 7 feet 8 inches in diameter, one 6 feet 6 inches, and one 6 feet 3 inches; all 36 feet high.

The engines consist of two horizontal direct-acting, with cylinders 100 inches in diameter and 48 inches stroke. The number of revolutions is 40 per minute. She has one propeller with four blades, a diameter of 19 feet, and a pitch of 25 feet. The engines and boilers were built at the Novelty Iron Works, New York. The coal-bunkers contain 500 tons of coal below the berth-deck, and 150 tons on the berth-deck, making 700 tons in all.

The armament of this vessel can be, if desired, twenty 9-inch guns.

The rig will be bark, and she can spread 25,000 square feet of canvas. The water-tons and steering-gear are on the berth-deck, and occupies a length of about 80 feet, and in workmanship and design the accommodations are equal to any thing of the kind ever before put into a man-of-war. On the upper or gun-deck, under the poop-deck aft, are two cabins, one for the captain and the ship and the other for the admiral. This poop-deck extends to the mizzen-mast, and is 6 feet in the clear under the beams. The forecastle extends to the foremast, and will accommodate near 100 men; the rest of the crew, about 300, will be accommodated on the berth-deck.

In building this vessel no pains were spared to make her all that could be desired; and all concerned in her construction deserve all the credit due for the workmanlike manner in which each department has carried out the plans of her constructor.

GENERAL STEEDMAN'S TOUR.

OUR artist, MR. DAVIS, gives the following description of illustrations on page 361:

"THE PEACE JUBILEE AT SPRINGFIELD.

"The Inspection Tour o' Generals STEEDMAN and FULLERTON has certainly had one good result, the removal from the minds of the people of FORT, who first came among the freedmen as a chaplain to a colored regiment, and won, by different acts of kindness, the confidence and affection of colored people, that are ever ready to believe that a man from the North is sure to be their friend.

"The reception that General STEEDMAN and FULLERTON were called upon by a delegation of 'old uncles,' and from them men we heard the story of their troubles, feeling convinced that they spoke only the truth. The day following the Generals visited the Trent River Settlement, and met the freedmen in their simple homes. Here, from different colored men, we learned the story of their difficulties.

"With regard to the Freedmen's Bureau in North Carolina, there is no doubt but that the Bureau has accomplished a vast amount of good, and is in some districts of advantage; but, in others, the management of affairs has been so bad as to occasion trouble, not only to the freedmen, but to the white men.

"At Salisbury all classes join in testifying to the capable and satisfactory manner in which Col. and A. A. General WOOD performed his duties.

At Raleigh, Goldsboro, and Newbern the case is different. The freedmen see that the Bureau agents are backed by the military, and arrange for the freedman, and give him his rights in the courts (no laws of the State give him these as yet). The freedman expects a man to come to the Bureau and get for their protection. 'It has been their place of refuge in the past—why not in the future?' They are afraid that the Bureau may will not be kind to them if the Bureau is taken away.

"That the freedmen can be left at present without some protection of the kind I do not believe; but that a change might be made for the better, both for the freedmen, people, and Government, is certain. At present large numbers of able-bodied men do no other labor than draw their rations from the Government, and will continue the same heavy labor until some way is devised for their removal to some position where their labor can be made available."

COUNT BISMARCK.

COUNT BISMARCK SCHONHAUSEN first became prominent in German politics when, after passing through the usual gradations of the diplomatic service, he was in 1851 deputed to the Prussian representative to the Diet at Frankfort. He had then for four years served as representative of Berlin-burg in the Lower House of the Prussian Parliament, in which position he had exercised a considerable influence, and made to himself the attention of FREDERICK WILLIAM IV.

In 1859 BISMARCK was appointed ambassador to St. Petersburg, he remained there until 1862, and won for himself the esteem and confidence of the Czar, who conferred upon him the order of Saint-Alexander-Nevski. In 1862 he was sent as Prussian minister to Paris, and on the 1st of June was received in public audience at the Tuileries. In consequence of the conflicts occasioned in the Prussian Parliament by the budget of the army, he was made in September, 1862, Prime Minister, with the port-folio of Foreign Affairs. The situation to which he was placed was one of weighty responsibility. He was unable to triumph over the resistance opposed by the Chamber of Deputies to the military organization, because the latter tended to weaken the militia for the profit of the army. In every spirit the Chamber possessed a very strong majority propositions which the Government had already unprincipled. The House of Lords sided with BISMARCK. The Deputies declared the acts of the Upper House illegal, and the session was closed by the King. The latter had given BISMARCK on assuming the leading position in Government the grand cross of the Legion of Honor.

BISMARCK brought on the Danish war, and won Austria to his support. He now boldly claims for Prussia the most material advantages derived from that war in Schleswig-Holstein. It is impossible now for Austria to avoid war with Prussia, except by a withdrawal from the Duchies.

Of LOUIS NAPOLEON'S speech at Auxerre we speak upon the editorial page.

TUCKER'S PATENT SPRING BEDS.

"There are some truths hard to be comprehended in the Decimal way of numbers that are self-evident, and though they may pertain to the less vital interests of the human race, they are by no means unimportant. Among them are these: A bed, to fulfil the purposes for which it is designed, must be constructed; it must be so constructed as to insure CLEANLINESS; it should, for easy transportation, be made portable; and, finally, the common bonds demands that it should be both DURABLE and ECONOMICAL. All of these essential requirements existed in the spring beds invented by HIRAM, TUCKER, and it is confidently affirmed that no better bed has been devised for man's comfort which is at all comparable to it. A single night's repose on one of them will cause the most inveterate doubter of his skepticism. For sale wholesale by the TUCKER MANUFACTURING COMPANY,

CONSTITUTION
LIFE SYRUP,
COMPOSED OF
IODIDE POTASSIUM,
WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS.
PREPARED BY
WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,
Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the Blackwell's Island Hospitals, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Service, under Governor EDWIN D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup
HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are very frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigations of the liberal-minded and scientific to cases which have no parallel at the present day.

During the past few years we have contended with obstacles, and overcome opposition, as herculean as were ever encountered by any reformer.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

Some say, "Your cures are too quick." while others doubt their genuineness, and think that no disease can only be cured by the "slow, recuperative process of Nature."

This is our reply: Health is health; the body, like a well-balanced scale, is in a state of Equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effect of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (hereditary) DISEASES transmitted from PARENT TO CHILD.

PARALYSIS.

It is so universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective curative means of restoration in the various forms of Paralysis, that we need not reiterate that it is emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DYSEPSIA.

INDIGESTION, WEIGHT AT STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, BLOODSHOTS.

SCROFULA,

STUMA, KING'S EVIL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, ERYSIPELAS, ULCERATION, SALT RHEUM.

This taint transmitted from any and parents, filling life with untold misery, is by all usual medical remedies, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.

LARYNGITIS, LUMBAGO, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, GOUT, CHRONIC RHEUMATISM.

If there is any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a specialty, it is in Rheumatism in all its kindred affections. The most intense pains are almost instantly relieved—and permanently relieved. Cases, chronic or acute, of twenty or thirty years' standing, have been cured by it.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of MERCURY, removing the Bad Breath, and curing the Weak Limbs and Rheumatic Pains which are the sure result. It is sure to produce. It hardens Spongy Gums, and secures the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Eradicates, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Skin, like

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

And all other distastic effects of bad, vitiated, or muck disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases,

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Body, no remedy has ever proved to be so sure.

MOTH PATCHES upon the female face, depending upon a disorganization of the Liver, are entirely removed by the young wife and mother. A few bottles of CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP will restore the organs of digestion to their proper work, which is directly under the skin.

Diseases of the Heart, Palpitation, Nervous Debility, Indigestion, Weak Stomach, or an ulcerated or cancerous condition of the stomach, organs, mucous lining, or ulcerous appearance of the system, will be relieved by the use of Constitution Life Syrup.

As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP stands unrivaled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR

Are liable to the same diseases. Nature and Science have made the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP for both alike.

PURE BLOOD

Produces health and happiness, and if the constitution is neglected in youth, disease and early death is the result. Do not delay. Try the means are so near at hand and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S BLESSING.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured.

CLOSING OUT SALE
OF THE
NEUFCHATEL WATCH CO.

Owing to the failure and sudden closing of the works and business of the

NEUFCHATEL WATCH CO.

A large number of fine Watches, manufactured especially for the United States being nearly, first-class timekeepers, intended to stand hard usage and sudden changes of temperature, will be sold in our hands for immediate sale. As agents of the Company, we are obliged to dispose of this entire lot in the shortest possible time. We have, therefore, decided on the plan announced as the one that will be productive of the greatest relief. This plan gives every one an opportunity of obtaining first-class time-keepers at a price that is unknown elsewhere. As every Lot offered represents a Watch, there are no blanks, and every one who invests in the scheme will get a Watch at bold the very price at least; and, if as all fortunate, one to wear with pride through life.

Remittances may be made at our risk in registered letters or by express, or post-office orders and drafts payable to our order, and we guarantee a safe return. The $125 $135 sale closes June 15, and none return to every person.

We warrant every Watch as represented, and satisfaction is guaranteed in every instance. Knowing the value of the stock, we can give a warrantee to every purchaser. The prices in the list are put at the lowest figure in order to insure immediate sale; and all who desire to improve the opportunity should make early application.

MAMMOTH OIL ENTERPRISE AND GRAND GIFT DISTRIBUTION.
40,000 Shares of Stock to be Sold for Five Dollars each,
OR
40,000 Valuable Presents—One to each Shareholder.

$99,000 IN GREENBACKS, HOUSES, AND OTHER VALUABLE PROPERTY, TO BE DISTRIBUTED AMONG SHAREHOLDERS WHO PURCHASE $5 OR MORE STOCK OF THE MANCHESTER OIL COMPANY. THE COMPANY WILL PAY 100 PER CENT. PROFIT ANNUALLY ON THE AMOUNT OF INVESTMENT.
Distribution to take place Tuesday Evening, July 24, 1866, at IRVING HALL, NEW YORK.

TO THE PUBLIC.

The undersigned, the Trustee for 40,000 Shares of the Capital Stock of the Vancebury Petroleum and Mining Company, appointed under the laws of the State of New York, having fully investigated the valuable property of the Company, and being fully satisfied that a proper development of its immense shale beds will prove more remunerative than any investment that can be offered to the people, has determined upon the plan of interesting the public and furthering the objects of the organization.

The merit of this plan is twofold. First, each subscriber to a $5 share becomes a Shareholder in the Company, and entitled to the benefits of its success. Second, every person who purchases stock has a chance to receive a valuable present—see following.

One quarter of the entire amount received from sales of certificates will be paid into the treasury of the Company, thus placing $50,000 cash in its working capital. In addition to this the stockholders will be instantly interested. This sum will erect 200 retorts (as the oil is produced by distillation), which will yield, by actual demonstration on the lands of the Company, where works are now in operation, 50 barrels of oil per day, of a lubricating quality, worth $25 per barrel, or a very reserve of $400,000 per annum.

The beds of the Company consist of 1000 acres owned in fee simple. Upon these lands is an immense bed of bituminous shale, 200 feet thick, recently examined by Professor Bacchar, the eminent geologist, who estimates the amount fully sufficient to supply 500 retorts for 200 years. This great shale formation is eight miles east of Cincinnati, immediately beside the Ohio River, in Lewis County, Kentucky. Professor Page and other eminent chemists have examined the shale oil, and pronounce it more valuable for illuminating purposes than petroleum in its crude state, and possessing many other properties for which petroleum is only eight years new petroleum. Any one of ordinary intelligence can not fail to see that the legitimate character of this operation, it being simply a manufacturing business, free from the hitherto speculative features of oil enterprises, places this Company, beyond the question of possibilities, upon the high basis of practical reality—making the investment positive in itself, as well as attractive by the accompaniments of the distribution. The Company is officered by men of the highest respectability, solid business in the cities of New York and Cincinnati, and its affairs are at all times open to the inspection of the stockholders.

HOW TO OBTAIN SHARES.

There will be 40,000 shares and 40,000 presents, one to each shareholder. THEREFORE, NO BLANKS.

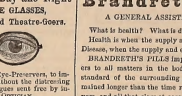
Forty thousand printed receipts will be issued, each entitling the holder to one share of stock in the Vancebury Petroleum and Mining Company, and a present, as per list, and by a record of distribution properly numbered, to the Grand Distribution at Irving Hall, as setting his or her to the present that may be drawn to its number. Persons holding these receipts and cards of admission can be had at the book stores, and of agents throughout the country, at $5 per share, or by forwarding the amount to the Company, New York.

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, No. 14 Chambers Street, New York.



A committee of twenty prominent citizens will conduct the drawing in view of the assembled audience. Forty thousand bullets, numbered from 1 to 40,000 (inclusive), will be placed in separate tin tubes and deposited in a mixing box. A boy will be selected from the audience to draw the numbers from the wheel. After being stimulated, he shall hand the tube to the chairman of the committee, who will announce each number to the audience as it is drawn. The first number drawn will entitle the holder to the first present, the second number drawn to the second present, and in like manner to the end. The utmost care will be taken to preserve order. Music will be furnished by the Seventh Regiment Band. A list of the numbers drawn, with the names of the holders, will be published in Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper immediately after the drawing. The presents will be delivered upon presentation of the cards of admission, at any time after the drawing, at No. 14 Chambers Street, New York.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND

It was early in the spring of 1855 that this Compound was originated, and I was led to it as I was ably assisted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a dreggressive cough, in which for some months previous to the time of preparation, having for its basis the inside bark of white pine, which was considered, and to be very valuable in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in my own family, I made use of a small quantity of this Medicine that had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was perfectly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough left, and a perfect cure was effected. Since then I have sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had for many months been afflicted with a bad cough, accompanied by a sudden cold, and had raised mucus streaked with blood. She used it, and after using one bottle of it, she took about ten ounces of it, and got well. In November, 1857, I was solicited to prepare some of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled.—Boston Journal.

This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been for the first time, by the proprietor, in the New England States, where its merits have become so well known as to create any demand. Diphtheria, bronchitis, splitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally, as well as all diseases caused by impurities of the kidneys and bladder, and gravel; and for piles and scurvy it will be found invaluable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicine generally.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters.

Read the following letter from E. BOURNE, a well-known citizen of Pittsburg, Pa.

PITTSBURG, May 10, 1866.

MESSRS. HOSTETTER & SMITH—Gentlemen,—During a visit in the West last fall I contracted chills and fever, which settled in my limbs, and finally terminated in typhoid fever, and confined me to my room for several months, during which time I was physician to myself, and that I almost despaired of ever recovering my health; having entirely lost my appetite, for days not being able to eat a morsel, added to which I was much distressed with a swelling of my legs, hands, and breast; many sleepless nights—all from debility caused by my protracted sickness. Hearing of your Bitters before. At the stage of my condition a friend recommended me to use your celebrated Stomach Bitters, which I soon thoroughly agreed to the use of stimulants in any form, I at first declined, but ultimately yielded to his solicitations, and, after taking the medicine for several weeks, as directed, my appetite returned, and with it I am happy to say my health, strength, and vigor. My sleep (from the loss of which I had suffered so much) has never been better than it is now, and the swelling sensation (before alluded to) has entirely left me. My bowels, which were very much disturbed, irregular, are now quite natural, and in fact I am glad to say that I feel myself entirely restored to health under you this testimonial of my appreciation of your valuable preparation, in order that others suffering from a similar malady may avail themselves of its virtues, which prejudice prevented me from enjoying for so long a period. I may also add that my physician, after seeing the beneficial effect your bitters had on me, recommended that I use them regularly.

Yours, very respectfully,
E. BOURNE,

POSTPONEMENT.
THE UNITED STATES PRIZE CONCERT,
To have been given at CROSBY'S OPERA-HOUSE on MONDAY, MAY 28th, 1866, will be postponed until MONDAY, JULY 9th, 1866, on which occasion HALF A MILLION DOLLARS IN PRIZES will be presented to Ticket-Holders, including
ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS IN GREENBACKS.

THE POSTPONEMENT is an unavoidable necessity, not so much in consequence of the number of tickets yet unsold as the positive necessity there is for a proper registration of those already disposed of, which has been delayed in consequence of the negligence and carelessness of a portion of our Agents in making their proper returns. We advise all parties wanting tickets to send for them without delay, as we have but a limited number yet on hand. We with most particularity to impress upon the minds of our Agents of the importance of their making their returns at once, and of rectifying whatever errors may have crept into their reports heretofore. We will say to those sending for tickets that if they should all be sold at the time their order is received the money will be returned. No applications for new Agencies for the sale of tickets will be considered, as we have no more than sufficient tickets for those Agents we have already appointed. Tickets are for sale at the principal Hotels, Book and Music Stores in the City, and at our Office, 133 Dearborn Street; price $1 each; sent by mail on receipt of price and stamp for return postage. We invite the particular attention of persons wishing to order tickets by mail to the following

Steinway & Sons'
GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT
PIANO-FORTES

Have taken 33 First Premiums, gold and silver medals, at the Principal Fairs held in this country within the last ten years, and in addition thereto they were awarded a First Prize Medal at the Great International Exhibition in London, 1862, in competition with 250 Pianos from all parts of the World.
That the great superiority of these instruments is now universally conceded is abundantly proved by the FACT that Messrs. Steinway's "scale, improvements, and peculiarities of construction" have been copied by the great majority of the manufacturers of both hemispheres (as CLOSELY AS COULD BE DONE WITHOUT INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT RIGHTS), and that their instruments are used by the most eminent pianists of Europe and America, who prefer them for their every public and private use when ever accessible.
STEINWAY & SONS direct special attention to their Patent Agraffe Arrangement,
which, having been practically tested in all their Grand and highest-priced Square Pianos, and admitted to be one of the greatest improvements of modern times, will hereafter be introduced in EVERY PIANO MANUFACTURED BY THEM, WITHOUT INCREASE OF COST to the purchaser, in order that all their patrons may reap its benefit.
STEINWAY & SONS' PIANOS are the only American instruments exported to Europe in large numbers, and used in European concert-rooms.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. X.—No. 494.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 16, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

His long life-march is ended,
His battles fought and won;
With solemn voices blended,
Of drum and bell and gun,
Lay him down
Whose renown
Is an unsetting sun.

The measured tramp of battle
Beats in his pulse no more;
He hears no more the rattle,
He heeds no more the roar,
Fixed within
By the din
On bloody fields of yore.

In him through years unsleeping
The early conflicts lay,
His great, still spirit keeping
The fight of Chippewny;
Lundy's Lane
Through his grain
Struck deeper than the bay.

And D'Ulloa's towers within him,
And Cerro Gordo's height,
Like giants watched to win him
From life's small, creeping blight;
High and calm
In their psalm
He kept the way of right.

And Aztec halls, repeating
His firm victorious tread,
Found in his spirit meeting
Fit for their mighty dead;
Weaker men
Ne'er again
Their influence round him shed.

In time when others faltered
Before the storm that blew,
His mighty soul, unaltered
By error's specious view,
Stormed in vain,
With no strain
Stood up unmoved and true.

And he, in mercy loving,
Through weariness of years
Was kept unto the proving
Of hopes that knew not fears;
Gently then—
First of men—
He passed, and left us tears.

His long life-march is ended,
His battles fought and won;
With solemn voices blended,
Of drum and bell and gun,
Lay him down
Whose renown
Is an unsetting sun.

THE DUTY OF UNION.

DURING the last few months there have been enthusiastic meetings and passionate speeches in support or condemnation of Congress or the President. It has been confidently asserted that the differences would be referred to the people at the autumn elections, and they would authoritatively decide between the contestants. All this has seemed to us premature, for the reason that the points of dissent were not finally established. All that is clear is, that the President holds certain theories of the situation and Congress apparently others. But what Congress intended to propose under its theories was undecided, while nothing was more evident than that the President's logic was amazingly defective—and, to use a plain phrase, that his bark was worse than his bite.

A political canvass before an election must be conducted upon certain proposed measures, and not upon theories. A bank or no bank; a tariff or no tariff; the toleration or prohibition of slavery in a Territory; it is upon such intelligible measures that every body can comprehend that the great popular debates upon the stump are held and the popular decisions are made at the polls. Now the important question is, what are the differences in proposed measures between the President and Congress upon which the country is to be asked to decide?

That both honestly wish the restoration of the Union can not be doubted. What both have in theory as to the principle which should regulate that restoration is obvious. But until we know precisely what Congress proposes how can an issue be made for an election? The decision of the Senate caucus and the debate in the Senate foreshadow, indeed, the ground which Congress probably means to occupy. But is it so clear that the President will refuse to stand with them? Suppose that Congress proposes to disqualify certain rebel leaders for certain offices until two-thirds of each House remove the disqualification, and substantially to equalize representation by basing it upon voters, is it probable that the President, for such an opinion, is denied upon making treason odious, and has suggested the very same amendment, will take the unnecessary responsibility of opposing so mild and generous a settlement? In making these propositions Congress will have yielded much to the desire of harmony with the Executive. Is the Executive to yield nothing?

It is true that the President may refuse all accommodation. He may insist that he has required all that is needful, all that is constitutional. He may declare that he will stand or fall without moving an inch from his present position. He has indeed virtually said as much. But he said it under other circumstances. He said it when it seemed as if Congress intended to occupy a position of uncompromising hostility. He said it before the mature decision of Congress had been declared. If after that declaration—after the wise, just, and moderate proposition which it would seem that Congress is prepared to make—the President should insist that the representatives of the loyal people are to have no voice in the settlement of the victory which those people have won, that no issue will indeed be made, and the final appeal taken to the country.

But surely those who believe as we do, that the division of the Union party, and the consequent surrender of the Government of this country to a party controlled by the counsels of such leaders as ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, GARRETT H. PENDLETON, VALLANDIGHAM, and HORATIO SEYMOUR, would be incalculably disastrous to the cause of true liberty and civilization, will not passionately insist that such division, with all its consequences, is inevitable. Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS, we observe, fervently desires that result. He prays that the Union party may be defeated. But its defeat is the resumption of power by ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS and his friends. Why does not Mr. PHILLIPS pray for the other way, and say that he fervently hopes for the success of those gentlemen? Mr. PHILLIPS did what he could to defeat Mr. LINCOLN in 1864 by shilling the public orations of him. He declared LINCOLN recreant to liberty. He hopes now to chill confidence in the party that elected Mr. LINCOLN by a similar declaration. It must be remembered, however, that Mr. PHILLIPS's position is not partisan. He is a critic of all parties, and asks nothing of any. But all men who, like JOHN BRIGHT in England, believe that great political and social results are to be attained through party organizations, will, like him, while they declare equal rights to be the ultimate aim of their efforts, yet cordially work with any great party which shows the practical power to advance nearer to that bourne.

It is to secure the gains already made; to entrust the completion of the work of restoration to the hands which defeated rebellion, that it is the imperative duty of the President, of Congress, and of all loyal men, to maintain the ascendency of the Union party until its work is accomplished. Congress has evidently yielded much to this great result; and it remains for the President to decide whether the restoration of the Union which should be accomplished by an alliance of the late rebel leaders, of the Copperhead leaders, and of such individual recruits as Senator COWAN, would not be a reactionary reconstruction, sure to plunge us into further trouble. It would not be President JOHNSON and Secretary SEWARD who would control that alliance, but Mr. STEPHENS, Mr. VALLANDIGHAM, and Mr. PENDLETON. Whoever takes the responsibility of putting this Government into such hands will have a serious account to settle with the loyal American people.

THE MARTYR OF FORT MONROE.

THE strenuous effort of those who had no word of horror for the torture and assassination of Union soldiers at Andersonville and Belle-Isle to represent JEFFERSON DAVIS as the victim of cruelty at Fort Monroe have occasioned the publication of his bill of fare for a week, which has been widely published. There are thousands of honest people all over the land, who work hard for their living, who would be very glad of half as good fare as the Martyr of Fort Monroe daily enjoys. For those of our readers who may not have seen the list we quote a specimen:

"WEDNESDAY.—Breakfast—Ham and eggs, wheat and corn-bread, butter, sugar, coffee, milk. Dinner—Mutton-soup, stewed oysters, pickled oysters, corn-bread, butter, coffee.

"THURSDAY.—Breakfast—Beef-steak, two boiled eggs, wheat or corn-bread, butter, sugar, milk, coffee. Dinner—Veal cutlets, pressed oysters, potatoes, salsola, bread, butter, coffee.

"FRIDAY.—Breakfast—Stewed oysters, mackerel, or fresh fish, wheat and corn-bread, butter, sugar, milk, coffee. Dinner—Pork-steak, poached eggs, potatoes, salsola, bread, butter, coffee.

"SATURDAY.—Breakfast—Mutton-chops, two boiled eggs, bread, butter, milk, sugar, coffee. Dinner—Stewed oysters, potatoes, salsola, bread, butter, coffee."

This probably compares favorably with the daily bill of fare at Andersonville; but since there will undoubtedly be a persistent attempt to excite sympathy for the imprisonment of JEFFERSON DAVIS as a political prisoner suffering for an honest difference of opinion, it is as well to understand clearly precisely what his position is.

The odium that hangs around his name, and which will forever deepen, does not arise from the fact that he was the President of the Confederate State sovereignty and the constitutionally reserved right of secession; but that he and his fellow-conspirators drifted into that vast frenzine at the cost of countless innocent lives and of the welfare of the country, not to remedy injustice or oppression for which there was no legal redress, but to establish a new system of tyranny under the sun. Had DAVIS and his confederates appealed to God and mankind for the redress of their wrongs, and unsealed in the purpose of the war which they invoked—had they armed against the National Government in the name of vital State rights which that Government had usurped—had they risen against an arbitrary power which was grinding them and their families, and transforming upon every hearth and constitutional rights for which it refused a remedy—then, indeed, the last terrible appeal to blood, which only hopeless oppression authorizes, would have been justified, and the struggle, however unfortunate, would have commanded the admiration and sympathy of the world.

It is idle to say that, holding secession to be a constitutional right, they might assert it at any time, and for any purpose which pleased them. When war is the cost of the practical assertion of what is held to be justified only by the fact of vital grievance for which there is no other redress, or by the purpose for which it is intended to be used, the question of right was the justification of our great revolution of 1776. But what is JEFFERSON DAVIS as the official representative of the rebellion of 1861? He is a man who recently plunged his country into the most fearful war, and flooded it with blood that he might whip women and sick children into his service. His pretense was State sovereignty, his purpose was human slavery. That was the object for which he and the other leaders "fired the Southern heart," and for which they directed the war. For this they starved brave men at Andersonville and Belle-Isle, tortured them into idiocy, and shot them like dogs. For this were Southern Union men seized at night, and before the eyes of their despairing wives and agonized children hung and shot and drowned. For this they organized and armed thousands of conscripts to die upon the field of battle. For this JEFFERSON DAVIS's garments reek with innocent blood, and his name is a stench.

Here is a pretty martyr, with his ham and eggs and pauned oysters! Here is a Christian hero; and General MILES must be removed if he does not bow low enough! Here is a model American, who must be magnified into a Spielberg victim and sufferer of the Bastile if his muffins are not toasted, and his beef-steak is overdone! Our readers will bear us witness that we have not advocated vengeance, that we think the trial of DAVIS for treason a mistake, and that we are ready to take, with fair precautions, all the necessary and inevitable risks of the situation. But the republican sentimentality that would drape with the dignity of a martyr for political opinion a man who for such a purpose waged such a war we believe will disastrously recoil upon those who foster it. We have no wish to revive dead feuds or to use harsh words, but we can conceive no greater misfortune to the manhood of American youth than that they should be taught to regard BENEDICT ARNOLD as an honorable man, or JEFFERSON DAVIS as a guiltless and unfortunate patriot.

PAUSE IN EUROPE.

IT is natural that the great powers of Europe should pause upon the edge of war and reflect if there be no alternative. It is so long since there was a general war upon the Continent, and every one has such a inevitable horror and so doubtful a conclusion, that it is not strange there is reluctance to strike the first blow. Once struck, there would be no recoil. Once begun, war could end only in a reconstruction of the map, and an enormous debt, weighing upon every belligerent with crushing force.

Yet we do not see that war can be easily avoided. If the considerations were merely dynastical, they could be settled in a Congress. But they are not, and involve the most absorbing passions. Italy will go into no Congress which does not accept the cession of Venice to the Italians as a preliminary. Yet Austria can not consent to relinquish Venice without fatally impairing her prestige as a great power. Prussia can not consent without some equivalent which will prevent Austria from her to the Rhine; yet where is the equivalent that can be offered? The call of a Congress is wise, if only to show that no accommodation is practicable. It is said already; GARIBALDI has been summoned to the head of the volunteers. A large loan has been taken. The people believe that Venice must be sacred. It has the sympathy of the world. The eager Italians believe the long looked-for hour is already striking. How can they pause? If the dictatorship of GARIBALDI back to Cypress they must be ready to face an insurrection. Austria must therefore, as it seems to us, surrender the Italian portion of her empire or there must be war.

And if it comes and desolates Europe, let us learn its lesson. It is simply this, that any sentiment of right will cause convulsion which is reactionary will very soon revenge itself upon those who make it by plunging them into deeper trouble. The great revolution of 1641 ended in the death of CROMWELL by the return of CHARLES II. and the old STUART régime. It was a reactionary settlement, and it ended rightly and justly by the massacre of a vast war, which was avoided by the peaceful and "glorious" revolution of 1688 and a settlement which was not reactionary. The revolution of 1787 in France was finally composed by the settlement of 1815 which was reactionary. It was made in the interest of certain families, and not of the nations or of the people of Europe. Consequently there have been discontents and dangers and overthrows until now, after fifty years, the settlement is abandoned either by a Congress, which is improbable, or by the sword.

In this country we are doing for the Union what the settlement of 1815 did for Europe. Let us take care that it be not reactionary like that, but in the direction of the war itself, like the glorious settlement of England in 1688

WALL STREET SQUABBLES.

A FALL in Erie stock from 96 in January last to 9 in June has led to much angry comment in newspapers which sympathize with holders of stock. Some journals have fiercely denounced Mr. DANIEL DREW, the leading director of the road, who have tried to make him responsible for the decline.

Now we have no desire to figure as Mr. DREW's apologist. He is old enough and able enough to take care of himself. But in a matter of this kind a little common sense is not out of the way.

It is no secret that the earnings of the Erie Railway have fallen off half a million in the first four months of 1866; that the concern owes, exclusive of bonded debt, nearly four millions of dollars which it can not pay; and that no dividends can be paid for some years to come. Under these circumstances, for which no director of the road is responsible, a decline in the stock would seem fully warranted. If any body is to be taken to task on the subject, why not assail Mr. ROBERT H. BERDELL, the President, instead of this or that director?

But it is said that Mr. DREW is a speculator in the stock, and has made money on the decline. This may or may not be the case. We pretend to no information on the subject. Mr. DREW is well known as a large, bold, and generally successful operator in Wall Street. We presume he denies this to no one. As such he operates in all stocks, including the stock of the Erie Railway, of which he is a director. When he thinks it is going up he buys for the rise; when he thinks it is going down he sells for the fall. Whether he sold for the fall when the stock was 80 @ 90 no one but he and his broker know. If he did not do so, he neglected his business as a speculator. For it was clear to every one, three or four months ago, that a heavy fall in Erie was sooner or later inevitable. But to hold him responsible for that fall, simply because it is known that he foresaw it and acted upon his prescience, is on a par with holding an astronomer responsible for the occurrence of an eclipse.

The abuse of Mr. DREW emanates from cliques which have bought large quantities of stock for the rise, and are disgusted that the public do not take it as fast as them off their hands. The famous clique which bought up all the Prairie du Chien, and own it still, has lately bought all the floating New York Central at 93 @ 98, and are waiting for somebody to buy it of them at an advance. They are said to have lodged $2,500,000 with some bankers as margin on the operation, and as long as money remains easy they can go on buying stock and holding it indefinitely. Another clique has bought up all the Cleveland and Pittsburg, and are holding that, waiting, like MCCAWBER, for something to turn up which shall relieve them of their burden. Another clique have bought up all the Canton, another all the Boston Water-power; another all the Fort Wayne. All these cliques argue that the prevailing ease of money, like MR. MCCULLOCH has created, must sooner or later generate speculation in stocks, and lead the public to take their property off their hands at an advance. That they have not met with any great success. With a brief exceptional period, money has ruled at 4 @ 5 per cent. for going on two years, and speculation has not developed in Wall Street. Commission brokers are doing little or nothing. The fall in Erie naturally confirmed the unwillingness of the outside public to buy stocks, and hence the abuse of Mr. DREW in newspapers which are devoted to the interests of the overloaded cliques.

Speculation may yet break out. The brokers all desire it from natural motives, and the public may yet possibly be lured into the arena. But the uncertain state of affairs at Washington, Mr. MCCULLOCH may play fast and loose, as he has done hitherto. But the people at large want a return to a specie currency, and they will have it sooner or later. So long as that is impending speculations for the rise will be dangerous. The Opposition party will presently put a hard-money plank in their platform, and unless the Administration meets the move with a corresponding pledge, and evinces some willingness to carry it out, it will be defeated at the elections. Smart as Wall Street is, and keenly as the old leads of that meridian scan the signs of the times, it is plain as the sun at noonday that such a party can not be worth a dollar in gold the tendency of prices, with periodical and spasmodic exceptions, must be downward, and speculation for the account of the rise must sooner or later be overwhelmed in ruin.

A CORRESPONDENT ANSWERED.

A WALL STREET correspondent, referring to an article of last week entitled "Financiering Extraordinary," asks seven questions:

1. Is it a fact, as stated in that article, that somebody made three millions out of the Government on the sales of gold?

Answer.—Mr. PETER M. MYERS, Government broker, sold $32,000,000, or thereabout, of Government gold at 130¾ @ 130¾. All last week the price was 130¾ @ 131. The difference between the buyers of Government gold realized the difference between 130¾ and say 141, which, on $32,000,000, is about $3,500,000 in currency.

2. Who bought the Government gold and realized this profit?

Answer.—Nobody can answer this question. The gold was bought chiefly in large lots, many of them a million each, by leading gold-dealers, who do not publish the names of those for whom they have bought for themselves. Nothing but an inspection of the books of the parties to whom the Government gold was delivered could determine the names of the real buyers.

3. Was it possible for any Government agents, knowing the purpose of the Department, and rightly construing the import of the news from Europe, to buy gold from Mr. MYERS so as to be sure of a profit?

Answer.—Mr. MYERS had his orders to sell at 130¾ and free of commission. He, and any persons to whom he may have imparted the secret of his orders, must have known perfectly well that as soon as he stopped selling the news of the London panic would drive gold up 5 @ 10 per cent. Buying gold from MYERS was therefore a sure operation, especially after he had sold ten or twelve millions. There is no evidence to show that any Government agent did take advantage of MYERS's orders, and speculate in gold. But there must have been several Government agents besides MYERS who had an opportunity on that Monday afternoon of making a fortune at the expense of the Government.

A. Is MYERS still the Government broker? and how came he to be selected for the post?

Answer.—MYERS is still, so far as we know, the Government broker. His selection for the post is understood to have arisen from his being the brother-in-law of Secretary MCCULLOCH.

THE PAID FIRE DEPARTMENT.

The question of a paid Fire Department in a large city no more admits of serious discussion than that of a paid police. There is no more efficient body of firemen in the world than the Paris pompiers, and although great fires are infrequent there, because the houses are not built as with us so as to insure destruction if they take fire, yet the management is admirably prompt, skilful, and decisive. The treatment of fires in our inflammable cities is serious work. To be properly done there must be a body of men ready to move and act at any moment. These men must be of independent circumstances or they must be well paid. To leave the labor to chance volunteers is to create a dangerous class in the community, as was fully established by the investigation which preceded the passage of the Paid Department Bill. There may be among them decent and skilful men, as the experience of fires in New York proves; but it is idle to suppose that they would be ready daring or less skilful if their services were properly appreciated and rewarded.

The laborer is worthy of his hire.

For our distant friends we may state that the opposition to the paid system proceeds from that interest in the city of New York to which we owe our enormous taxation and utter misgovernment. It is that interest of lowly venal and corrupt politicians which has made the name of the city a by-word and reproach, and which keeps it politically in alliance with all that is mean and un-American. It is a conclusive argument for the paid system that this interest bitterly denounced it, as it denounced the Police Commission and the Board of Health. If a man is known by his friends, great public measures are tested by their enemies. When FERNANDO WOOD was ready to oppose by force the introduction of the Police Board there was not an intelligent citizen who did not know that the Board was absolutely essential to the protection of the city. And when the "shysters" and "bunkers" of every degree are in full cry against the Paid Fire Department, its necessity and value are fully established.

THE FENIAN RAID.

THAT Ireland has real wrongs, and that the rule of that island by England has been generally fierce and stupid, can not be denied. But there is of late years a manifest disposition to reason and reform, and in so complicated a difficulty there can be no hope except in the greatest good sense upon both sides. The total forgetfulness of this fact has occasioned the recent wild and criminal efforts at Irish rebellion, so that it is the folly of the revolutionary leaders which is responsible for the constant delays and despairs of the English friends of Ireland.

While the Fenian movement was confined to Jones's Wood and the "Moffat Building" it was merely amusing, except for its mad waste of the hardly-earned money of simple men and women. But when a rabble cross the border, and without artillery or supplies of any kind begin to make war by murdering honest people who turn out to defend their homes, the affair ceases to be contemptible and becomes criminal, and the worst fate that should befall such offenders would excite little pity. Mr. O'MAHONY is very probably a sincere enthusiast, as it is said of Lovejoy as a blind man to whom seems a seventy-four. Mr. STEPHENS, there is no reason to doubt, is much of the same character; but many of the other managers are simply men who have fortunately disgusted many of their followers.

It is a poetic justice that Canada, which was a nest of the most malignant rebels during the late war in this country, and which smiled placidly at their forays and plots against the lives and properties of loyal Americans, should has been invaded by one of the very rebels whose confederates she so gladly harbored. The O'NEILL who figures in the late affray at the mouth of the Niagara River was a companion and friend of WISE at Andersonville. He raised a body of Irishmen among the prisoners he was starving to fight against this country. Canada cheered him on; Canada was polite to O'NEILL'S comrades, CLEMENT CLAY and JACOB THOMPSON; O'NEILL was bravely fighting for "his country." Points of view differ, and Canada can now comprehend exactly how her conduct seemed to loyal American citizens.

The conduct of our Government in the whole affair has been prompt and honorable. There has been no simulated neutrality. General GRANT, passing by chance through Buffalo, issued the necessary orders. The directions from Washington were decisive, and were not delayed because of any untimely color of the legal advisers of the Government, as in the case of the British counselor, whose stomach-ache allowed the Alabama to escape.

We hope that those honest people who are anxious to redress the wrongs of Ireland will now see that the road to that redress does not lie through the blood of innocent men in Canada. They have given their money, and have received in return a foolish blunder and a monstrous crime. Men of the O'NEILL kind are their worst enemies, and willfully bring the noblest cause to shame and ruin.

HEAT-FOOD AND BUILDING-FOOD.

"To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

"In your issue of May 19 I find an article on 'Heat-Food and Building-Food,' to which I wish to take exception.

"The author asserts it as a fact that fat and oily food is necessary to a proper nourishment of the body, and that those who abstain from it are apt to have a pallid and bloodless skin. Perkins, an eminent authority, says: 'Fixed oil or fat is more difficult of digestion, and more injurious to the stomach than any other alimentary principle.' It is possible for it to be 'very difficult of digestion' and yet a 'desirable article of human consumption' as well as wholesome? Rather does not the experience of medical men go well as our own observation to show that the healthiest is easily digestible which we relish? Comparatively few are fond of fat meat. We are speaking now of those in good health, not those who, in cases of dyspepsia, are subject to morbid appetites and depraved tastes. Dr. Dalton, one of the most distinguished writers on St. Martin, found the gastric juice very slow in its operation on fat, and that it (fat) generally remained in the stomach undigested. Fat is also known to be the cause of boils, pimples, and blotches on the skin.

"It is also stated that the system must require more nitrogenous food than those who lead an inactive life, for there is in them more organic tissue to be daily therefore required of material for it. For this reason men that live almost wholly on such articles as potatoes or other starchy vices, which have comparatively little of the nitrogenous element in them, can not do or endure as much as those who have a generous supply of animal food available in their diet. So, also, a horse that is not worked will be in good condition if fed on oats and potatoes, but if he is worked he will lose flesh unless grain be made a part of his food.' I am unable to perceive where the force of this sentence is to be with eating meat. Father think it is an argument against it. A number of instances can be cited to prove how hard-working men subsist on vegetables alone with advantage. The mountaineers of the Tyrol and the natives of Chili live on Heat-Food, as the author wishes to consist statistics, he will find not only that vegetarians are noted for longevity, but that they are free from the many disease and fatigue that flesh-eaters are. Laboring men, who suffer more of the 'wear and tear' of the human frame of endurance, are not available as 'regular' or 'reliable,' and therefore more nutritious. Many of these articles are strong, nutritious substances known, yet wheat contains but a little over two per cent. of nitrogen, and oatmeal but a little more. The Irish subsist entirely on milk, potatoes, and perhaps a few other vegetables, are a hardy and long-lived race.

"The animal we eat will, in time, become as nutritious. Those which live exclusively on vegetables, and whose flesh is formed of the proximate principle of those vegetables, are most relished and sought for among civilized nations. It follows, therefore, that vegetables are more perfectly on plants. Why not, then, eat those plants in a pure and primitive state, and (to say nothing of the disgusting loathsome of butchering) do away with the science help we obtain much of our food, and that save an immense amount of hard labor, and consequently of comfort and wealth in furnishing force for clothing and commerce? If animal food is more nutritious than vegetable, why not, in eating an flesh meat, the purity of which is always more or less influenced by the state of the animal?

"Yours truly, A VEGETARIAN."

The points brought out by "Vegetarian" are easily disposed of.

As to the digestion of fatty or oily substances, it has been discovered that this is not really done in the stomach. They are merely intimately mingled there with the other articles of food, and the elements of the organ, and pass unaltered into the small intestine. Here by the action of the pancreatic juice, the change is effected which enables it to be absorbed by the lacteals, and to be poured into the blood; in other words, here they are digested. Starchy food, which is the only food which is not limited to the stomach, we say, in opposition to what is quoted from PERKINS and BOARDMAN, that it is digested in the stomach, not the stomach, indeed, can not digest it; and the gastric juice, instead of being "very slow in its operation on fat," as BOARDMAN says, does not operate upon it at all, but the pancreatic juice does the work, and does it easily.

"Vegetarian" objects to enjoining the use of fat meat upon those who dislike it; that what is not relished is not easily digestible. It is indeed true that the relishing of food aids digestion greatly, and yet one can generally learn to eat fat meat, even though the aversion to it is very decided, but fresh, and not rancid, and may be so eaten to make up for the deficiency. That a considerable proportion of oily food is necessary in some form is a settled fact. A wide observation teaches it. The instincts of men as to food show it. Nature demonstrates it in the fat of the human female in milk; that beautiful combination containing all the requisite elements of food. It is an error to say that fat in itself will produce boils, pimples, and blotches on the skin." An undue use of them may, it is true, sometimes produce these effects, but they cannot be produced by any moderate use.

"Vegetarian," in thinking that what was said of the horse is an argument against eating meat, fails to perceive the point of the allusion. The point to be illustrated was that work, making wear and tear, called for a larger amount of building or nitrogenous food than was needed in the idle. And so we give to the working horse grain, which, being more nitrogenous than hay and potatoes, is to him what the nitrogenous meat is to man.

As to the statistics referred to as favoring vegetarianism, we do not believe that if fairly examined they will justify the conclusions claimed for them. We think that when good results have been ascertained to come from what is reputed to be a vegetable diet, it will be found that it was not strictly vegetable. One of the statements of "Vegetarian" shows a looseness on this very point. "The poor Irish," he says, "who subsist almost entirely on milk, potatoes, and perhaps a few other vegetables, are a hardy and long-lived race." Is milk a vegetable article of diet? A sinister mistake was once committed by a student, who, on going into the kitchen, found the cook in tears, and was quite loud in praise of vegetarianism, because he had gained so much flesh and strength. On inquiring it was found that milk was the animal basis of his vegetable diet. The Irishman living almost exclusively on potatoes, or the Chinaman on rice, breathes the foulest polluted and slender-limbed; but let him have in addition milk or any other article furnishing a due proportion of both nitrogenous and oily food, and his abdomen will lessen and his limbs enlarge to their normal volume.

"Vegetarian" says that "the flesh we eat comes mostly from herbivorous animals, we had better eat the vegetables from which their flesh is manufactured than the flesh itself. The same reasoning would properly lead us a step farther, and prompt us to go to the source of the nutrition of the vegetables; in other words, to what they eat by their roots to make them grow, so that we should be dirt eaters instead of vegetable eaters. "Vegetarian" does not seem to recognize the order of nature in regard to nutrition. All nutriment comes at first from the mineral world, and plants are the means of transmitting mineral matter to animals. The animal eats the mineral substances, and put it into such forms as make it fit nutriment for animals. There are some animals that live on this vegetable food alone, and are called herbivorous; others that live on animal food exclusively or more, and thus get their nutrition one remove farther from mother earth, and are called carnivorous. Others still eat both animal and vegetable food and are termed omnivorous. All animals but man are governed wholly by instinct in this matter. He is left to reason. If on the one hand he can look to the promptings of instinct, the adaptations of the digestive organs as compared with those of other animals, and the results of observation and experience, these all point to a mixed animal and vegetable diet, and not to that of the vegetarian.

HOME FOR SOLDIERS' ORPHANS IN MISSOURI.

GOVERNOR FLETCHER, of Missouri, and Dr. RICHARDSON, the State Surgeon-General, most warmly commend the project of the Home for Soldiers' Widows and Orphans, of St. Joseph, in that State. Missouri suffered sorely and peculiarly during the war, and the natural sympathy of other Union States has been expressed in many generous subscriptions and contributions. There is still room for more, and we are very confident that such a charity commends itself readily to every heart. Mr. GUYLER, one of the trustees, is now in the city, at the Lafarge House, and will receive any contributions or give any information.

LITERARY.

"Arrindale" is the title of WILKIE COLLINS'S new novel, just published by the HARPERS. The characteristics of this author are so pronounced and familiar as those of any living writer. He gives us always an elaborate and original plot, worked out by persons and characters so artistically that a delicacy of detail entirely unsurpassed. They reveal themselves wholly to the reader, who watches every motive and act with the relish of psychology. It follows with intense interest the play of every part of the wonderful human frame. Or he puts a mysterious skein into our hands which we watch with eager curiosity the exact structure of animalcule which are interesting solely from the delicate care with which they are revealed. This patient and refined process makes every one of COLLINS'S novels more than the mere effort of books have the reality of exciting criminal trials, and there is perhaps no novelist who so plays with and prolongs the curiosity of interest. The depravity he delineates, as in the character of Mrs Gwilt in "Armadale," is startling, but he vindicates its probability, and the reader accompanies the long and dark progress of the story upon the cheerful conclusion as the traveler, after a stormy and exciting voyage at sea, sees the distant green shores of the sunny harbor awaiting him.

"The New York Social Science Review" is a quarterly journal of Sociology, Political Economy, and Statistics, edited by SIDNEY SIDNEY and J. K. H. WILLCOX. It is a work of faith and enthusiasm, proposing, "without personal or partisan feelings, to examine by the light of science the political and social evolutions of the day." It will also reprint all important State documents of the current quarter. It also contains a valuable Statistical and International Almanac, and the "Review" will doubtless be a convenient and serviceable reference, as well as a stout advocate of scientific social progress.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

May 29:

In the Senate, the reconstruction resolutions were then taken up. A bill was introduced to amend the rebels bill of March 1870, was stricken out by a unanimous vote.—The Railroad Bill was passed by a vote of 29 to 9.—The Pennsylvania railroad may carry all passengers, troops, mails, Government supplies, etc., free on State lines to whether, provided that this act shall not affect any stipulation made between the Government and any railroad company now existing.

In the House, the new Freedmen's Bureau Bill was passed, 96 to 58.

May 31:

In the Senate, Mr. Wilson, from the Committee of the two House on the death of General Scott, reported a resolution of respect and veneration for the memory of the deceased, and that a joint committee of seven Senators and nine Representatives be appointed to represent Congress at the funeral of the late Lieutenant-General. The resolution was adopted.—The Reconstruction resolutions was taken up, the pending question being a substitute for Section 3, already stricken out. It does not restrict suffrage, but steps off all those from holding a civil or military office, either under the United States or any State, who have broken their oath of allegiance to the United States by being guilty of insurrection or in aiding the rebellion. Mr. Doolittle opposed the section. It was adopted by a vote of 35 to 10.

In the House, the Senate's amendments to the House bill to limit the Presidential, postal, and Congressional representation among the several States were taken from the Speaker's table and concurred in. The bill has, therefore, passed both Houses.—The House resumed the consideration of the bill to promote the construction of a line of railroad from Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, to Cleveland, Ohio.—The bill was passed by a vote of 71 to 41.—The concurrent resolution providing for an adjournment until December 4 for a consultation of Congress with the Commissioners of General Scott, was agreed to unanimously.—The bill providing for the construction of a railroad between Washington and the Northwest was passed.—yeas 95, nays 37.

CHOLERA IN QUARANTINE.

On the 25th of May the British steamship Tridon, from Liverpool, G. T., the 22d of May, arrived at Quarantine. She had on the passage thirty, most of them by cholera. She had also had some fifteen cases, one of which died on board. The sick passengers were landed. The next day the Perseverance, from Liverpool, arrived with 758 passengers on board of her. She had died of cholera on the passage, 15 were on board sick.

The Board of Health, called to obtain a temporary hospital on Long Island or Staten Island, are anxious to make use of the west shore of Coney Island for this purpose.

Under date of May 29 the Quarantine Commissioners report, that 96 new cases of cholera had been reported. The ship Perseverance reported that 3 had died of the disease on the 29th, and 12 deaths had occurred.

The Deputy Health Officer reports that "considerable must be done soon, or the mortality among the passengers of the Perseverance will exceed that of any vessel in this port." "The hospital," he adds, "is now much overcrowded. Every bed is filled, and the sick are laid upon with mud and dying." The Quarantine officer on the 30th says that "the sick and dying of the Tridon can be of the worst cases of cholera I ever saw in my life."

There are no new cases of cholera reported from the sheds in the harbor, and the Health Officer states that the disease has taken very unfavorable turn, and seems to break out from their fleeting nature, and that a mutiny is liable to occur at any time. The Commissioners dispatched to the Board of Health that if another ship with cholera on passengers arrives he has not a place in which to put a patient.

THE FENIANS INVADE CANADA.

On the 31st of June a few hundred members of the Sweeny premises crossed the border into Canada and captured Fort Erie—which is opposite the city of Buffalo, at the upper end of the Niagara River, a few miles above the Falls. Here they destroyed the railroad bridge on the 30th. The Fenians found it impossible to hold their prize, where a large portion of them were captured by the United States troops guarding the frontier. Upon the approach, it is said, of Colonel O'NEIL—the leader of the invading force—with his staff,

NEWS ITEMS.

Colonel Jacques, of Illinois, having been tried on the indictment found against him in Kentucky for rape, has been triumphantly acquitted. One of the witnesses summoned on his behalf now examined, but the case was submitted to the jury without the defense having written a word of argument from the counsel for the defendant. The jury returned a verdict of "Not guilty."

"The writer who undertook to wrest Colonel Jacques from the clutches of the law," says the prosecutor, "is the jury that they were a grateful pack of liars, and so completely established their character that nothing was needed on behalf of the accused. He was prepared to prove, by some of the best men in the State, that he was in Illinois at times when some of the witnesses testified to his presence in Louisville, and that he was in the adjoining State; and by others that he was in this city on a certain day on which he was to be prosecuted before a court in Louisville; but the proof was unnecessary."

The Hon. Jesse Dubois, Auditor of State, Register of Vital Statistics, shows a total of 252 deaths in the city during the week ending on the 26th of May. The total number is less than on any previous week.

Governor Marshall, of Virginia, has been here investigating the management of the Freedmen's Bureau in Georgia, will report favorably on the present administration of affairs.

The returns of the West Virginia elections indicate a majority ranging from eight to twelve thousand for the amendment to the State Constitution. The test of the amendment is as follows: "No person who, since the 1st day of June, 1861, has been or may be guilty voluntarily of assistance to the rebellion against the United States, shall be a citizen of this State, or be allowed to vote or hold office until he shall have obtained a pardon from the President, and has been so long and for such time as he shall be honorably discharged therefrom."

FOREIGN NEWS.

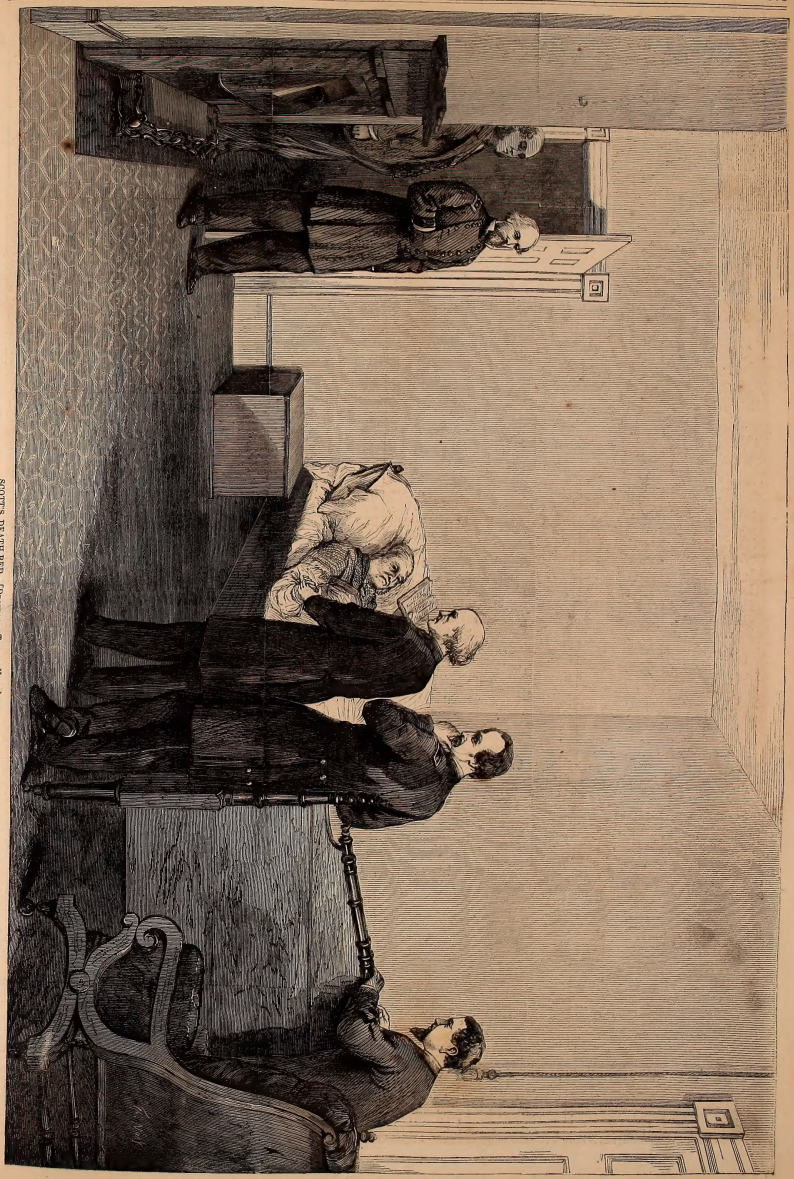
THE WAR ON THE PLATE.

In March, after a delay of nearly ten months, active hostilities were resumed by Spain against Chili, the occasion of short thirty years, including four in-clads, with its recent purchase of the Chilian fleet of the iron-clad, anchored in two divisions opposite the Territory of the Little Republic of Tarapaca. The Chilian fleet, consisting of about 60,000 men of all arms, also advanced toward the eastern bank of the Rio de la Plata.

In an engagement with the fort at Itapiru, a Brazilian fleeched, which was of 600 tons burden, with a section launch, and 84 men were put here on combat.

On the 2d of May the first battle was fought between Brazilian and Paraguayan soldiers. The Imperial forces have been gathering for months at the mouth of the River of Itapiru, and about half-way across the first, the Paraguayan attempted to dislodge them. Here they failed, and having given the alarm, the garrison, consisting of nearly two thousand men, with as few cannon, were hurried forward in line of battle, and as the Paraguayans drew near the Brazilians poured upon them a deadly fusillade which and following it up by a bayonet charge, drove them to the beach, killing over 600 of them, taking 400 prisoners, 60 canoes, and 700 muskets. The Brazilian loss is reported at 44 killed and 200 wounded.

On April 17 another battle took place. The allied army, 16,000 strong, crossed the Parana. The Paraguayans attacked them with considerable bravery and great tenacity, but, as usual, but only defeated. The allies had 1,000 killed and wounded. The Brazilian loss was 40 killed and 180 wounded. Rapidity was then abandoned by the Paraguayans.



THE GERMAN QUARREL.

At the latest advices the German question was still unsettled, nor was any thing definite known concerning the proposed Congress. Meanwhile, peace demonstrations on a large scale were taking place in Prussia, and serious disturbances were reported, occasioned by calling out the reserves. In Italy the war spirit was enthusiastic and general. Volunteers were flocking by thousands to take their part in the war for the liberation of Venetia.

Notwithstanding recent rumors, the Alexandra Dock was the marriage of Princess Dagmar with Prince Christian will take place on the 9th of July.

WINFIELD SCOTT.

SCOTT'S DEATH-BED.—[DRAWN BY THOMAS NAST.]

ODE BY A BROOKLYNITE.

SHE came like a beautiful vision
To brighten the night of my care,
Her dress was arranged with precision,
In ringlets descended her hair.

In a stage on its way to the ferry
We met, as is usual, by chance;
'Neath the spell of her glances my very
Soul sank into amorous trance.

Alas! how by rude fate are banished
Illusions we'd willingly nurse!
I started—my vision had vanished,
And so had my watch and my purse.

IN DISGUISE.

"WHAT's the matter with your hand, Cato?"

"Berry oldigin' for massa to ask. Burnt me, fish, totin a kettle o' coaller fat for Dinah, but Miss Mira got some salve on it, done it a heap o' good. She's so berry kind to eby body, is Miss Mira."

Yes, kind to every one but me. I thought that as I rode through the gate Cato held wide open, and, dismounting, flung him the reins; kind to the servants in the kitchen, the dog who came limping to the door, to beggar and wandering tramp; to guest, and kin, and stranger; to every body and every thing but me—to whom she should not have been kind, eat of all; for I loved her, loved her as men love who only love once in their lives. Even then my heart was beating furiously to feel myself so near her. My step quickened, I flung the door wide open and strode in. I heard my aunt cry, "It's Paul!" I heard my uncle utter the name more pleasantly, and a furious, tumultuous barking and leaping told me that Nep had awakened from his nap upon the rug to greet his master. In a moment more the red light of the open fire had flashed upon me, and I grasped two plump old hands.

"Really we were anxious about you" cried my aunt. "We expected you yesterday. How is your mother, and why didn't Nina come with you?"

Then, before I could answer, my uncle said, "Just in time for dinner, my boy. Let's talk it over at the table. Why, Mira, my one would fancy you did not see each other."

"I'm sure he's large enough," said Mira, counting her stitches as she sat at crochet work. "Are you not, Paul? I told them you'd come back again, like a bad penny."

I nodded slowly, and stooped to pat the fawning dog, begging mutely for a caress. Poor comfort it was, yet, after all, some little, to know that Mira pretended now much I cared for her. It was as careless in my manner to her as she was to me. I imitated her as thoroughly as good-breeding would allow in one of my sex, and said quietly, "Again, "At least, I can take the secret to my grave with me. The girl shall not triumph, as she would, in my pain.

I had whistled Nep out of the room, and followed my old uncle to the dining-parlor. I suppose no one could have guessed that I was any thing but happy as I chatted of my journey and gave Nina's excuses for absence. "She is to be bridemaid for a friend," said I; "and there are dresses to be made, and I know not what to do, before the day arrives."

"Who is the bride?" asked my aunt.

"Lilla Newsome."

"And you the bridegroom, eh?" chirruped Mira. "I?"

"Why, we heard you adored Lilla."

"I've always admired her."

"And she has jilted you?"

"Not so bad as that."

"Let me sympathize with you."

"Not at all; there are other pretty blondes in the world."

I said that because Mira was as dark as any Cuban.

"A blonde? Hear him, aunt. Had I yellow hair and blue eyes I'd have the grace to admire brunettes."

"We can't help our fancies," said I, who absolutely disliked light coloring.

"Of course not; now, if you were not fair."

"Well?"

"I'd tell you how I admire dark men."

"Don't stop for that. I shouldn't care."

Her black eyes danced. "You'll see my idea of perfection to-night," said she. "Captain Earnly!"

"I have seen the gentleman."

"By-the-way, I promised to play something for him to-night," said Mira, "and I'd much prefer you shan't be able to remember it. Excuse me, will you, good folks?" and away she tripped, leaving us in the midst of dessert.

Captain Earnly did call that evening, and she played for him, and sang with him. He told her stories of his prowess as a soldier, and she was wonderously interested. He mentioned his wounds, and she pitied him with voice and eyes. I thought him an affected coxcomb. She evidently could not lead him a hero of the first water.

I sat on the porch without the window, smoking and chatting with my uncle. Once or twice I thought of the Spartan boy's fox gnawing and tearing at his bosom. So my love tore me, and so I said it—better to die of it than have it seen.

She was not my cousin by blood, that dark-eyed siren—only uncle's adopted child. She first of Lilliehigh stood between us, for though cousins have and I scarcely think they ever loved very truly, she was the very realization of my dream of girlish beauty. She was every thing I had ever hoped for; and when coming back from that long journey, in which I had well-nigh "put a girdle round about the world," I found her altered from a romping child to what she was. I knew my fate was sealed; and for a little while the sad hour so kind to me that I had been made a fool of.

It was very different now. She had bound up Cato's black hand. She sighed over the black-haired Captain's storied scratches. Yet six months before I had been wounded nearly unto death by an accident, and her first greeting on my convalescence was, "You careless wretch, the only wonder is you didn't manage to cut your arm quite off, and make a fright of yourself for life! I've no patience with people who can't look where they are going. You'll break your back yet, and end your days in a wheel chair."

"Let me keep the use of my feet at least, so long as I am to dwell within reach of your voice," said I, and we passed for a couple of uncourteous jesters.

Sometimes, in my character of cousin, I used to act as Mira's escort. Old enough it was to see how tired she grew of me. How any stranger seemed better company than I. And some day, when she had been wooed and won, perhaps by the Captain bending over her at the piano, I should shake hands and utter some careless congratulation, and she would nod adieu to me, and we should part forever. Strange enough, all of it, when I remembered how I actually felt toward her.

The Captain was going. He had looked at his dainty watch. "Shocking to think how late we was! How lightly falls the foot of Time that only treads on flowers!" and, with a quotation and a bow and a glance at Mira, the room was empty of him. It was a relief to me.

Mira had reseated herself at the piano. I sauntered in and sat near her. "Will you not remember for me?" I asked. "This sweet old thing for instance?" and I tossed "Love Not" upon the piano.

"Sweet old things are tiresome, and I am tired," said Mira; and if she could have read my soul she could not have blushed deeper. Perhaps she was thinking of the Captain.

"If you could only hear Nina's friend, Miss Deane, sing that," said I, affecting to yawn.

"Another blonde?"

"A lovely one."

"Ah!" and laughing she arose, and going out upon the porch gathered two or three rose-buds. Not because she wanted them, I think, but merely to show me that she was not at crochet work. I put

"Why, I think it would freeze to death before morning," said Frisbee.

"Yes, for it is tender; but the chickens are hardy. And Puss is hardy, and so is Mat. Look at him—a few minutes ago he lay here by the fire, and now he sits out there in the cold wind without even a sign of great-coat or mittens."

"Mat in mittens!" said Prim, with a laugh.

"But I think he has a great-coat—dear old Mat!" said Lily; "only it's more shaggy than any man's coat."

"It is just the same that he wore here by the fire," said Mrs. May. "But he is hardy—he can bear the cold."

"And we're half-hardy, and must be wrapped up," said Lily.

"Yes, and just so it is with plants. Some are perfectly hardy, and the frost can do them no harm."

"Those are the great strong plants, I suppose," said Lily—"the trees and bushes."

"Not always," said her mother. "Some trees will die in our Northern winter, while the little delicate flowers of the orchard have right to brave the frozen ground, in the midst of snow and ice and bitter winds. It is something in the nature of each plant, something derived from its native soil and air that makes it hardy, or half-hardy, or tender."

"What do you mean by its native soil, mamma?" said Prim, laying down her work. "Are plants of different nations too, like people?"

"Certainly," said Mrs. May; "and with strong instincts of patriotism. Geraniums, for instance—the green-house pelargoniums, which we call geraniums —with their glowing colors and rich leaves, are native children; they grow in tropical heat, where long creeping vines make festoons and hide the cliffs for the wild monkeys."

"Geraniums and monkeys!" said Lily; "oh, splendid!"

"Mamma," cried little Primrose, "how lovely it must be!"

"Not very—the monkey part of it," said her mother, smiling. "For indeed they are many of them not true monkeys but large baboons—very ugly and very mischievous."

"How large, mamma?" said Lily, who had a great weakness for every thing like a monkey.

"Some as large as a mastiff, and much stronger and of a dark brown color, with black hands and feet, a violet-blue face, and gray whiskers."

"What objects!" said Lily, laughing.

"And fierce animals, mamma?" said Clover.

"They just help to set off the strangeness and ugliness of the monkeys. In the mountains near the Cape of Good Hope, among the heights and passes, the cliffs are covered with wild creepers; the long trailing stems and runners making a complete network. Not a net-work of lare stems, but all hung with rich foliage and brilliant flowers; and scarlet berries and these wild creepers are a wilderness of geraniums and other superb tropical plants."

"What a nice time the baboons must have!" said little Primrose, giving a sigh to the geraniums.

"A very nice time! You can see them in troops of four or five hundred, sitting on the rocks, or climbing up and down the perpendicular cliffs by means of these 'monkeys' ladders' like so many boys in a wild school of gymnastics."

"And they've all 'tender,' I suppose," said Clover —"the geraniums and the monkeys and their ladders and all."

"All tender—not one could bear our winter climate; while, on the other hand, we and our plants and monkeys could as little endure the fierce heat of South Africa."

"Then plants and animals are tender or hardy just according to the heat of the land they belong to," said Clover.

"Very well so. The cocoanut-tree and the palm will not grow here in the open air, nor our apples and cherries in South Africa or New Zealand. The parrots never live in our northern States, even in summer, while the little snow-bird wings its way to the very shores of the Arctic Sea and there builds its nest."

"How beautiful it is, mamma!" said Clover. "Hardy, half-hardy, and tender—the words have such a new meaning to me now. The Sun must stay here all winter are hardy, and so are the evergreens, and the oaks, though they lose their leaves; and the apple-tree grows, deep down in the ground. But my hyacinth beans will not bear a bit of cold, nor most of my other plants."

"Clover has as if they were all growing already," said Lily, with a laugh. "But, after all, it's very interesting, of course, but I don't see what it has to do with our gardens, nor why Sam must stay here all winter and harden, and so are the evergreens, and the oaks, though they lose their leaves; and the apple-tree grows, deep down in the ground. But my hyacinth beans will not bear a bit of cold, nor most of my other plants."

"Clover has as if they were all growing already," said Lily, with a laugh. "But, after all, it's very interesting, of course, but I don't see what it has to do with our gardens, nor why Sam must stay here all winter are hardy

BURIAL OF SCOTT—SERVICES

GRAVE, IN WEST POINT CEMETERY.

"SHALL WE MEET THERE ALL OF THERE?"

As we rake up our eyes to you across expanse,
Where the great source of light sheds its beams and its heat,
Or, dimmed by the fast-fleeting clouds which enhance
The returning of what we so cheerfully greet;
A "mystical tie" seems to lead us aloft,
And our spirit, withdrawn, flies upward to where
With deep, melting thoughts, heave mournful and soft,
We anxiously ask, "Shall we meet there, all there?"

'Tis my Father revered for the care which he gave
To my earlier days when my thoughts were so wild
When I took little note of the future to save
The fast-gliding hours which were spent as a child.
With a deep, anxious look from his oft chilling eye,
He would ask me, "Dear boy, you will soon be a man.
I shall soon leave you here—I also must die,
Any fault of my words, and we meet while you can."

'Tis my Mother beloved—can I add to that name?
Beloved—it scarce tells all I feel in my heart!
Could I see her once more—she still in the same
As in childhood I knew her—then with her heart!
Ah! that dear mother's face is still there for me,
Though her spirit is veiled from my weak, mortal eyes;
And I feel that the bosom of yon heavenly light
Are a pathway which leads me to her in the skies.

'Tis my Sister, long since laid in peace by her side;
And oft as my thoughts wander back to that hour,
I remember her then—both the joy and the pride
Of our home, of our parents—a fresh-budding flower.
Still a child, without knowing the vices of this life,
She was taken away to the far Spirit-land,
Where innocence reigns, free from sinning or strife,
To be one of the pure in that heavenly band.

'Tis my Brother, the eldest—the hopes of our home,
Grown up to his prime, with a proud, noble heart;
We both like farewell when his country did roam,
And the sound of the drum bade our sorrows depart.
But he lies far away on the side of the sea,
Where they hastily hid his remains from their feet;
Though so dear to me now is the grave which they fill,
Still I wish they were here, where our fathers sleep quiet.

'Tis a beautiful world—notwithstanding the grief
Which commingles so much in the joys of this life,
And in this—at that time are but passing relief,
While the pleasures to come know no sorrow nor strife.
There's another, beyond us, around us, above,
Where Death never enters—there's nothing to fear.
Where that "mystical tie" will e'er bind us in love,
And we mutually say—"Shall we meet there all there?"

CONTRARYFORD, February 17, 1866.

HOME FROM THE SEA.

I.

In the second quarter of the eighteenth century Jotham Beverly resided on Nantucket Island, with, in a stone's-throw of the present village of Siasconset, and being a mile from the rather lonely house on Beverly beach. At that time the inhabitants of the island were very few—numbering only a few hundred, and they were even more lonely and harsh than they are at the present time. At the date of the commencement of my story the Indians, it is true, had deserted this their ancient dwelling station; but the markets for their white successors were far away, the spermaceti-trade was yet in its infancy—at least, in its early youth—and the island's soil gave response to the importunities of the husbandman only after long and patient toil; and, in fact, the inhabitants of Nantucket—save perhaps the fisheries for a livelihood—were the rudest and most primitive of Puritans.

But comparative good fortune always seemed to attend Jotham Beverly. He was a tall, raw-boned, sandy-haired, grasping Scotchman, good-hearted withal, and apparently with as much of the Yankee goahead activeness in his little finger as was contained in all of the heads of the little colony put together. Jotham's family consisted of three—his wife Margaret, his daughter Jean, and himself.

When Jotham was about forty years of age, and had lived on the island for a number of years, he conceived the project, the completion of which was the great ambition of his after-life. This project was the building of a light-house. The whale-fisheries of Nantucket already had become somewhat important. Upward of fifty vessels, owned and sailed by the islanders, and the principal port had become a rendezvous for vessels in the same trade from many accounts of the coast. And yet, with this ocean nature of Nantucket shoals—to this day so carefully avoided and so frequently the cause of wrecks—were even now to be dreaded in the sandy bay, when the science of navigation was comparatively crude.

Jotham had always been a man of action. When his project was thoroughly conceived he was at once mill he started the work. Obtaining some legislative recognition and a little—very little—pecuniary assistance from the colonial government, he slowly procured the necessary tools and appliances, employed a band of laborers—many of the latter being negro slaves and Indian squaws from the mainland, and, with little delay, instituted his favorite scheme.

Jotham's daughter Jean was acknowledged by all to be the sweetest and the fairest girl in all Nantucket. Certainly not one of the young fishermen ever saw little Jean trip up the light-house cut for her father's incoming sails, or saunter through the cabin garden-patch, while her mother sat spinning in the sunlight by the door, without a certain longing, and a certain fair visioning of a happy home, with a bright wife to make it cheerful within.

Jean had many lovers too. Strange to say, the most favored appeared to be a sprightly, handsome, forward young fellow whose name was Andrew Graef, whose mother bore the unenviable suspicion of being a witch, and whose fishing-craft usually met with the very worst of bad luck. Jean was an unconscionable little flirt. Like most pretty girls, she was fully conscious of her beauty, and, like very many of them, the admiration of her charms made her inordinately vain.

But awkward, lalking Andy Graef seemed to have found the secret to her esteem, while his handsomer competers were compelled to be satisfied with her scorn. True, she was not always thus heartless. Her lover at one time risked his neck to pluck for her a wall-flower from the face of a precipitous crag, and then had the little wildling torn to pieces and thrown into his face for his pains. At another time, Miss Jean lost her amber necklace in the Devil's Griddle—a dangerous eddy that swirled between two of the inner reefs—and Andy, nevering the keepsake, and narrowly escaping drowning at the same time, was rewarded by a heartless laugh and a stinging look on the eye, because one of the miserable beads had become disengaged and irretrievably lost.

But in spite of these and a hundred similar instances of ingratitude, lalking Andy followed his sweet-heart like a great burly animal, happy enough if a little smile would reward him for a spell of indifference. It was, perhaps, this blind and utter devotion upon his part that mostly won upon the girl. There was something in it that, if Jean was not too vain as not to know and admire the honesty and goodness of her uncouth lover's nature, would at once attempt for him, when his services were enlisted in her behalf, was also a qualification which she must needs respect.

And so the monotony of that humble island life ebbed on in peaceful contentment, while Jotham Beverly, with his workmen, were awkwardly setting his derricks and mortar, went on with the rearing of his light-house. It arose but slowly. When the ice and frosts of the winter season put an end to the work for that season only about twenty feet of the rude but stanch tower were complete. Nevertheless old Jotham was entirely satisfied. From the small front lattice of his cabin he could see the round, dark structure stand high up on the bar, with the wintry sea frothing and foaming madly, but valiantly, at its rocky feet. All through the long winter he would sit at that lattice, looking over the inner light, smoking his pipe contentedly, and examining the tower with a critical and loving eye.

When spring returned old Beverly had his labors at work with double force. The summer must permit, and slowly, little by little, foot by foot the round, rough tower began to grow into the air.

About this time Jotham received a letter from Boston a young sea-farer who was known by the name of Seagrave. He commanded a strange craft. Seldom before had such a vessel landed in the roomy harbor of Nantucket. Unlike the clumsy whalers which frequented those waters, the Raven, as this vessel was called, was a craft of symmetry and beauty. She was a three-masted schooner, rakishly built, and very low in the water, with her hull painted black, and a huge figure executed by tarpaulins, on the after-deck, which might have been a gun, or something else. The crew of the Raven per were also very different from the greasy whalers and coarse fishermen who hailed from the island. They were better dressed, sprightlier sailors, and were also nearly all distinguished by wearing weapons in their belts. Seagrave himself was a great improvement on the average of the islanders. He was a tall, handsome, well-built man, with a dash of foreign blood in his veins, and his language was different from the islanders', and in the eyes of gentle Jean Beverly was a very thing full of the fancy had conceived of all that was noble and romantic.

These strangers were evidently starting upon a long voyage, and their ostensible object in stopping at Nantucket was to make some additions to their stock of water. But this was a longer stay than was necessary for this simple purpose; the gentlemanly skipper was frequently on shore, and there were sly hints that there was some attraction or attraction there than the clear fountains of the island.

But old Beverly could not bring himself to like Seagrave. He could not be blind to the fact that his daughter Jean was apparently fascinated, though the stranger always addressed her with that air of merely commonplace politeness. Poor Andy Graef now saw himself completely deserted by Jean, and his lover, and very justly, looked upon Seagrave as a black mistrust. Then, as it soon transpired that the Raven was commanded for Europe, Andy's fears increased the old man's distrust, and indeed brought the rakish schooner's crew into general disrepute among the islanders. Of course, the crew of the wave-trade, though then so commonly pursued, was held in great abhorrence.

There was, however, that about Seagrave which could scarcely be resisted by a simple man like old Jotham. His manner and address were of that irresistible, courtly kind which the most refined and lowly people can only combat with the utmost difficulty. And even before Beverly was precisely aware of any intimacy between the young stranger and his own household, Seagrave had become a frequent visitor at the Beverly cabin, and a frequent partaker of its simple hospitality. Beverly knew nothing about this man that was strangely engaging to every one. Though still young his features bore the impress of a long, wild life. His dress, also, and the expression of his dark eyes was frequently of a hard, pitiless cast, which was something remarkable in one so young. But his voice was soft and musical as that of a woman. His deportment was mostly that which is the result of instinctive refinement, and his language very seldom merged into the careless idiom of the sea-farer.

But upon no one did the spell of the stranger fall so strongly as upon pretty little Jean Beverly. She beheld and listened to him with silent admiration. Here at last was the hero of her dreams: here had risen in the coarse garb and with the unsightly cast of her father lovers, but in all the romance of adventure and courage and manliness which her fancy had pictured to her.

Poor Andy would still at times steal in upon the Beverlys in the evenings, and be permitted to watch the effect of Seagrave on Jean; but, as the ocean wanderer would recount the adventures of the past, the great deeds yet to be done, the gold and glory to be won on remote shores, the fascinations of a rover's life it chilled him to the quick to perceive the extent of the influence exercised by Seagrave over Jean; for he perhaps saw more of it than her own parents.

One tempestuous night they were all sitting coolly about the fireside of Beverly's cottage. The hoarse cries of the breakers on the near beach were plainly heard in the cabin, though the fire blazed cheerfully up—for the spring was still shrill with bleak winds—and all parties (except Andy) were in a pleasant mood of mind, just after finishing one of Dame Margaret's hearty suppers.

Jotham had been on the reef all day, and was now smoking his pipe in a contented frame; Seagrave had just finished a humorous sketch of tropical travel, and was merrily engaged in cutting from an old newspaper grotesque figures, with a pair of scissors, for Jean's especial entertainment; Margaret was spinning; and Andy was gluumly toasting his knees at the fire, without vouchsafing a word, but keeping his ears open to the general discourse.

The self-satisfaction of old Beverly at last broke the brief silence which had fallen upon the party, though he rather addressed the raging elements without than any one in the company.

"Yes, ye may howl and beat and slash your seas against the rocks of auld Nantucket, but ye canna disturb the heasments of auld Beverly's tower. Wait till she's full-grown, my roarin' heasties—wait till her tower rises above daylight through the tempest and the night, and the merry sailors will laugh at your terrors."

Having delivered himself of this exalting apostrophe, Jotham settled himself down again, with two or three self-satisfied whiffs at his pipe, and a long, benignant look around the company, as if ready to convey in its full force the prospective benevolence which the Beverly Light-house was to convey upon the world.

"You will indeed send gladness to many a gallant heart, Squire Beverly, when you have perfected your noble project," said Seagrave, who always called the old man "Squire," and made a rule of continually cherishing his vanity.

"Fatter," said Jotham very thoughtfully, "suppose I should be spirited away over the sea, would you still work at your light-house?"

The

"Three-masted schooner, low in the hulk, sharp-prowed, and like one a Government cutter," replied the other, eying the doomed craft with the practiced eye of an old skipper. "Yes, and there goes her death-shriek!" he added, hastily, as a flash leaped from the stern of the wreck, immediately followed by the boom of a signal-gun.

"Do yer know the name o' that ship, stranger?" continued Andy, in husky tones.

"Nonsense! you're daft, Andy! How should I know it?"

"Or yer know her skipper's name?" repeated Andy, with even greater excitement than before.

"Haud your tongue, yo crazy loon!" returned the other, pettishly.

"But / know 'em both, Maister Jotham!" cried hulking Andy, shaking his hand aloft with nervous gesticulation. "They're the Saxon, and her skipper is the pirate Seagrave! Ha! ha! my auld witch-nither wasn't a' a fool! The first glint o' your sooper light ever saw mine bairn frae the sea!"

Before the thunder-stricken sailitor could turn upon him Andy had vanished from the cheather, and Jotham heard him crashing down the winding staircase with break-neck leaps. Jotham leaned far out of the window, and saw the fishermen and workers making ready with their life-boats. He saw Andy emerge from the tower's foot and burst among them, impelling them with frantic gestures. He felt a strange, lost feeling come over his old breast—a wild desire to go down and also help—but he could not leave. By could only look and think. The surf was tremendous at the very foot of the tower, but one life-boat was already afloat, with Andy at the oars-next, before the old man dared to turn his eyes seaward again. When he did so, his glance was riveted to the spot, for the white garments of a woman fluttered and gleamed at the schooner's taffrail; and now but a few rods intervened between the vessel and her fate.

The crew had apparently given themselves up for lost, for they seemed to stand motionless upon the deck, as Jotham imperfectly saw from, and their boats were evidently lost, as there nowhere appeared to be any attempt to launch one. But one brave, lithe form, which Jotham thought he recognized as Seagrave's, moved ceaselessly among the nerveless men, as though to encourage them, with now and then a cheering gesture toward the white-robed form at the taffrail.

Andy's life-boat, urged by ten stout oarsmen, had almost entered the looming high tower of the outer reef, when, just as a terrific peal of thunder shook the earth, followed by increased deluges of rain, the schooner struck aground, and was seen to strike a rock with fearful force. The waves receding for a moment left her almost literally poised in air, impaled upon the sharp horns of the reef.

Even then that one brave form, dauntless in the very jaws of death, was seen, axe in hand, hewing away at the remaining mast, and evidently toppling his crew with cheery shouts. A wild huzza of admiration arose from the throngs of fishermen on the beach, and even Jotham set his teeth still harder as he gazed. But the sea was stronger than a mortal arm, however brave. Billow after billow licked the schooner down from the rocks and trampled her into fragments. Just as Andy's life-boat gained the side of the last vestige of the schooner disappeared among the rocks and blinding spray of the further side. It was then, and not till then, that the heart-broken old man plotted his look-out to seek poor Margaret in the cabin near by.

The tempest continued for a few hours, and Andy's life-boat returned to the beach with the rest at the stroke-oar empty. The survivors could not explain their comrade's absence, but one of them said that he had seen the luckless fisherman spring upon a rock and make his way toward the wreck.

The next morning the beach was littered with fragments of the schooner. There were many corpses washed ashore. Some were from among the passengers, but many were the nude bodies of black men with iron fetters still clasping their limbs. Two of the bodies were folded in each other's arms, as though each other by the throat as though they had gone down in a death-struggle. These were Andy Greef and Seagrave, the slaver captain.

But the last corpse that was found was that of giddy Jean Beverly, with her yellow hair all tangled with sea-weed, and her cheek much more and thinner than when she left Nantucket. And thus did the first gleam of that old ruined light-house thereafter welcome the erring one Home from the Sea.

THE LATE LIEUT-GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT.

WINFIELD SCOTT was born near Petersburg, Virginia, on 13th June, 1786. His father, a farmer, died when he was five years old; when he was seven years he lost his mother also. Though but little is known of his childhood, it may be inferred, from his attendance at the High School of Richmond, and subsequently at the College of William and Mary, that the death of his father had not deprived the family of a maintenance. Unlike many of our generals, there is no reason to suppose that Scott was compelled in early youth to work for a living. At the age of twenty, after the usual studies, he was admitted to the Virginia bar, and spent nearly two years in unsuccessful efforts to obtain practice, first in his native State, and subsequently in South Carolina. Had clients been forthcoming, the country might have lost a great soldier and gained a respectable lawyer. As it was, a natural taste for arms had time to develop in the idleness of the circuit, and was stimulated by the prospect of a new outbreak of hostilities with Great Britain. In 1808 Congress increased the army, and on Scott's earnest solicitation he was appointed, in May of that year, when he was barely twenty-two, a Captain of Light Artillery.

For the next few years his life was not of public interest. He was sent to Louisiana, and there, with an indiscretion not unnatural in a fiery youth, he used expressions respecting his superior officer which led to a court-martial and to his suspension from the service for a year. At the present day no officer in WILKINSON'S position would prosecute a young captain for talking foolishly about him in a dinner-table. But sixty years ago public men were more sensitive, and even Senators appealed to the Senate to be protected against hostile criticism. The suspension was a lucky accident for Scott. He devoted the idle year to the study of the profession at the house of his friend, B. WATKINS LEIGH, and thus fitted himself for the work he was to do.

It came soon enough. After a forbearance unparalleled in history, on 18th June, 1812, Congress declared war against Great Britain. On 12th October following SCOTT, now Lieutenant-Colonel of Artillery, made a forced march through a heavy rain to Schlosser, and offered his services to General VAN RENSSELAER, who was about to attack the British works on Queenston Heights. Whether the American design was a wise one has been a matter of debate. Judged by the result, it was not. It may well be said that, before embarking in the enterprise, the General in command ought to have made sure both of adequate transportation and of the fidelity of his troops. But the General's heart was smarting under the disgrace of HULL'S surrender, and every motive of honor and duty was said that something must be done to sustain the morale of the army. So CHRYSTIE and VAN RENSSELAER attempted to cross the river in detached parties, and effected a landing; fought gallantly enough, against desperate odds, until one officer after another was killed or taken, and intelligence was received that the New York militia refused to cross the river. Scott was on the Canada shore, and, seeing all was command, when the fatal news came. Mounting a log in front of his troops, he briefly described the situation:

"HULL's surrender must be redeemed. Let us die with arms in our hands. There is no retreat!"

And the little band, consisting of less than 300 men, rushed on the whole British army for more than two hours. At last, pressed by other forces down the hill-side, they were driven to the water's edge, and further resistance being impossible, they surrendered. SCOTT thus began the practical study of his profession in defeat and imprisonment.

Every school-boy is familiar with the story of his interview in his prison with the two Indian warriors. They were the chiefs of tribes of the forest, had so often fired at him in the course of the battle that he could not understand how the fact of American prisoners in the fort a rush hand tried to feel for the wounds he felt sure he must have inflicted. All the gentleman's blood in Scott rose within him.

"Off, villain!" said he, throwing the savage back. "You fired like a squaw!"

"Ugh! you no row," was the response of the grinning savage.

And he left a swift leap to the rear, where he grasped a sword, and the timely appearance of a British officer of the guard career might have been ended by the tomahawks of the visitors.

Not less familiar to all readers is his dispute with his captors concerning his epaulettes. On the deck of a transport in the port of Quebec the British officers had mustered their Queenstown prisoners, and were examining the line-men from the Americans. They required each prisoner to answer a question, picked out the gentlemen by their bearing, and set them in rows as traitors. As soon as he discovered what was going on, SCOTT ordered his men to keep silence, and they stood in sullen and defiant array. The object of this transaction grew the famous debate on the right of a British subject to acquaintance himself. The British officer present at first threatened to execute as traitors 23 Irishmen, taken prisoners at Queenstown. Our General, through SCOTT, replied that if one was exchanged, set apart 23 Englishmen, prisoners of war, as hostages for the 23 Irishmen. Wild with rage, Earl BATHURST then put in close confinement 46 American officers and non-commissioned officers to answer for the 23 Irishmen. And Mr. MADISON retaliated by setting apart 46 British officers to answer for the 46 American officers and non-commissioned officers. So it rested the question. The 23 Irishmen were never brought to trial, and at the close of the war were released. And though SCOTT himself throughout has never formally admitted the right of a British subject to expatriate himself—indeed, only three or four years ago the claim was expressly denied by one of the highest courts of the realm —it is not likely that Great Britain will ever again attempt to enforce her former views against naturalized citizens of the United States.

But little glory was won on the northern frontier in 1813; what glory there was belongs to SCOTT. The only successful operation of the year was the capture of Fort George, out of which work the garrison ran almost as soon as they were attacked. It was Colonel SCOTT, who with his own hands pulled down the British flag —his "long legs" having enabled him to distance PORTER in the race, to the latter's great disgust. His brilliant conduct secured the advance of General WILKINSON'S miserable expedition against Montreal, but had no opportunity of distinguishing himself, and was not sorry when relieved from duty under that incapable officer.

This and other failures satisfied Colonel SCOTT that, to win victories over trained British troops, our officers and soldiers must know more than they did. Accordingly, in the winter of 1813-14, he established a camp of instruction at Buffalo, became himself drill-sergeant for the officers of a brigade, and as soon as his pupils were sufficiently instructed, set they imparted what they had learned to the men. By dint of hard work he had succeeded by spring-time in creating a full brigade of well-disciplined troops—perhaps the best brigade in the service. On 9th March he was promoted to their command with the rank of Brigadier. He told the Government that his brigade would give a good account of themselves—a bold word.

On 5th July the battle of Chippewa was fought. The commander of the American army, General BROWN, was far in the rear when the fight began, and the instructions SCOTT received were in these words, about a couple of hours before the fire:

"The enemy are advancing; you will have a fight."

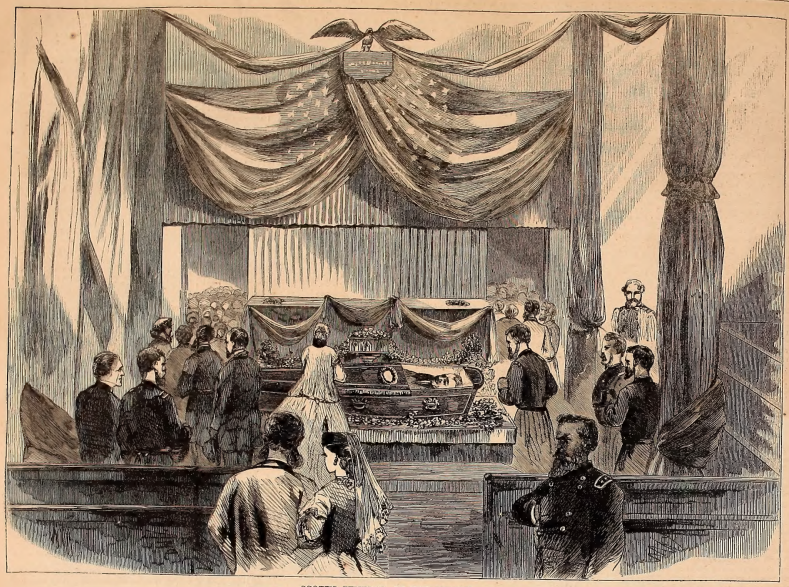
BROWN himself freely admitted that the glory of the day was SCOTT'S. The battle was won by superior generalship; Scott succeeded in striking the British line obliquely and outflanking it at. The force on both sides was about equal—say 2000 on a side: the killed, wounded, and missing about 16 per cent. on our side, and 25 per cent. on the side of the enemy. Quite a sharp affair, small as the numbers appear by the side of the heavy figures of more recent contests.

The battle of Niagara, Lundy's Lane, or Bridgewater, as it has sometimes been called, was a still more bloody affair. On the 24th July General BROWN received information had led General BROWN to believe that the enemy were moving on Schlosser, whereas the only change in their position was that of a part of their reserve troops. General SCOTT, at the head of his brigade, came unexpectedly upon the whole British army, drawn up in order of battle, in a good position, at about 7 P.M. on 25th July. The crisis was one of those which try a General. Had SCOTT ordered a retreat the enemy, three or four to one, would have overwhelmed him. He could not stand still under fire. He decided instantly to attack, and at the same time sent swift aids to the rear for the remainder of the army. The rise succeeded. The English did not suspect that there was no one in their front but General SCOTT'S brigade. They moved cautiously, and stood upon the defensive. When they discovered their mistake BROWN had come up with the remainder of his army, and the contest was nearly equal. It ended in our driving the enemy from the ground he occupied. Beyond this there was no result. The British sides was about equal —say 26 per cent. of the force engaged.

These two battles demonstrated that the youth of 26, whom BROWN had so conspicuously shown the fight was hottest, and who seemed utterly reckless of his personal safety, was likewise a true and consummate commander. Commodore JAMES WILLINGTON and KOSCIUSKO pronounced his strategy in this campaign to be of the highest order. The Secretary of War announced in a letter to SCOTT his enthusiastic approval, and the Congress mark for sharp-shooters, he said, "No; if I die I will die in my place." At Fort George he was the first in the work, though he knew that matches had been applied to the magazine. At Niagara a cannon-ball struck under him, and he was twice wounded, once in the side, and again, at the close of the fight, very severely in his shoulder.

To a man like SCOTT, keenly sensitive to public opinion, and greedy of fame, his reward for these services to the National his country must have been peculiarly gratifying. "frustrated by his wound, he was carried to Batavia, and thence to Albany, where he met the ovations of friends, to Geneva. Thence he was able to ride in a carriage, and he proceeded by easy stages to Philadelphia, where the city was one continued ovation. People turned out to meet the conqueror as they had turned out to meet WASHINGTON. The Legislature of Pennsylvania in fact threatened to execute as traitors 23 Irishmen, taken prisoners at Queenstown. Our General, through SCOTT, replied that if one was exchanged, set apart 23 Englishmen, prisoners of war, as hostages for the 23 Irishmen. Wild with rage, Earl BATHURST then put in close confinement 46 American officers and non-commissioned officers to answer for the 23 Irishmen. And Mr. MADISON retaliated by setting apart 46 British officers to answer for the 46 American officers and non-commissioned officers. So it rested the question. The 23 Irishmen were never brought to trial, and at the close of the war were released. And though SCOTT himself throughout has never formally admitted the right of a British subject to expatriate himself—indeed, only three or four years ago the claim was expressly denied by one of the highest courts of the realm —it is not likely that Great Britain will ever again attempt to enforce her former views against naturalized citizens of the United States.

But little glory was won on the northern frontier in 1813; what glory there was belongs to SCOTT. The only successful operation of the year was the capture of Fort George, out of which work the garrison ran almost as soon as they were attacked. It was Colonel SCOTT, who with his own hands pulled down the British flag —his "long legs" having enabled him to distance PORTER in the race, to the latter's great disgust. His brilliant conduct secured the advance of General WILKINSON'S miserable expedition against Montreal, but had no opportunity of distinguishing himself, and was not sorry when relieved from duty under that incapable officer.



This and other failures satisfied Colonel SCOTT that, to win victories over trained British troops, our officers and soldiers must know more than they did. Accordingly, in the winter of 1813-14, he established a camp of instruction at Buffalo, became himself drill-sergeant for the officers of a brigade, and as soon as his pupils were sufficiently instructed, set they imparted what they had learned to the men. By dint of hard work he had succeeded by spring-time in creating a full brigade of well-disciplined troops—perhaps the best brigade in the service. On 9th March he was promoted to their command with the rank of Brigadier. He told the Government that his brigade would give a good account of themselves—a bold word.

On 5th July the battle of Chippewa was fought. The commander of the American army, General BROWN, was far in the rear when the fight began, and the instructions SCOTT received were in these words, about a couple of hours before the fire:

"The enemy are advancing; you will have a fight."

BROWN himself freely admitted that the glory of the day was SCOTT'S. The battle was won by superior generalship; Scott succeeded in striking the British line obliquely and outflanking it at. The force on both sides was about equal—say 2000 on a side: the killed, wounded, and missing about 16 per cent. on our side, and 25 per cent. on the side of the enemy. Quite a sharp affair, small as the numbers appear by the side of the heavy figures of more recent contests.

The battle of Niagara, Lundy's Lane, or Bridgewater, as it has sometimes been called, was a still more bloody affair. On the 24th July General BROWN received information had led General BROWN to believe that the enemy were moving on Schlosser, whereas the only change in their position was that of a part of their reserve troops. General SCOTT, at the head of his brigade, came unexpectedly upon the whole British army, drawn up in order of battle, in a good position, at about 7 P.M. on 25th July. The crisis was one of those which try a General. Had SCOTT ordered a retreat the enemy, three or four to one, would have overwhelmed him. He could not stand still under fire. He decided instantly to attack, and at the same time sent swift aids to the rear for the remainder of the army. The rise succeeded. The English did not suspect that there was no one in their front but General SCOTT'S brigade. They moved cautiously, and stood upon the defensive. When they discovered their mistake BROWN had come up with the remainder of his army, and the contest was nearly equal. It ended in our driving the enemy from the ground he occupied. Beyond this there was no result. The British sides was about equal—

SCOTT'S FUNERAL—IN THE CHAPEL.

It is not necessary here to recapitulate the familiar story of Contreras, Churubusco, Chapultepec, and the Belen Gate. It must suffice to say that by strategy and the valor of his troops SCOTT, with ten thousand men, in the open plain, beat SANTA ANNA, with twenty thousand behind strong works, and on September 14 entered the Gran Plaza of Mexico a conqueror. The exploit deserved and elicited the warmest applause from military critics in Europe. It reminded one of NAPOLEON'S early feats in the war in Italy. Stunned by the unexpected result, the Mexicans made haste to negotiate for peace; and when it was found that the victor demanded no exorbitant terms, did not seek to alter the form of their government, would accept no reward for himself, and merely proposed a plan of accommodation which, while guarding against a recurrence of hostilities, was equally honorable to Mexico and to the United States, they actually received him with enthusiasm.

His return to the United States, which should have been triumphal, was embittered by squabbles with his officers and bickerings with the Government. As was the case in M'CLELLAN'S Army of the Potomac, many generals of the Army of Mexico thought more of their own fame than of the success of the national arms; and the Administration, blinded by partisan prejudice, could only see in the conqueror of Mexico a formidable Whig competitor for the Presidential succession. By order of the Government General SCOTT had handed over the command of his army to General BUTLER, and returned home in October, 1848, to stand his trial before a court-martial on charges preferred against him by creatures like PILLOW, and to prosecute charges against other officers. A knowledge of the weak points of SCOTT'S character—of his readiness to accept an affront from the most insignificant person, and of his sensitiveness to indignities which a more callous nature would never have noticed—enabled unworthy men in the army and in the Government to wound him beyond bearing, and to goad him, in the extremity of his suffering, to retorts which did not become his greatness.

In June, 1852, nearly four years after his return from Mexico, the Whigs nominated him for the Presidency. He was beaten by Mr. PIERCE, his record on the slavery question being less clear than that of his Democratic antagonist. His letter to T. P. ATKINSON, written in 1843, on the subject of slavery, showed clearly that he didn't like the institution, and this was enough for ripening secessionists. Mr. PIERCE, on the contrary, was understood to regard slavery as the direct work of Providence. Such a defeat, on such grounds, involved a compliment.

BATTLE OF LUNDY'S LANE.

LANDING AT VERA CRUZ.

In October, 1860, Lieutenant-General SCOTT (Congress had given him that brevet rank) was seventy-four years of age. His body was feeble; he was lame; he suffered from a painful disease; he slept badly. But his mind was clear enough to discern the signs of the times. Ten days before the Presidential election he called Mr. BUCHANAN'S attention to the defenseless state of the Southern forts, and to the danger of their being seized by Southern rebels. With the guileless simplicity of his character, he never suspected the President of complicity with the traitors. Again and again, after the election of Mr. LINCOLN, he pressed his views on the Government; they were uniformly disregarded. His old comrade in arms, General CASS, was the only member of the Government who would listen to him, and he was too old to struggle against his colleagues. The others affected to disbelieve his warnings, or chuckled over what they called his "senile terrors."

As inauguration day drew near, and the seizure of Southern forts by rebels and the passage of pretended ordinances of secession vindicated the soundness of General SCOTT'S judgment, the traitors at Washington threw off the mask, and confessed that they regarded the Government as defunct. BUCHANAN actually countermanded the parade of the troops on WASHINGTON'S birthday—"for fear of irritating the South." General SCOTT—noble old Roman—grew stronger and sterner as other men in authority grew weaker and more disposed to temporize. He was not afraid of offending any body. His knowledge of the Southern character led him to apprehend an attempt to assassinate LINCOLN. By the aid of his detectives, he discovered the Baltimore plot about as soon as it was found out by the detectives employed by Mr. SEWARD and THURLOW WEED. This nefarious scheme baffled, his next care was to see that Mr. LINCOLN was not murdered on inauguration day.

Persons who witnessed that inauguration will remember that a large number of roofs on Pennsylvania Avenue were covered with men. Careless observers took them for spectators. They were, in reality, troops, armed with rifles. In the crowd were armed detectives, acting under SCOTT'S orders; and in buildings adjacent to the Capitol were three or four batteries of horse artillery, fully manned and equipped; the most efficient of them commanded by a gawky young lieutenant—GODFREY WEITZEL. Washington was, in fact, that day in a state of siege; though nobody, except, perhaps, the conspirators, knew it. If all passed off tranquilly, the event may, perhaps, be due to General SCOTT'S thorough precautions.

Of the remaining years of General SCOTT'S life there is little to be said. He soon became aware that at his age, and with his infirmities, he was not competent to conduct the War for the Union. Bull Run almost broke his heart; and though he lived to repent his designation of M'CLELLAN as the fittest officer to succeed him in the supreme command, it was with sincere delight that he relinquished a responsibility which he was no longer able to endure. In quiet retirement, beguiling his leisure by the composition of an autobiography, he took the interest of a true patriot in the success of our arms; followed GRANT and SHERMAN on the map with the eye of a connoisseur, and was never tired of extolling their merits to visitors. He had been sadly chastened of late. Many of his best friends had turned their backs on him. ROBERT E. LEE, his right hand, led the rebel army; another and a dearer one yet was suspected of even fouler treason; his wife's family were open rebels; his native State denounced him. With more humility and resignation than were his wont in younger days, he bowed his head to these afflictions, and clove the closer to his country as his friends departed from it.

Though he had no warning of his approaching death he was not unprepared. For some time he had expected his end; and had more than once sought religious counsel, and devoted his thoughts to a future world. He died, where he wished to die, at West Point—the place above all others which he loved, and where he will be best remembered. There are no "last words" of his to be recorded by the historian. His last act was to press, in token of approbation, the hand of the clergyman who proposed to read to him, as he lay dying, the noble service for the dead from the ritual of the Episcopal Church.

TUCKER'S PATENT SPRING BEDS.

There are some truths besides those enumerated in the Declaration of Independence that are self-evident, and though they may pertain to the less vital interests of the human race, they are nevertheless important. Among these are these: A bed, to fulfil the purposes for which it is destined, must be comfortable; it must be so constructed as to insure CLEANLINESS; it should, for easy transportation, be made portable; and, lastly, the greatest benefit demands that it should be both DURABLE and ECONOMICAL. All of these essential requirements centre in the spring beds invented by Hiram Tucker, and it is a remarkable fact that no one has yet been deterred for man's comfort which is at all comparable to it. A single trial of these springs on a bed will carry the most inveterate doubter of his skepticism. For sale wholesale by the

MALARIA EVERY WHERE.

Rarely has there been a season so fruitful as that of malarious diseases. Not only the prevalent ones met in the valleys of the West; not merely in all the old haunts of fever and ague in the Atlantic States, but in places never before dreamed of as subject to malarious influences. The intermittents and remittents at present so general in all parts of the country are but the first instalments of a deadlier scourge now on its way westward from the Gulf Coast. Prepare the system with for a successful battle with the nephitic causes of all epidemics. Be wise in time. Sold every where.—New York World, November 6, 1865.

Hostetter's Bitters

Mocha, Java, Rio, Chop-House Koasters and families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in their article by using our FRENCH BREAKFAST and DINNER COFFEE, which we will sell at the low prices of 30c. $ lb., and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 30c. to $1 $ lb. by purchasing their Teas of the Great American Tea Company,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, corner of Church Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City;
No. 640 Broadway, cotner of Bleeker Street;
No. 505 Eighth Avenue, near Thirty-seventh Street;
No. 308 Fulton St., Brooklyn, corner Concord st.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small Stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled; and in case of clubs can have each party's name marked on their package as directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St.

Our friends are getting up Clubs in most town throughout the country, and for which we feel very grateful. Some of our Clubs send orders weekly, some semi or often, while others keep a standing order to be supplied with a given quantity each week, or at stated periods. And in all cases (where sufficient time has elapsed) Clubs have repeated their orders.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send Post-Office Drafts or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to collect on delivery.

We return thanks to parties who have taken an interest in getting up Clubs. And when any of them come to New York we shall be pleased to have them call upon us and take thousands of Clubs.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

The following letter tells its own story:

BROOMAR, GREEN CO., WIS.,
May 8, 1866.

To The Great American Tea Company,
31 and 33 Vesey St., New York City.

The package of Tea I ordered of you came safely to hand. All are highly pleased with their Teas. Your last is superior to what our merchants call their best, and sell for $1 $ lb. and. The Oolong is far better than what they sell at $1 75. I herewith send another order, amounting to $131. I could make you a much larger one, but many of our farmers are so afraid of being bamboozled. They say if they are given a good satisfactory trial for a dollar, they will then "go to." Send the goods per United States Express. Will bill for collection, as before. Also bill by mail to myself. You will hear in a large way from this section next time. Mark the box to my address.
Respectfully yours, W. E. MACK.

Remarkable Cure of Stiff Knee by Allcock's Porous Plasters.

How many persons, from stepping on a piece of orange-peel, have been lamed for life. A case which might have been of this kind has just been brought to our notice. A gentleman, from placing the heel of his boot on a piece of orange-peel, was suddenly thrown down, and violently sprained his knee. He was six months confined to the house, though he had the best medical advice. As a last resort a very eminent physician was called in to see if any thing more could be done. After examination he said, "My opinion is, your knee will never be bent again." He recommended that the whole leg and knee should be encased in a plaster of Allcock's Porous Plasters, which would accelerate the permanent stiffening of the knee, and said that the sooner it was done the better. But the patient, before trying this application and having a stiff knee for life, resolved it in our Porous Plasters, and in less than two months his knee was perfectly cured.

CLOSING OUT SALE

OF THE
NEUFCHATEL WATCH CO.

Owing to the failure and sudden closing of the works and business of the

NEUFCHATEL WATCH CO.,

A large number of fine Watches, manufactured especially for the United States, being heavy, first-class timekeepers, intended to stand hard usage and sudden changes of temperature, are left in our hands for immediate sale. As agents of the Company, we are obliged to dispose of this stock for cash in the shortest possible time. We have, therefore, decided on the plan adopted at the end, which will be productive of the desired result. This plan gives every one an opportunity of securing first-class timekeepers at a price that all can command. As every certificate represents a Watch, there can be no blanks, and every one who invests in this sale must get a Watch at half the retail price at least; and, if at all fortunate, can be vain with pride through life.

Remittances may be made at our risk in registered letters or by express, or post-office orders and drafts payable to our order, and we guarantee a safe return. This INSURES safe delivery and sure return to every patron.

We warrant every Watch as represented, and satisfaction is guaranteed in every instance. Knowing the worth of the stock, we can give a warrantee to every purchaser. The price has been placed at the very low figure in order to insure immediate sale; and all who desire to improve the opportunity should make early application.

THE UNITED STATES PRIZE CONCERT,
To have been given at CROSBY'S OPERA-HOUSE on MONDAY, MAY 28th, 1866, will be postponed until MONDAY, JULY 9th, 1866, on which occasion HALF A MILLION DOLLARS IN PRIZES will be presented to Ticket-Holders, including
ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS IN GREENBACKS.
THE POSTPONEMENT is an unavoidable necessity, not so much in consequence of the number of tickets yet unsold as the positive necessity there is for a proper registration of those already disposed of, which has been delayed in consequence of the negligence and carelessness of a portion of our Agents in making their proper returns. We advise all parties wishing tickets to send for them without delay, as we have but a limited number yet on hand. We also wish most particularly to impress upon the minds of our Agents the importance of their making their returns at once, and of rectifying whatever errors may have crept into their reports heretofore. We will say to those sending for tickets that if they should all be sold at the time their order is received the money will be returned. No applications for new Agencies for the sale of tickets will be considered, as we have no more than sufficient tickets for those Agents we have already appointed. Tickets are for sale at the principal Hotels, Book and Music Stores in the city, and at our Office, 193 Dearborn Street; price $1 each; sent by mail on receipt of price and stamp for return postage. We invite the particular attention of persons wishing to order tickets by mail to the following

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 23, 1866.

THE REPORT OF THE CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE.

THE Report of the Congressional Committee upon Reconstruction is so able and conclusive that we wish it might be universally read. It is the Constitution and common sense applied to the situation; and after the passionate and petrifogging spirit in which Reconstruction, the most important of all our present questions, has been so often discussed its tone is manly and dignified. There is nothing exactly new in the arguments of the Committee, but the Report in an unanswerable manner of the conclusions to which the commonsense of the loyal part of the country had arrived, and upon which, as we believe, it now reposes.

Those conclusions are in brief that the rebellious States were left, at the close of the war, without other legal government than the military authority of the United States, directed by the President as Commander-in-chief; that the civil government of those States could become valid only upon recognition by Congress, and that the resumption by those States of their relations in the Union can occur only upon such conditions as Congress may prescribe. The folly of the assumption of ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS and the late allies of the rebellion, that the moment a rebel State was forced by war to surrender it regained untouched and without condition every right and privilege it had enjoyed as a part of the Union is conclusively exposed by the Committee. "To admit such a principle for one moment would be to declare that treason is always master and loyalty a blunder. Such a principle is not only very mature and senseless, because inconsistent with the theory of government and fatal to its very existence."

To know the condition of the late rebel States it was necessary either to take the opinion of the President solely, or to sift the evidence upon which that opinion was founded and enlarge the range of testimony. This latter course was adopted, and the impression left upon the Committee is again that of the great mass of Union men in the country. The condition of the States in question is precisely what was to be expected. It is a feeling of intense regret that the struggle could not be prolonged, and of bitter hostility toward the Government. And while this is natural to any party defeated in so fierce a contest, the Committee find that it is peculiarly strong in the States in question. "The conciliatory measures of the Government do not seem to have been met even half-way. The bitterness and defiance exhibited toward the United States under such circumstances is without a parallel in the history of the world." It is remarkable that MR. SEWARD in his Auburn speech states the situation exactly in other way. "The work of reconciliation," he says, "has outrun expectation. Indeed, it has never had a parallel in human affairs." We presume that this gratuitous conviction of ours, too, based upon all the various public and private evidence of the year, will confirm the Committee's judgment rather than MR. SEWARD'S.

After the most careful consideration upon ample evidence the Committee believe that adequate security should be required for future peace and safety, and they suggest, as the result of mutual concession, the amendment determining civil rights, equalizing representation, disqualifying certain persons for office under certain conditions, and disowning the rebel debt. This amendment has been already adopted by the Senate in a moderate and generous form, and will undoubtedly be agreed to by the House. As there is nothing in it which is not strictly in consonance with the views which the President has often expressed, we hope that for the sake of harmony he will not oppose it. If, however, a bill should be offered for his signature, postponing the admission of any late rebel State to Congress until the amendment had become a part of the Constitution and had been ratified by the State, he would undoubtedly veto it. It seems to us, for many good reasons, advisable that each suspended State should be restored upon its individual acceptance of the condition, and we hope that such may be the final judgment of Congress.

Thus this most important Committee concludes its labors, and concludes them worthily. It has been fiercely derided and insulted by the most malignant enemies of the Union and Government at the North and South; and even the President's impatience has betrayed him into vituperation of it. But we challenge any caviler to produce from history an instance of a settlement by a victorious government so honorable, so reasonable, so free from vengeance, so tenacious of the spirit of a truly free government. There is no lately rebellious citizen of the United States who "acquiesces" honestly in the situation who can declare it ungenerous or unjust, while every faithful citizen will heartily commend it as the true popular platform. The substance of this Report is sure to be filtered through editorials and speeches, so that it will become familiar to the country. But Union clubs and committees could do no better service to the good cause than to multiply legible copies of it.

OUR NEUTRALITY.

THE President's late decisive proclamation of neutrality in the Fenian raid upon Canada was derided by those who smart at all his acts, but was of necessity highly approved by all thoughtful citizens in whose minds passion and prejudice had not obscured the sense of national honor. We are at peace with Great Britain —a peace which the interests of liberty and civilization require to be maintained—and to insist that we shall wink at the desolation of a neighboring colony of that power by a body on the "Fenian army," because Great Britain played fast and loose in her neutrality during our late war, is simply childish and preposterous. To plead the dishonor of England as an excuse for our own, is to dispute the palm of shame.

We vigorously denounced the insincerity of British neutrality. We decried it as dishonorable to the last degree. We swelled with indignant scorn at the miserable subterfuge of the British Government in the matter of the Alabama. Were we right or wrong? Was her conduct honorable or ignoble? Of course we have not changed our opinions, and why then, should we sneer at our Government for refusing to do precisely what we think it basirably in the British Government not to do—for the utmost freedom of speech in debating the wrongs of Ireland or of any other country we properly tolerate. The organization of an Irish Republic in Union cities, the open present dispersion of the subscribers to Fenian bonds. The call to send arms to Ireland or the exhortation to strike at Canada, are all permissible for they are but the utterance merely, mere wind. But if the attempt is made to send arms, they are justly seized. If men attempt to put their words into execution they are horrified, they are justly opposed. And if the movement be apparently concerted and imposing from its numbers, the proclamation of neutrality is issued to deceive the dupes. The point is, that the Government should have apparently countenanced the movement by releasing JOHN MITCHEL at the request of a Fenian deputation. To release him was not unwise; but to do so upon such a request was to commit a double blunder, for it was both a recognition of Fenian and a slight to American citizens. American citizens founded upon birth. As Irishmen, American citizens have nothing to ask of the Government—and this is the distinction (to use an Irish figure of speech) still less.

There is nothing more commendable in our history than our consistent and conscientious observance of neutral duties. It was honorably acknowledged by "HISTORICUS" during the Alabama debates. It began with the existence of the Government itself. President WASHINGTON devised the strictest rule, and enforced it.

In 1793 there was war between England and France. The friendship for our late ally was antipathy to our new friend. Pity, warm, and JEFFERSON, the especial friend of France, was Secretary of State. But WASHINGTON and JEFFERSON both acted promptly and efficiently. They did not wait for formal remonstrance, conditions to be furnished by the representatives of either belligerent. "As soon as it was perceived that such conduct was intended, the general orders to prevent them were dispatched to all the States and ports of the Union." In 1805, when MR. JEFFERSON was President, he stopped a fleet for French insurrection, and "to bring in the offenders as pirates." In 1818 President MONROE compliments "the whole community" for its honorable conduct to neutral obligations. In the border troubles of 1838–40 MR. WEBSTER, as Secretary of State, declares the intention of the President to bring to exemplary punishment "the violators of law and disturbers of the peace upon the Canadian border. In 1848, when the Germans were trying to found a free and united empire, their Government sent commissioners to this country to buy a steam war vessel. But learning that the buyers were interested in the little Schleswig-Holstein war, the Government forbade the sailing of the steamer, nor was she permitted to depart until, after long negotiations, the buyers gave bonds in $200,000 that she should never be used against any nation with which we were at peace. In 1855, during the Russian war, the Government seized MR. LOW'S bark Monny, although it considered the complaint of the British consul improbable, and it proved to be totally unfounded.

In the recent insurrection in our uniform precedent and the general reason of such cases, but the intrinsic inhumanity and folly of the belligerent acts demanded the strict st enforcement of neutrality. The attempt was to under the British empire by seizing Canada by that part of the Irish population of the United States with whom their most conspicuous religious and political leaders will have nothing to do, and who were earnestly dissuaded from the enterprise by the recognized head of the revolutionary movement. There could be no conceivable result of such a mad foray but bloodshed and sorrow. It is true that Canada looked on coolly when rebel raids against us were plotted under her eyes. But is that Canadian conduct to be the model of ours? Did the offense of Canada, great as it was, deserve that her soil and cities should be exposed by us to such a horror as such a spirit as ravaged New York in the July riots of 1863? Even the correspondent of the New York Herald, which has incessantly magnified Fenianism, admits, in speaking of the invading "army," that "the most of them were nothing more or less than an armed mob, roving about wherever they pleased, taking the horses, and insulting and abusing women and children." If our laws and precedents had not forbidden our connivance with so horrible a tragedy as this raid would have been, it undoubtedly was certainly our common humanity and common sense should have forced us to interfere; and the President is to be heartily thanked for his fidelity to the national honor.

THE PROBABLE WAR IN EUROPE.

THERE will apparently be a Conference of the European powers, but it is generally conceded that war is unavoidable. This will not mean strong armies on both sides, but that there is a universal wish in Europe to reconstruct the map, as it is called. That can be done only by peaceful negotiation or by war. But what chance is there of settling the conflicting claims, and hot passions and ambitions of the various powers, that a harmonious redistribution could be made? The Italian bonds are clearly of opinion that it is hopeless, and that it may not be possible even to hold the dogs of war in leash until the Congress dissolves.

Meanwhile the number of troops upon a war footing is already enormous. The northern army of Austria alone, under General BENEDEK, upon the frontiers of Prussia and SAXONY, is composed of 200,000 men and 500 guns. The Austrian force in Venetia is 130,000 men, while the Austrian reserves comprise 800,000. Vienna is being rapidly fortified. The Italian army will contain more than 500,000 men, of whom 250,000 are already in the first line, and are inspired with the utmost enthusiasm. The Prussian force is immense, and Europe is already a camp once more.

There are two elements which have not been much considered, which may prove to be of great importance. These are Russia and the Republicans. The people of Europe at this time would hardly allow the struggle to be merely a dynastic combat. They would seize the moment of universal tumult to claim further rights; and when once a war begins of the necessary confusion of this, it is impossible to foretell the end or the results. A great deal more than was meant will be both won and lost.

A. J. HAMILTON AND A. H. STEPHENS.

ANDREW J. HAMILTON of TEXAS, and ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS of GEORGIA, are representatives of the two spirits between which, from this time forward, there will be "an irrepressible conflict" in the late rebel States. They are both natives of slave States. They have both been slaveholders and Democrats. They have both been recognized political leaders. They are both men of intellectual ability, tenacity, and force. But the heart and head of one are set toward the future, those of the other to the past.

When the late Southern leaders of the Democratic party took up arms against the Government STEPHENS warned them to pause. He pleaded that the war was true as they to State sovereignty and slavery. He declared that with him the Union was subordinate to "the South." He tried to show them that "the South" meaning the ambition of those leaders and the interests of slavery—could still control the Government, and that open rebellion would fail. But the conspirators were bolder than he, although less astute. Possibly they felt that the conscience of the American people, which was now clearly awakened, could not be put to sleep again because it had caught a glimpse of the eternal truth that the national interest was coincident with justice, and that therefore every cry for duty was fatal both to their ambition and its unholy object. But whatever their motive, they shouted with ROBERT TOOMBS that if the sword were not put into their hands they would seize it—and they did so. STEPHENS became silent, and floated with the current, and was made the Lieutenant of the conspiracy. Then he opened his mouth to say what even WIGFALL and the most foolish and fierce of the conspirators hardly dared to breathe—that the express intention of the new empire was to surpass Dahomey, and its Government was to be founded upon the crime against human nature itself which civilized mankind had elsewhere scornfully spurned.

But when the conspirators declared themselves in TEXAS HAMILTON defied them. In fiery appeals to the people he exposed the nature of the conspiracy and the purpose of its chiefs. He showed their haughty and blamelessness of the Government, declared its intrinsic power, and foretold its overwhelming triumph. His voice was an inspiring bugle blast of patriotism, and no man's attitude in any formidable crisis was ever more heroic than his. Hated and denounced by the rebel chiefs, he stood fast and rebel aloud until to stay longer was useless; and then, hunted by men fiercer than blood-hounds, he made his way within the Union lines. There he continued his work. His voice was heard every where, rallying the loyal heart of the country, until, with the victory which he had prophesied, he returned to TEXAS as President's commissioner. Of all those who have filled that office HAMILTON alone clearly comprehended the situation. He understood the struggle. He knew and trusted the principle which had prevailed, and he was resolved that that principle should inspire the policy of reconstruction in his State, because that only promised peace and permanent union.

HAMILTON and STEPHENS are both again conspicuous, both are again leaders of public opinion at the South. STEPHENS declares that his principles and convictions are unchanged. He still holds to the right of secession. He "acquiesces" in the result because all force of further resistance is exhausted. An unparalleled rebel, he proudly reaffirms his faith in the principle of the rebellion, and decrying the right of the Government which he has vainly sought to overthrow to exact conditions for its safety, he haughtily claims to share in its control. Encouraged by his position the old spirit of "the South" revives, that spirit which has been so thoroughly proved false to Union and the Government. HAMILTON, on the other hand, says plainly to STEPHENS and his friends: "You have made it necessary for them [the loyal people of the United States] to make certain requirements of you, and they will do it in such a manner as that they will never be disturbed by you in a rebellion. I would do the same, and so would you if placed in a similar position. You would not permit any State to go back until you had assurance of the hearty submission of the people in a manner and yet given by the people of Texas." Then, with a directness and force which must rather amaze STEPHENS and his party, HAMILTON after declaring the freedom to be the equal of any of them before the law, exclaims: "As a friend of the Government of the United States, as a friend of humanity, and as a man of truth and honor, he is immensurably the superior of any pardoned but unrepentant rebel."

When one man says so, every men think so. General HAMILTON announces that there shall now be the utmost freedom of speech, and that the truth shall be told fearlessly. He will be supported by those who believe that the United States will see fair play, and the debate between the old silence and despotism of slavery and State sovereignty, and the new freedom and inspiration of Liberty and the Union will be opened. It will be hot and sharp, but the issue is clear. With the formation of a true Union party, the last character of "acquiescers" like STEPHENS, who hold to the things that are passing away, will be revealed, and a healthful political condition will ensue. He is a conciliator, as a peace-maker, as a patriot, as a true American, ANDREW J. HAMILTON is as superior to ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS now, as he was superior to him in wisdom and patriotism during the war; and it is by such men as HAMILTON, and by such principles as his, and not by leaders like STEPHENS that the true reconstruction of the late rebel States will be effected.

THE FEAST OF FOLY.

IN the time of Queen ELIZABETH of England the fashion imported from Italy of making love so extravagant and ruinous to private fortunes that the Queen, who had three thousand dresses in her wardrobe, issued a proclamation against extravagance in dress. It was not put down, but we certainly have need of the proclamation. The wild waste of money in the most vulgar ways is a matter of profound public concern. It tends directly to make marriage difficult, and whatever limits honorable marriage threatens public morality.

Our new folly is the more contemptible that it is imported. Our vanity is secondhand. New York is apparently content to be a cast-off Paris. Like a parvenu maid it smirks and ogles in the discarded dresses of its mistress. It waits for Paris to be hooped before it enlarges its skirts, and meekly reduces them when Paris dwindles. The follies of Longchamps are daring, original, and preposterous. But they are the follies of one of the richest and most corrupt of European courts. The same follies, carefully imitated in New York or at Saratoga or Newport, are only feeble and farcical.

Does an honest young man, earning his living in New York, and hoping to marry his sweet-heart on some happy future day, wish to see her aping the Princess METTERNICH or the riperb MRS. B——, a noted divorcée in Paris, at whom even newspaper correspondents laugh.

as they describe her gorgeous dress, costing "at least five hundred dollars," and the "several pounds of dyed red hair upon her head?" Does he wish to see her upon the beach at Newport in "a short petticoat not worn much below the calf," or trailing half a thousand dollars' worth of silk and lace along the wet sand? Would she be beautiful to him if he saw her sweeping the gravel of a race-course with "a long train of delicate tinted blue silk bordered with tea-roses," carrying a blue parasol also trimmed with roses, and a bonnet of blue boots "with a tea-rose on each instep?"

Such is the costume of the Parisian mondo and demi-monde, and here we shall see its remote and ridiculous reproduction at the summer resorts. Is there no one to tell the truth to these pretty American women who make so ludicrous a mistake? Do they suppose that they are ridiculed? Do they know that the gilded youth who flutter around them do not spare them in their gossip? Do they reflect that no man really respects a New York woman who tries to rival the most notorious Paris women? Ah, gentle ladies, be persuaded! If you move in the style of the demi-monde its morals and manners will be held to be those of the demi-monde. True womanly modesty still seeks a modest manner and a modest garb. Be as graceful and as tasteful as you will, but do not believe that the heroine of Longchamps or of a luscious French novel is the heroine of any sincere man's sincere admiration.

The remedy of this folly lies very much in the hands of sensible people in society. Let them steadily refuse to allow anyone to make the measure of what is truly fashionable. Let them plainly discountenance the gaudy and banal extravagance of the time, and teach the spirit and taste and dress and manners of the demi-monde that they must not presume upon admission to "society."

JOHN BULL IN A FINANCIAL POINT OF VIEW.

NOT many weeks since a broker in Wall Street had occasion to meet a New York agent of a London Bank on business. The conversation was one which involved time; and had it been between two New York bonnes it would have been but customary if a 10 per cent. deposit in a Trust Company had been called on one side or the other to insure the fulfillment of the contract. Such deposits are called, as matters of business, without necessarily implying any want of confidence in the party called on. In the instance referred to the New York broker proposed a mutual deposit.

"Could not think of it, Sir. Our Bank calls, never makes deposits. You shall deposit with us to secure the fulfillment of your contract. We never deposit with any one."

The New York broker modestly demurred to so one-sided a contract, and suggested that as his means were here, within the reach of attorneys and sheriffs, he ought at least to be put on a footing of equality with the agent of an institution organized, with limited liability, under foreign laws, and whose assets were on the other side of three thousand miles of water. The indignation of the agent of the London concern was Homeric.

"Sir," said he, "if you don't know the soundness of our concern more shame for your ignorance. We are none of your fly-away New York wild-cat banks. We are a London bank. There are none of your New York banks as sound as our London limited-liability banks. We could buy them all out. And as to depositing money with any New York bank or Trust Company, to insure the fulfillment of our contracts, upon my soul, Sir, it would be worth as much as my agency is even to mention such a suggestion to our solid, substantial, moneyed, stockholders in London!"

The New York broker was snubbed but not convinced, and did not consummate the transaction.

About the same time some faint glimmer of a coming storm was discerned on the financial horizon in England. The sagacious gentleman who conducts the financial department of the London Times understood it at once. He was a man of rare discernment. He had come from the first that the war in this country must end in the triumph of the rebels, and had advised every one to buy rebel cotton bonds at 90, and had warned the Dutchmen who were buying Five-Twenties at 40 that they would be ruined by the repudiation they had actually succeeded in dissuading the bulk of his countrymen from buying our securities, and in casting a temporary discredit upon Amsterdam paper. He had faith in the day for the final collapse of United States credit, and spoke encouragingly of the fortunes of British blockade-runners, nearly all of whom have failed. He had invariably denied every Federal victory, and indorsed each successive lie of REUTER'S announcing a rebel success. If he had been a stipendiary of JEFF DAVIS he could not have been more faithful to his cause, or more unscrupulous in the manner in which he prostituted his journal to its aid. When the first dark cloud of trouble began to loom up in London forty or fifty days ago, this faithful and intelligent oracle was at his post. He described the situation in a sentence. The difficulty with England was that she had been lending too much money to the United States. These rascals of Americans had formed a company of poor, innocent, plethoric John Bull, until they were head over ears in debt, and now they could not pay, and would probably break. In vain did merchants demonstrate, by the rule o + z = 4, that this country did not owe money to England, but, on the contrary, that England owed us for the vast shipments not only produced a knowing shake of the sagacious gentleman's head. He was good-natured, indulgent to John Bull. He did not wish to be hard on this country. It had its good points. It had done better than he expected. As to the figures, figures always lie—why notice them? The fact was, he was satisfied, that the merchants of the United States had got deeply into the debt of the English, and "the great danger for us (the British) is that the Americans will not be able to pay."

Meanwhile, events proceeded. The Germans prepared for war, and by way of preparation withdrew from London money which they had deposited there for employment. A thrill passed through the limited-liability banks, which for the most part had been lending on long native business, on the basis of moneys deposited with them by these Germans and others at a low rate of interest. The day of reckoning came on. On this day the bankers were called upon to repay the money they had received on deposit. They could not do it. They had no money. They had invested it in rebel cotton bonds, shares in Guatemala ranches, and in Chili copper mines, Atlantic and Great Western bonds, Turkish debentures, Indian scrip, and the like. They had nothing left for the hour of trouble, commanded cash in the London market. So they failed, one after another, toppling each other over like rotten cards and on end—Overend, Gurney, & Co., the London, the Consolidated, etc., etc. Are there any sound ones at all?

The knot, in the old classic phrase, was worthy of divine interposition, and the Government did, accordingly, interfere by granting the Bank of England power to issue various notes. This checked the panic, but did not remedy the disease. Without large and prompt supplies of gold it is clear that almost all the banks in England must go by the board. By most extraordinary good fortune those "large and prompt supplies" were forthcoming. And they came—not from Russia, or from any foreign region, or from Peru, or India, or the other countries in which Englishmen had loved to invest their money—but from New York. In one month we sent to England twenty millions dollars in gold. Not that we owed it. The money went abroad for the purchase of American securities and American cotton. We could spare it.

So the Bank of England was saved.

It will be curious to read the comments of the sagacious gentleman of the London Times on this event. No doubt he will demonstrate to the satisfaction of John Bull that it was, after all, our insolvency which made bonds at 30 point-stock banks to fall, and the soundness of British credit which caused New York to remit to London thirty millions of gold in the month of May to save the British banks from ruin. For there is no limit to British fatuity. Every Englishman honestly believes that he was born the wisest, truest, wisest, and most sagacious man of the human family. He prays in his church for that "pure and reformed 'ect to which" he belongs, and he considers that the purity extends throughout his social and commercial life. Tell him the facts—that the British joint-stock banks on the limited-liability principle are now tumbling about his ears, as they did in 1825 and 1836, and that in the ordinary course of events they must fail—that the only sound securities in which the British have been investing money during the last five years are Five-twenty Bonds—that poor old John Bull has been blundering in his old, familiar, pig-headed way ever since the Crimean War, and Earl RUSSELL began to prove that the "late United" States were dissolved—and he will smile serenely at your absurdity, with a consciousness peculiarly his own, of superior wisdom. Such a clear old dolt must be left to develop his own end.

PROVING TOO MUCH.

IT is amusing to observe the solemn fury with which the friends of civil rights at the country are told that they are precipitating a war of races. This is vehemently asserted, too, by many who claim to be special champions of President JOHNSON, forgetting that he has unequivocally declared himself in favor of enfranchising the colored soldiers and those who pay certain taxes. In this he follows his predecessor, President LINCOLN, who took the same ground. Do the doughty champions who are so belligerently hurried to the rescue imagine that they are precipitating a fight?

And from what or whom is this conflict to proceed? Are those who have patiently endured slavery and the rebel breach of faith by the Government likely suddenly to make war upon those who have freed and enfranchised them? It is, at most, to be said that the war is to be waged against this class by those who were lately fighting against the Union. But if that be so, can the civil and personal rights of the class in question be considered secure if they are left exclusively to the guardianship of those who would massacre them if they were admitted to political rights? Would the inhabitants of the cities of New York or of Albany, for instance, be very sure of fair play from the people of the South in the civil relations if those people were ready to slaughter them if they were allowed to vote?

Zeal should be tempered with discretion. If the humane provisions instituted to the whites of the Southern States by the sober prophets of a war of races indeed exists, those provisions cannot, beyond peril, be exceeded or prolonged and stringent military occupation of those States to protect the civil rights of the blacks.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—I have read your articles on the late sales of cotton by Mr. MYERS. I have likewise read Mr. M'CULLOCH'S and Mr. VAN DYCK'S letters on the subject, and, in the language of the New York Express, I think, will die respect to you, that they "settle the question."

There is but one point on which I wish to trouble you. Mr. M'CULLOCH (or perhaps it may be Mr. VAN DYCK) very justly observes that the Act of 1864-65, Mr. MYERS, did not much validate time in "watching the Government." He had a right to cash bad but suspected they were so cheap, surveyed—and that he was thus fairly entitled to his commission, which, on thirty millions of gold sold in May, was $37,500.

Now I wish to say that I will watch these rascals in the press and in Congress persistently, daily, and day, if need be, for one half the money, during the next year—say $18,750. And, being a bachelor, I am really, individually necessary to secure the salary, to become a brother-in-law of the Secretary of the Treasury.

YOURS, EPHRAIM C. JONES.

In the HOUSE, Mr. Schenck's bill to readjust the rates and system of payments in the army was taken up and passed.—[See page 386.]

June 6:

In the Senate, Mr. Doolittle's substitute for the second section of the Constitutional Amendment was disagreed to by a vote of 8 yeas to 35 nays. The section after the caucus be taken in the year 1870, representatives to be apportioned among the several States which may be included in the Union, according to the numbers of each, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all persons in each State not included in the above description, and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to the value of the taxable property within each State, not belonging to the State or to the United States.

June 7:

In the House, the Tennessee Relief Bill was passed.—[See page 386.] The object of the bill is to provide a station for our fleet on the Pacific.

June 8:

In the Senate, the joint resolution to amend the Constitution was passed by a vote of 33 to 11, as amended. It reads as follows:

Resolved, By the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both houses concurring), That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —. Sec. 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Sec. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed; but whenever the right to vote at any election for electors of President and Vice-President, or for the executive and judicial officers, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Sec. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President or Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof; but Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

Sec. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for the payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned; but neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

June 11:

In the House, Mr. ANCONA offered a resolution that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to report a bill repealing the Neutrality Law of 1818, under the terms of which the President's Proclamation against the Fenians was issued. Mr. SCHENCK offered a substitute, which, with the original resolution, the House voted to refer to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The joint resolution, authorizing the President to negotiate treaties with certain Indian tribes, was passed. On motion of Mr. SPALDING, the resolution for the appointment of Jefferson Davis should be held in custody as a prisoner, and subjected to trial according to the laws of the land.

THE FINAL REPORT OF THE RECONSTRUCTION COMMITTEE.

On the 8th of June Mr. FESSENDEN and before the Senate the final report of the Reconstruction Committee.

According to this report the Confederate States, at the close of the war, were in utter exhaustion and without any government. The President had no power except to execute the laws of the land as Chief Magistrate. The laws gave him no authority over the subject of reorganization, by the Constitution he was Commander-in-chief of the army and navy. He was his duty, under the law of nations and the army regulations, to restore order, to protect property, and to protect the people of the country from any quarter, until provision should be made for their permanent rule. He might, as President, assemble Congress and submit the whole matter to the law-making power. He might establish military supervision and control, until Congress should assemble on its regularly appointed day. He might convene Congress in extra session, but it could not be contended that they possessed or could exercise any but military authority. They had no power to organize civil Governments, nor to exercise any authority except that which flowed from the war-making power. The commissions, either had the President, as Commander-in-Chief, authorized military officers to do so, had no exclusive possession of the military authority. It was for them to decide how far to would extend its action and on what terms he would withdraw it. He might, perhaps, permit the people to assemble and to initiate civil governments, and to execute such local laws as they might choose to form, not inconsistent with the constitution and the laws of the United States, and, satisfied they might safely be left to themselves, he might withdraw the military forces altogether and have the people of any or all of these States to govern themselves without the military forces.

The Committee maintain no portion of the people of the country, whether it is a State or Territory, has the right, while remaining on its soil, to withdraw from or reject the authority of the United States. This right is quite evident, from all the facts, and, indeed, from the whole mass of testimony submitted to the Committee. Such an instance was ever regard paid to any other consideration than absolute submission to the Government, or to overcome the heroic form of an election, in which no precautions were taken to secure the regularity of the election or the assent of the people. No Constitution has been legally adopted, every election has been illegal in character, and such elections as were held were without authority of law. The Committee are of opinion that it would be a mistake to that the States referred to have not placed themselves in a condition to claim representation. The Committee states all the rules which have since the foundation of the Government been considered essential in such cases to be considered. While it appears that nearly all are willing to return to their allegiance to the United States, nevertheless, it is equally clear that the ruling motive is a desire to obtain the advantages which will be derived from a representation in Congress. Officers of the Union army are held, and their power, conditions to Congress, are but means, are generally declared not prescribed. Southern men who suffered for the Union are blacklisted and insultingly persecuted.

From the time loan Confederate States thus withdrew from their representation in Congress and levied war against the United States. Their people and their people became and were insurgents and traitors, and all of them assumed and did engage in the rebellion. They practiced rebellion of enemies of the United States. They perilled on their bonds and lives, and their security and property. The burden now rests upon them, before claiming to be reinstated into their power, conditions to which they are qualified to resume Federal relations. In order to do this they must satisfy Congress that they have done with the assent of the people republican forms of government, in harmony with the Constitution of the United States that all hostile purposes have ceased, and should give adequate security against future treason and rebellion, which will prove satisfactory to the Government charged with the duty of seeing that the guarantees are subdued. They have forfeited all civil and political rights under the Federal Constitution, and can only be restored thereto by the proclamation and with the consent of the Government of the Republic, and by such conditions as the opinion of Congress, the security of the country and the faithful distribution of justice will be only a transference of the conflict from the fields of battle to the halls of legislation.

The conclusion of the Committee, therefore, is that the disabled Confederate States are not entitled or entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States: that before offering such representation adequate security for future peace and safety should be requested; that this can only be found in such changes in their form of laws as shall determine the civil rights and privileges of the citizen in all parts of the country, and afford adequate guarantees on an equitable basis, shall fix a stigma upon treason, and protect the loyal people against future efforts the excesses incurred in support of the rebellion, and for maintaining the national faith, the payment of the public debt and the equal distribution of taxes.

The Committee then before Congress is, whether three conquered enemies shall at their own pleasure participate in the Congressional legislation, or whether they shall, in such conditions as in the opinion of Congress, the security of the country and the faithful distribution of justice will be only a transference of the conflict from the fields of battle to the halls of legislation.

The conclusion of the Committee, therefore, is that the disabled Confederate States are not entitled or entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States: that before offering such representation, adequate security for future peace and safety should be requested; that this can only be found in such changes in their form of laws as shall determine the civil rights and privileges of the citizen in all parts of the country, and afford adequate guarantees on an equitable basis, shall fix a stigma upon treason, and protect the loyal people against future efforts the excesses incurred in support of the rebellion, and for maintaining the national faith, the payment of the public debt and the equal distribution of taxes.

The question then before Congress is, whether three conquered enemies shall at their own pleasure participate in

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

MR. WRIGHT AT HOME.

CHAPTER XXIII.

IF ever a man was justifiable in flying to the flowing bowl to night-surely that man is Alonzo Wright.

True, he has made solemn oath not to take another drop, Christmas having witnessed his last awful frolic, with the death of a favorite negro man somehow mixed up in its frantic festivities, until next Fourth of July, unless, Mr. Wright most carefully stipulates in his vow, we gain our independence before then; in which latter case he, Tim Lamun, Dr. Peel, Bob Withers, and a few other like spirits, are solemnly pledged to each other to have about the greatest time of it yet known on earth; Captain Richard Simmons moving and assisting unanimously to carry said proviso.

A dozen times has Mr. Wright assured Anne, hanging with silent importunity upon his arm on this as well as every other occasion of his leaving home for Somerville, that he will not taste, touch, smell a drop, not even go on the side of the street where the grocery is. For Mr. Wright is far from being an austere father. Anne has grown up in his eyes the fairest and loveliest and most thoroughly accomplished of women. There is a droop in her large blue eyes, a wave and fall in her fair hair, a mould of her form, an altogether indescribable sweetness in manner and tone which would attach any father in the world. In addition to her being his only child and chiefest companion, she is her dead mother over again. Very often, indeed, of evenings, when Anne sits at the piano, her fingers straying over the keys from one piece to another, singing half a song here, another half there, breaking out in some brilliant bravura, or idling through the tangles of a schottische, does her father sit, cigar in mouth, looking at and loving her with all the admiration and love of his soul. A rather small, light-complexioned man is Mr. Wright, but your big burly people never feel most. He is the slight-built organizations you find fire and force; leanness and ferocity are coupled in the wild-cat, vivacity and venom in viper and rattlesnake.

In fact, this Anne at least is "all the world to" her father. At the head of his table; her graceful form about the house all day in diligent housekeeping; persuading and remonstrating with the servants, who serve the family wondrous well under the double impulse of mortal terror of "Mas 'Lonz," on the one side, and devoted attachment to "Missussy," as they call her, on the other; even when Dr. Peel or other company are being entertained in the parlor, Mr. Wright proudly conscious of Anne from the moment he awakes in the morning till he kicks off his boots at night, can join in whatever denunciation of the Yankees is going on between him and the gentleman with whom he is conversing, and be keenly alive all the time to the ever-varying loveliness of Anne on the other side of the room.

Why conceal these bitterest pangs of remorse which give such intensity to Mr. Wright's paternal affection? Yes, Anne is like her mother, most like that mother when at her loveliest; and there were hushed whispers in the community in which Mr. Wright lived at the time of his wife's death, vague rumors from family servants, and from friends who prepared the body for burial, of bruises and marks. Let us say no more about it where nothing certain is known. No man knows better than Mr. Wright that he is a devil incarnate in his cups, and the demoniac love of liquor which possesses the man is restrained only by his love for his daughter, and mortal dread of what he may do to her in some moment of intoxication.

And yet, reasoning with thousands of other Secessionists at the same instant, if ever a man was justifiable, every thing to the contrary notwithstanding, in drowning his sorrows in the bowl to-night that man is Alonzo Wright. As an almost universal rule, save those of the decession leaders, in the army and out of it, who never drank before, are taking to drinking now. As to those who have drunk hard all along, these do nothing else now at all.

"Why, look at it, gentlemen," says Captain Richard Simmons, who sits tapping on the counter of the grocery, his left arm around a pillar, from which hang the fly-specked festoons of red, white, yellow, and blue paper into which bows adorning the ceiling, expressing, for Tim Lamun, who sits dead drunk in an adjoining armchair, and for Bob Withers, who smokes in silence, and for Dr. Peel, whose speech is exclusively oaths, and for Alonzo Wright, who is brooding over the times, and over the card-table, his slouched hat down over his eyes, the painful feelings of all.

"Only permit your eyes to range over the situation, as Lamun says in the Star. A Yankee, gentlemen, plainly and flatly, adds Captain Simmons, impressively. "It may be a weakness inherent in my nature; I've tried to master it again and yet again. I will be frank with you; I can not. My soul abhors a Yankee. Never mind about his professed devotion to the Confederacy. A lifetime spent in constant odor for it would not satisfy me. My nature revolts from a Yankee. There's old Neely—a Yankee schoolmaster! Who so loud and long for the Secession? Insisting on shaking my hand every time we met over our glorious victories. I pledge you my word of honor, gentlemen, I always went straight to my room at Staples's and washed my hands with soap every time. Natural antipathies! For one, gentlemen, I loathe, abominate, detest, execrate—"

"Oh, hold your horses, Simmons, by George! who knows? You may be one yourself. Pedlled tin ware for years for what we know. Very likely all your talk only a Yankee trick to throw us off."

"If it is by such buffoonery, Bob Withers, you seek to divert my mind from this dark hour of our country's distress your remarks are beneath, because doubly beneath, my notice. Charleston fallen, gentlemen," continues Captain Simmons, dismissing Mr. Withers from existence by a slow wave of his hand. "I can not realize it. Fort Sumter, I can not realize it not be realized. I can imagine Wilmington fallen. I do not deny that Petersburg and Richmond are regarded by the Yankee command with tread them. That General Lee has surrendered, though it was infinitely worse than death so to do, I can because I must believe it. Nor do I refuse to acknowledge that Mobile is occupied; that Johnston, whom I regard as next to Lee and Davis, has also surrendered. Dick Taylor's surrender smites us to-day like the hand of fate. But Charleston! From every other combination my soul reverts to Charleston. I can not realize it, gentlemen. I may succeed in some degree by the time I have retired at night, but the first thing I know I find myself sitting bolt upright in bed, during the silent watches of the midnight hour, with a cold sweat and cursing, 'By Him who made me, it is not, must not, shall not, can not be so! Charleston? C-h-a-r-l-e-s-t-o-n! Impossible!'

"Why not get up a theory, Simmons?" says Dr. Peel, scrupulously neat in attire, while the oaths are disordered in apparel to the last degree in the highest spirits, whether from liquor or not, though he does not show any signs of intoxication other than that, while this contrasts Bob Withers excepted, can not drink enough to floss them even to a mild semi-exhilaration. "You proved to us, Simmons, in this very room that Charleston, Wilmington, Petersburg, and Richmond, if evacuated, would only be so in pursuance of Lee's new plan of abandoning the seacoast and concentrating in the interior—a new plan, splendid plan. Why, Lee surrendered you were ready for that. Lee always had a reason for what he did. Lee had sent all his veterans to Johnston, and was engaged in a consummate ruse! Come, Captain, you have never wanted for a theory before; make haste. Where is your inventive faculty? Some brilliant scheme, if we only knew what it was, behind all this news you are wailing over." And Dr. Peel flashes his white teeth upon him, in singular spirits considering the times.

"Sir," replies Captain Simmons, with oracular dignity, "I wait to hear from President Davis. I can see deep meaning in the consummate silence of that Washington of our glorious revolution."

"You can? By George, I can't! What is the use of being a drove of geese still, gentlemen?"

It is Bob Withers who propounds the question, rising from his seat to do it. Very much inflamed is Bob's face these trying times, from excessive weeping, perhaps. But it is an honest, sensible, good-humored, Bacchus-like face, too.

"I always looked on the thing as a big spree, and you know I always said so. I knew it was all wrong from the start, Simmons and every as any thing gets to be in this world, a tremendous frolic. We all went into it. Of course I wasn't the man to stay behind. It was the widest, most expensive, biggest spree you ever saw, and I pitched in. Yes, and would do it again tomorrow if it was to do over again; never backed out when half a dozen fellows invited me to go in. When the whole South got drunk, think I'm going to keep sober? But the smash up has come at last—it will come. Broken windows and crockery and tables to pay for, headache, empty purse, black eyes, men killed. But wasn't it the grandest blow out! But I knew all along it was a spree, always said so; they could never humbug me, by George! with their lies. No, Sir-ree, bob!

"There is this one consolation, gentlemen," remarks Captain Simmons, more Chesterfieldian the drunker he gets, with a solemn air, and waving gracefully aside the multiplicity of their Mercutio—"one consolation which fills my nature in this hour of darkness with profound satisfaction—the killing of Abraham Lincoln. Had I an offspring I would have him baptized Booth Simmons. Even in my pangs of bitterest mortification at the failure, if failure it is, of our beloved Confederacy, I say to myself, 'Captain Simmons, Captain Simmons, you forget that Lincoln the tyrant is at this moment in eternal perdition. Like the balm of some place of which I was instructed by pious parents—Gilead I think is the name—the reflection soothes, at least for the moment, the anguish of my spirit."

"The last place I would think you would wish Lincoln to go to, Simmons," remarks Dr. Peel, with great surprise.

"Exactly what I was going to say Doctor, by George!" puts in Bob Withers.

"May I request an explanation, gentlemen?" asks Captain Simmons, with his stateliest air.

"I would think you would much rather he had gone to heaven. You have hated him so much here one would suppose you would regret being associated eternally with him hereafter," replies Dr. Peel, with Mr. Withers's cordial assent.

"If there be a thing which disgusts me more than all besides with imbecility," says Captain Simmons, with slow and unspeakable scorn, "it is the reckless impiety and irreligion too often connected with it. No merit in myself, seeing my early advantages, my inculcated habit of worshiping from earliest infancy in the sanctuary. Be drunkards, gentlemen, if you must," adds Captain Simmons, with impressive solemnity, "but not scoffers—no, not scoffers. 'Tis the voice of the scoffer, I hear him complain.' Not exactly that, but something to that effect was instilled—"

"We respect your piety, Simmons," interrupts Dr. Peel. "It is fully equal to that of Parson Barker, at least; he told me to-day that he was not so much the hand of Booth as the hand of God. His only regret, he says, is that Booth did not kill him on the day of his inauguration. Dozens of church-members—lying Sam Peters, Dr. Ginnis, and the like—say they are glad of the assassination, regret that it failed in the case of Seward, hope the good work will go on. Even that little saint, Ellis, the sincerest and best of them all, got almost drunk with joy over it." From this statement, however, the writer of these lines distinctly withholds his belief.

Let us step out of this choice set of companions, only for a moment, to say a word as to the way in which the killing of Mr. Lincoln was received in Somerville.

There is Jem Budd. When Staples, every hair on end, rushes into Jem's shop and announces the glorious news, that dirty-faced artisan pauses long enough, with suspended file, to say, "Ah!" with genuine surprise; to add immediately after, as he continues his fling at the gun-barrel clenched in the vice before him, "Just what I always said." It is but history to record, however, that when Dr. Warner drops in a moment after to ask after Mrs. Budd's very precarious health, and to tell Jem—of course that was altogether a secondary motive—the news of the surrender of General Lee, which comes by the same mail, but which Staples has neglected to mention, the gun-smith stops altogether from his work, and, adding largely to the darkness of his face by a long reflective rub thereof with his forefinger, has genuine joy in his eyes while he says, "Precisely so, Doctor; what I always thought."

The fact is, no sentiment, whatever it was, whether Union or Secession, has ever been advanced in Jem's hearing since the war began which has not met in Jem a ready assent. Like hundreds of thousands of others at the South during this period, Jem has but put in practice Talleyrand's famous maxim—that words were given to us to enable us to conceal our thoughts.

There is Mr. Ferguson, too. Very eagerly he pastes in the dispatch announcing the assassination, with every thing relating to it, but as near grandest of all the lies, the very blossoming and perfection of the lies of the period. Only his sincere affection for Mr. Arthur will afford him patience with the unaffected belief that gentleman gives to the news from the outset. He even condescends, the Scotchman, to sympathize with his friend. Mr. Lincoln would have been assassinated in Richmond if at all. How could he have been killed in a crowded theatre, and the murderer escape? Besides, it is known that Mr. Lincoln is a member of the Presbyterian Church, and consequently no attendant at theatres. Can not Mr. Arthur see that the news is manufactured to accompany and neutralize the tidings of Lee's surrender? The trick is too transparent.

A tremendous amount of evidence it took to convince us Secessionists that Vicksburg had fallen, and all the rest; we do not want to believe it, you observe, therefore we won't. Alas, we should all be descended from the same Adam! But the amount of evidence it required to satisfy us Union people that Burnside was repulsed on the Rappahannock and the like is incredible. If the heart would not get so dreadfully in the way of the head!

As wide apart as Heaven and Hades are the brutal rejoicings of red-faced Mrs. Smithers and the solemn regrets of Mrs. Bowles over the same event. Not even Mrs. Smithers's deliberate and permanent sentiment, let us hope.

"I guess, Mrs. Allen dear, more than I would deplore the fact of General Lee's surrender, if such preposterous news should prove true, which I can not for one instant believe. I thank God the miserable wretch who did the dreadful deed was no South Carolinian—a Yankee, I am told, or from some State bordering thereupon. For Mr. Lincoln you well know my unspeakable loathing, but I would rather be even his wife than the wife of his assassin. Read on, Alice." For Mrs. Bowles has stopped her daughter in her reading of the paper to say that much.

THE OATH.

"Poor dear Mr. Lincoln! Heaven knows I never loved her so much in all our long, long knowledge of each other as I do now," is Mrs. Sorel's frequent remark of late to Mr. Arthur.

"She has not been in my house for years, nor I in hers, but I should distress her with my presence as you know. She regards me with—with averslon, or rather horrified amazement, because I can not believe with her in Secession. I have no feeling for her—how could I have?—but one of love and pity. Alice told me about her when she was here last, reduced to a shadow, pale and fragile as a flower, her hair all white now with mental distress, yet quiet and refined and still. I tell you, Mr. Arthur," adds placid Mrs. Sorel, "I consider the counterpart of the one she is describing, and with warmth, "I am an old woman now. I can live and die in elevated thought in a circle as this country possesses, but I never saw a human being who came so near my ideal of a perfect lady as does Miss Alice Bowles. I see what you are thinking about," she adds, with a smile, to Mr. Arthur, who flushes over face and ears at her glance. "Yes, she would be a most fortunate man, as the phrase runs, if you succeed there. Alice has something of her father's strength of character, unless you would prefer having it called; is of stronger character than her mother; will have all her mother's sweetness of heart and all her mother's amount of trial, discipline, sorrow."

"Do you think, Mrs. Sorel," begins Mr. Arthur, eagerly—"do you imagine there is any hope for me? Her mother has such horror of my Union opinions! I have never even come to the house. Alice, you know, has long since ceased to attend church. She is so engaged in her school, too, I never see her."

"I have never asked Alice," says Mrs. Sorel, with a smile, "but I do not think you need despair. You are a Union man, dear. You are undergoing discipline which is good for you both—

"That abominable school," breaks in her impulsive friend. "The idea of a woman who would adorn a throne teaching! And teaching such children as we have in Somerville! Wasting her health."

"She is doing no such thing. I never saw her looking more well and in my life than when she was here on that last Saturday. Propriety requires that, under all the painful circumstances, painful and unusual circumstances of the case, she should cease to attend your church. Besides, you do not realize, Sir," adds Mrs. Sorel, very gently though, "how poor, how very poor Mrs. Bowles has become. Alice is doing, and doing eagerly and well, her simple duty in supporting her mother. And it is just the discipline Alice needs to qualify her for the new times before us."

"New? Yes, the bran-new, the happy, the glorious times before us!" says Mr. Arthur, with almost boyish enthusiasm, "I tell you, Mrs. Sorel, we are standing on such an epoch in the history of America as even that blessed old Bishop Berkeley never dreamed of when he predicted of that star of empire centuries ago. Slavery and Secession forever rooted out, our glorious flag from the Arctic circle to the equator purified by our terrible ordeal, who can tell? That poor Mr. Barker may be in part right at last—sure we are in the most unusual nature of it. I tell you, Robby," and Mr. Arthur, excited by his national, and of course without reference to his individual, love-making Alice, rises and that sedate young gentleman on the shoulder, "we will have grand times, won't we?"

"What do you mean, Sir, for good? Yes," adds that sober youth, "and I know the time ain't far off. People don't ask me these days how that Abolitionist Arthur comes on, nor yet at me and throw rocks. Only last time I was in town Mr. Staples stopped me to shake hands and ask me how I was. He was as kind as you please, told me just to let him know if his son Joe ever said a thing out of the way to me, that was all. Mr. Staples, Mr. Dr. Ginnis go all the way over the street to stop Mr. Ferguson, and insisted on shaking hands, which it ain't easy to get Mr. Ferguson to do with any body; and I've heard Dr. Ginnis tell Jem Budd, long ago, that that old rascal Arthur's Abolitionist ought to be hung high as Haman."

"That will do, Robby," interrupts his mother, checking with a gesture her hand Robby's eager experiences. "I am too old for all this, Mr. Arthur. It bewilders me. Charleston and Columbia, the very nucleus of Secession State, to be so terribly scourged! You must excuse me—we South Carolinians can not help it. I smile at Mrs. Bowles, and am just as foolish about the State as she. I don't like to hear or talk or think about it. The Judge of all the earth will do right."

And it is just this that more than bewilders good Mrs. Bowles too. The long holding out of Charleston elevated it and South Carolina to even a degree above her already-intense idolatry of them. She regarded the arrival of Sherman at Savannah, and his setting out upon his march into South Carolina without one particle of apprehension, with joy rather. Napoleon never had, in the fullest tide of his victories, so calm, so confident, so absolutely exultant a sense of approaching success in a battle. So surely as the sun shone, so surely as South Carolina was South Carolina, would the insulting foe meet on its soil such terrible defeat. Mrs. Bowles could see the hand of God in it:

"Your dear native State, Alice, and mine began this great revolution, and will end it. Heaven has permitted a Federal army to get to the State by an unexpected military movement, by almost a miracle, for this purpose. How little does that man Sherman think it! I thank God from my soul. Who of us could have arranged, or even have imagined it all so well? People will think for generations to South Carolina as they now do to Waterloo, or as I am told they sometimes do to Yorktown there in Virginia, that the Thermopylæ of our revolution should be there! I loved the State before; henceforth every grain of its sand, the leaves of its trees are dear to me; every rock that juts on its dear surface is to me dearer than relatives. Remember it, Alice—henceforth let your own State, Carolina—Alice, my own name!—be next with you to heaven and God!" and the thin, pale, classic face glows with enthusiasm. "Oh, I hope I shall live, Alice, all the two weeks during which we had those rumors of the capture of Sherman in Georgia, I thought surely I should not live to hear South Carolina, I felt, was to be the hallowed spot."

"The people of Savannah do not seem to be so patriotic," begins Alice.

"Actually admitting the Federals without burning their city, and receiving them with their hands. That illustrates what I am saying," Mrs. Bowles interrupts Alice, with enthusiasm; "do you not see it, my child? Do you realize? The very contrast between Georgia and our State, between Savannah and Charleston, will show the world what South Carolina is. Do I think the two States are actually contiguous?"

How can Mrs. Bowles's eager expectation of the news of the great victory be gratified? Most seriously did Alice tremble for her mother's very mind. No other topic was on her mother's lips than they are together on Sundays, Mondays and by night. No other thought in her mind while alone, Alice teaching in the little front parlor, shaking off every hour the night at every distant sound, fancying the arrival of the news in every distant cry, in every footstep passing the door. Rutledge Bowles was comparatively forgotten, though in every prayer for him—and they ascend as from an ever-burning altar—Alice would send up her heart more than for his life even, is in her supplication that, if it please God, Rutledge Bowles may have part in that victory. Better, far better his dear death on that glorious field than that he should be absent from it!

How describe the awful silence of the news of Sherman's unopposed march across the State?

"They are gathering, concentrating the army somewhere further inland, Alice, to make the victory complete and final!" she explains to Alice, repeating it over and over. Alice breaks the full of it to her, but unwillingly that he would the death of a dear friend.

"Only cavacading it, child, for a few days, so that we may understand the situation better. You see, they wish to swell the army with its garrison, so as to have not one man of the Federal army to escape from the Confederacy. Beware. I pray God our army may be merciful in the hour of its great triumph; their awful wrongs are enough to absorb the whole heart, but in the moment of victory the brave are ever merciful. Only a few days, dear, and we shall hear of the reconcentration of the forces, and of victory. Let me see the map again. Columbia? Yes, Columbia—see if I am not a true prophet—Columbia is the centre of the army. Sherman would like the victory to be there." And Alice almost shudders at the light in her mother's eye, the spot of red on her cheek, the nervous motion of her thin white hand about her forehead.

Ah, that wandering of the hand about the edges of the mourning cap bore, poor Alice, very well, with the thoughtful eyes fixed absently on book, or sewing, trying neglected to hear. Mrs. Bowles's hand had said it all. And Mrs. Bowles herself many, very many times, the poor lady is wearing herself literally to a shadow by her excitement. Alice, as the Doctor do all they can.

"Thank you, Dr. Warner; don't be foolish, Alice. I need no medicine. I am very well, better in my life; hardly ever felt so well. When it comes, Alice, bring me the accounts of the victory—not ill be the best medicine in the world! next to hearing it from Rutledge Bowles. I want to have it first from your lips, Alice. But the report itself—" and with the hand to the forehead, and Alice clasps it in hers, and kisses her mother there, and bursts into tears.

"What is the matter, mamma, you are, Alice?" says her mother, half indignantly. "You are getting positively nervous and morbid, confining yourself so to that odious school. You sew too steadily."

"But mother, dear mamma," ventures Alice, Dr. Warner says you are to go back, he supposes, after all, the Federals should not be whipped?"

"You cowardly creaker," says Mrs. Bowles, gently but with dignity, "and with the hand to her head, and Alice clasps it in hers, and kisses her mother there, and bursts into tears.

"What is the matter, mamma, you are, Alice?" says her mother, half indignantly. "You are getting positively nervous and morbid, confining yourself so to that odious school. You sew too steadily."

"Oh, Mr. Ellis!" she said, "how are you? And how is Mrs. Ellis and the children?"

"As well as usual, Miss Alice," replies Mr. Ellis, somewhat surprised at her manner, and perceiving that she has something more to say.

"Will you excuse me, Mr. Ellis?" she adds, the color flushing her cheek; "but mamma is very much excited and nervous, and there is nothing to confirm her in her delusion. I do not exactly mean that. Please try and prepare her for any disappointment in store for her." And, in her affection for her mother, Alice looks at him with the imploring eyes of a child.

"Delusion, disappointment?" Mr. Ellis repeats the words, the strange light kindling in his eyes. "What can you mean?" And seeing her mother at last, Alice can only murmur no explanation at all, and retreat to her schoolroom, leaving Mr. Ellis to proceed upon his visit.

It is an awful one. When she joins her mother a few hours after, it is to find her flushed with fresh certainty and enthusiasm of Confederate success, and with South Carolinian success.

"You are always croaking so, Alice," says Mrs. Bowles, with sparkling eyes, "as almost to affect my spirits. Good Mr. Ellis has spent an hour with me to-day. He confirms my utmost expectations of the speedy success of our cause. You can not tell how perfectly he has explained away all our late reverses. He has been informed beyond all question that Earnest will intervene very, very soon now; by next month we will hear. It is official, he says. Why, Alice, you know what a dependable person man Mr. Ellis is; and he told me that it was impossible, if we do our duty, to defeat the Confederate cause in a war in which God is himself." Alice's And a vast deal more to the same effect.

Who can describe it? Steadily as the footfall of death it has come upon the news that Sherman has swept across the State of South Carolina, is in possession of Fayetteville, North Carolina. Not a Confederate victory in South Carolina. No serious fighting. Not the consolation even of a glorious defeat.

With prostration nearly reversed, Alice watches and cares for Mrs. Bowles almost as a fond mother with an ailing child. Never more respectful and tender was a husband than now Mrs. Bowles has less and yet less to say with each passing day, bewildered, exhausted.

"Where is Rutledge? Is Rutledge with him?" she says, with the hand, thinner every hour, wandering more frequently about the sunken temples, smoothing carefully the hair whitening toward the hue of the garment of the saints in light. With what infinite affection does Alice minister to her mother, trying to conceal her assiduity, weeping during the watches of the night. For her mother's sake she could almost wish the Confederacy success, if, almost, not quite.

"Would you not like Mrs. Sorel to call and see you? She would like to so much, mamma, and you would enjoy seeing you know," asks Alice the day she has read to her mother of the fall of Richmond. Perhaps the moment was the chosen.

"No, my dear," replies Mrs. Bowles, decidedly though slowly, and with the trembling fingers hovering about her forehead. "We differ so widely upon the matter of deepest interest to me on earth, that I feel it would clearly, but would rather not. I care for nothing now but Rutledge Bowles and yourself, for nothing in all the world."

And as she says it she looks with us in Somerville. As each disaster arrives, we indignantly deny and scout it as long as we possibly can. We will not believe the worst, how we only expect disastrous news, and take it with scarcely a perceptible wince, like an animal used to beating, pitiful things.

Oh, may the God that rules the eternal hereafter as well as the present, deal out from His just but fearful wrath to the accursed demagogues North and South who deluded the South into its frantic folly of Secession! At least, thanks be to God, that each one of them will be dealt according to his deeds. Alas, may there not be an unhallowed satisfaction even in observing our opponents in fate? "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord?" Nearly five years now since we were all steeped in the folly; its bitterness is saturating the very soul.

However, if, like a swamp full of frogs, all good Secessionists in Somerville, Dr. Ginnis, as Mrs. Sorel says, croaks, all with the deepest base, leading the croak, we are all croaking in inharmonious concert, there is this refrain in which we all join:

"Live under Federal rule? Stay in the country if the Yankees do subjugate it? I will go to Mexico first! Live in North America, the first?" And so to the possibility, in any case, of existing as individuals under that accursed flag again, we all say, with Dr. Ginnis, till earth and heaven ring again, "Never, never, never!"

What amuses me most in you pious people, Simmons says, in the midst of the continuance of his conversation with that exceedingly dignified and intoxicated gentleman, "is the desperate way you keep trying—Barker, Ellis, Ginnis, Peters; in fact, all of you, good, genuine, praying Secessionists—to keep up your Christianity."

Never more carefully dressed in his life, bejewelled until some new light is perpetually flashing out from some portion, from hand and bosom, essenced until even the strong odors of the grocery are subjugated thereby, Dr. Peel's fine broadcloth and cream linen seem radiant with his own exuberant spirits. Overflowing with life and conviviality, his remarks are almost exclusively oaths of so prolific and varied an abundance as the sparks of a fire-work, and as impossible to reproduce in any description thereof. From his heart of hearts Captain Simmons regards the Doctor as by far the most magnificent specimen of a genuine Southern man he has ever met; proud to be seen with him, never weary or queasy in his brilliant speeches. And this is the very general opinion of Somerville. Bob Withers says very often respecting "Dr. Peel? Well, yes. By George! Oh, hang it! Somehow I can't stand Dr. Peel!" And there is considerable mutual shyness between the two; but nobody minds Bob.

"Yes, hang on to their Christianity. That," says Dr. Peel, with impressive profanity, "seems to be the main business of you pious trained cows these days, Simmons. There is Mr. Ellis, insisting on sticking on the hand of God in this and the hand of God in that, over and over, nervous and trembling, like a scarecrow afraid of losing its lesson. But Brother Barker's the man for my money. Preach! What a chance a public man has with such a man, with a Bible open before him, of pitching into the Yankees! Colonel Ret Roberts is tame to Barker. Hear the preaching! Twice every Sunday; two prayer-meetings during the week for the success of the Confederacy; opening every public meeting with prayer, to say nothing of our dgings up there in the old C.C. If that poor fellow hasn't done his duty in cursing the Yankees, I'm mistaken. Poor! I have said I am a pretty hard swearer; for hard, strong, steady, desperate, raving, red-hot pouring it into the Federals is a religious fashion—blasphemy they would call it in me—I give it up to the Parson. He has got Christianity and the Confederacy so twisted together he can't separate the two to save his life. Hardly a verse in your mammy's Bible, Simmons, but these political preachers have used to the success of their glorious cause by. We must not permit the disasters of the times to discourage our belief in Christianity, brethren. Christianity is not dead, my hearers, Barker is repeating, I'm told, in every sermon and in every conversation, although the despondent tone it is to believe in any part of Scripture if all it says about slavery as a divine ordinance prove false."

"Now you, Parson Arthur," begins Bob Withers, upon whom any audience to Dr. Peel's exuberant conversation has devolved, "you Wright being apparently asleep under his slouched hat, and Captain Simmons, half-humming, half-hiccuping, forgetful of his usual company, what is your remember of a Sabbath-school hymn learned in his earliest childhood.

"Arthur," adds to Dr. Peel, with a sudden change of tone and manner, and even experienced Bob Withers opens his eyes at the unexpected and natural way in which his companion heaps imprecations upon that individual.

Could it have been owing to a visit made by Mr. Arthur to Dr. Peel not two days before this? The two men had scarcely ever met. Truth to say, the minister had often seen passing the door of Arthur's street, sitting on chairs of stores into which he had dropped to make purchases, swearing and gesticulating in knots of excited men, the superb bearing of a gentleman in question. Nor did he withhold a certain admiration we all give to Health, in its full development of the thing, from its fine proportions, full chest, commanding bearing of the man. He had fancied that so Hercules was represented in old pagan poor-school, and prohiberant brow, the massy countenance with its aureole of curly black hair and beard, and large black eyes, wonderful and fearless. What a full life in the man, a force and a sway; a sort of Assyrian power, even, in the costly adornments of Dr. Peel, which wonderfully suited the attention of the minister, interested, almost fascinated, while it repelled him, himself being of so widely different a type. But never had ever exchanged a syllable—Mr. Arthur doubly shy of one whom he knew to have perhaps an hereditary prejudice against him on political grounds as any one—even Mrs. Smithers or Mrs. Warner—in Somerville.

It was but natural in Dr. Peel, then, that he should be surprised, on the occasion alluded to, when Mr. Arthur, with scarce a preliminary knock at the door, entered the room at Staples's Hotel, walked in that evening after supper.

"I have called in the heat of the moment," remarked the visitor, "as has just upon his head, and on a tone and with a manner totally unlike his usual deliberation, to the astonishment of Somerville;" and but to make one syllable of remark to you—

Dr. Peel rises involuntarily from the table at which he is seated writing, the first astonishment on his bold face giving swift place under the eye and the ring of his visitor to a manner singularly like that worn by him during all his intercourse with Lieutenant Ravenel in the same apartment.

"You know me, you know my sentiments, you know my exact position," says Mr. Arthur, coldly and slowly. "I have informed by Colonel Brooks of yours. The instant he learned fully who you were he hastened to this place as the peril of the hour—peril of Alice Bowles' both sides. He has left me only a moment ago. I am here now. I would have got to you to-night, however you were. If I had not done it, I know your case fully, exactly, completely," continues Mr. Arthur, the tone and manner undergoing instant change as the words. "I speak to you partly on behalf of Colonel Brooks. I would have spoken to you on my own behalf, because I can not live another day without it if I could. Under all the circumstances, I can not order you to leave. I wish I could. But, understand me perfectly, I intend keeping the closest watch upon you I possibly can. The instant you step out of your—your place, I will take necessary means to stop you. That is all. You must not understand that I do not in a certain sense—a certain sense—regret Mr. Arthur, with peculiar emphasis—" pity you." The visitor is evidently touched by the indescribable and total change in Dr. Peel's manner as he stands before him. "That is all. You are safe up to a certain point. Take care."

And the preacher has left the room as suddenly, yet as coolly too, as he entered it, leaving Dr. Peel, who has not even attempted to speak, wilted down behind him. Yes, wilted down is the word, whatever rallying of passions there may be afterward; as if some gorgeous palmtree were to have the life suddenly withdrawn from its tropic height and tropical foliage.

Whether this were the cause or not, there is no telling how long Dr. Peel may have continued, on the occasion of Bob Withers's mention of Mr. Arthur, to have cursed him; nor how jealously Bob, risen somewhat unsteadily to his feet to do so, might have wielded his eulogies in favor of Mr. Arthur, whom never since the war began has he failed to defend on every issue of any of attack, and the instances are very many of Mr. Arthur's being denounced in his presence: no telling, we say, how long the altercation may have proceeded, when a singular diversion therefrom occurs.

"Dr. Peel," says Alonzo Wright, whom all had supposed asleep, suddenly rising from his seat, pushing back his shackled hat, which his all along cornered his silent brooding not shortly boring, drawing his revolver, cocking it, pressing it against Dr. Peel's broad chest, with his finger on the trigger—"Dr. Peel, look here: I want to know, now and here, what do you mean?"

"Mean?" Dr. Peel is of a ghastly sollow as he eches the question, not daring to stir a hair's breadth; even Captain Simmons stops his maudlin chant, and, with Bob Withers, is silent with amazement as much at the sudden and quiet new tone of Mr. Wright as at his action.

"Mean? In reference to what?" Dr. Peel rather gasps than articulately asks the question, quailing under the deadly light in Mr. Wright's small, half-closed eyes, as well as at that cold peculiar voice.

"In reference to her," replies that individual. "Cut it short, I tell you, in reference to her." Dr. Peel's parched lips; but it indicates at least partial relief. "You forget that others are present, Mr. Wright. I will speak with you, and on that point with the greatest pleasure," he adds immediately.

"I decline. That is a fact. I had forgotten they were here with us. I was thinking. Come now;" and, slipping his revolver, after uncocking it, into its leather case at his side, Mr. Wright rises.

"With pleasure. In one moment, Sir. But one word, gentlemen," says Dr. Peel, pausing at the door. "You will oblige me, oblige both Mr. Wright and myself, by making no allusion whatever to this matter. I beg your pardon—I know your honor you will not mention it to any one, gentlemen," adds the speaker, still more anxiously, as some thought seems to pass across his mind at the instant. "Do I have it?" he asks, with eager look at each.

"Certainly," says Bob Withers, with a good-humored nod.

"Most assuredly you may rely upon my honor," adds Captain Simmons in his gentelest tones, with a reassuring wave of his left hand, and a bowing forward at all of what is going on. "Permit me to entreat you, however, not to abandon the flowing bowl, which inebriates, though, alas! under our depressing circumstances, it fails to cheer."

But the two are gone. Nor is there any record of their conversation thereafter. Only the colonel family servant testifies to having overheard Dr. Peel remark the next afternoon to Mr. Wright in the garden at the latter gentleman's house, a few moments before Anne comes in to give them, at her father's request, a little music. The gentleman had arrived from the city very late the night before. Pretty much all day they had spent in rolling out over the plantation in company. At dinner the servant, as well as Anne, had remarked that Mr. Wright, though pale and exhausted as he arrived, after an access, was in the highest, wildest spirits, peculiarly affectionate toward his daughter. Dr. Peel, on the other hand, arrived in attention even of the dullest of the servants waiting upon the table. At times he would join in the conversation, lead it in his fitfullest manner full of anecdote and laughter. Again his countenance would fall, he would cease to converse, seem to be buried in deepest thought, look drooping, drinking eagerly and frequently of the wine upon the table, and, after dinner, upon the side-board, as to obtain a supply of stimulation which had been suddenly cut off from within.

The very servants waiting upon the table and about the house thus and the ensuing day remarked notes in the kitchen even then, as well as months afterward, upon the singularity of Dr. Peel's manner toward their young mistress. Now addressing himself to her in his easy, bold, sparkling way as of old, although by an evident effort, as if he forced himself to do so against his natural choice. Then glancing at her again furtively, fearingly, with an indescribable mixture of admiration and apprehension, not without quick side looks as of deadliest terror at Mr. Wright himself, playing the host with all the ease of the manner of a household toward a favored and welcome guest.

But at two this which the old house-servant Alfred spoke of often after as having overheard Dr. Peel say to Mr. Wright, in evident pursuance of a previous conversation:

"You may rest confident, Sir, that it will not be by my fault. But I have little hope. I fear, dreadly fear you are mistaken."

"Stuff, nonsense, Doctor. I will take the chances on you any how," Alfred testifies to his master's having made reply just as Anne entered the room. "Faint heart, man, never won fair lady." And surely father had never cause to be prouder of or more affectionate toward a daughter than did Mr. Wright this afternoon. No wonder he so openly manifested that pride and affection.

You may have observed, Miss, or Madam—you, Sir, certainly have—how the ladies, especially the younger ones, suddenly and surprisingly bloom out upon our planet in the early spring. It may be some cunning alteration in their dress, doing with subtle skill for themselves, in the way of adornment, what Nature does when for the special butterfly and flower. Or it may be that nature, in clothing at that season the plains with verdure, the lower animals with freshness of skin and plumage, forgets not to give them a softer light to the eye, a sweeter note to the lip, a deeper bloom to the cheek, a gentler ripeness to the form in the case of woman, who is undoubtedly the dearest to her heart of all Divine Nature's numerous family. And it may be, the eye and the imagination are themselves quickened by the stirrings of spring in us men also to view things in a brighter light. Whatever be the reason therefor the fact is so.

And never woman that May morning seemed indeed it more than did Anne Wright. Clothed in a modest dress of some creamy hue, her fair hair in abundant curls about face and neck, her complexion of a softer glow, and her eyes of a deeper blue, she beams upon her father and upon his guest with a beauty surpassing any thing they had ever seen, or could have imagined in her. Her very motion and tone even are modulated to a livelier, at the same time gentler, melody. Who knows what pleasant presentiments connected with their visitor were not moving in her blood?

When left alone together in the parlor by Mr. Wright, who has to see for a moment to the first working of his corn, Dr. Peel does not know before a word is spoken that the eventful hour of their lives has arrived. It is the man not the woman who is ordinarily quiet and modest and pure as she is, the whole thing is with her so much a matter known and settled as to bring no surprise, hardly even any gentle shock with it. During the years now of Dr. Peel's visiting at her father's house, though he has made no formal proposal, he has felt himself perfectly well that he loves her, and that—she loves him.

But it is strange so bold a man as Dr. Peel, one so supremely self-confident, so independent in bearing heretofore, should seem as if smitten by an ague. His face has grown of an ashen yellow, contrasting with the jet black of his hair and beard. There is a furtiveness about these latter, a trembling about the large and heavy nose also, as it protrudes in its nobility, upon which Anne grounds her own quietness and composure. In fact, the two seem to have changed their relative ages, for there is something altogether indescribable in the bearing of Dr. Peel, to which even the words mean and timid would not be inapplicable. To any other than poor little Anne he would have the aspect rather of a condemned criminal than a wooing lover, or even of a successful lover. The simple fact is, strange as it may seem, Dr. Peel seeks to know his fate as Anne's hands to-day, only because he cannot help it or receive it in more serious shape still at the hands of her father.

"But I am anxious you should know—should not be deceived. In fact, if you knew all I know you would—I am convinced it would be useless for me to expect your favor."

It is Dr. Peel who says it, more nervous and miserable even than when, half an hour before, in conversation with Anne here, he had been only laughs, as composed as he is the reverse, laughs a joyous and confident laugh.

"I am a poor man, and I love the lover, and repeats it eagerly, as if it were a sudden and welcome thought—"a poor man, very poor man, indeed. You may have imagined me to be rich. I confess I have given you false impressions on that point. I am extravagant. Miss Anne is not at all able to support you as you should wish and naturally expect." And he looks at her with eager eyes.

Anne laughs more than ever. "You have told me that you love me," she says, as if she loved to repeat the information. "Was it very poor man, indeed. You may have imagined me to be rich. I confess I have given you false impressions on that point. I am extravagant. Miss Anne is not at all able to support you as you should wish and naturally expect." And he looks at her with eager eyes.

Anne laughs more than ever. "You have told me that you love me," she says, as if she loved to repeat the information. "Was it very poor man, indeed. You may have imagined me to be rich. I confess I have given you false impressions on that point. I am extravagant. Miss Anne is not at all able to support you as you should wish and naturally expect." And he looks at her with eager eyes.

Dr. Peel walks the room like a baffled man. Another thought strikes him. He suddenly seizes upon a gilded Bible lying upon the table, advances upon Anne as if to say something, then returns it in a hurry to the same spot, and again and continues to walk the room in evident distress of mind.

"Dr. Peel," says Anne, at last, a blush burning over neck and face, "I do not understand all this. If you do not really love me, do not say what—"

But Dr. Peel is at her feet before the words are out of her lips, in passionate accents avowing her of his affection, and there she is the cowering, fearful manner over it all, hardly venturing to look her in the eyes as she listens to the same assertions. "No, no, no, not that, not that, Miss Anne. I only was anxious to save you from—not to deceive you." he says, hurriedly. "You will see what proof I give of affection." And he goes to the table, gets the Bible, and places himself beside her in a more solemn manner. "What you may not blame me I am about to put my life in your hands. Will you swear never to reveal to any one what I tell you?"

Anne laughs, wonders a little, gazes upon the anxious face of her lover, lays her little hand upon the book, curiously covering uppermost. "Why, what in the world," she begins.

"What I tell you will shock you terribly. If it were known to your father he would kill me instantly, here in this room."

Anne gazes upon the agitated man with blue eyes widening with wonder, curiosity, and deeper affection for this splendid suppliant. "It will not bind me a bit more than I would have been," she says, at last. "Yes, to please you, I'll swear; and I do wish you and pa would let me do all the swearing." And she lifts the book to her lips.

"Not even to your father?" says Dr. Peel.

"Not to a living soul. Why, what on earth?"

"Miss Anne," says Dr. Peel, in most impressive manner and with lower tones, "you and your father have been greatly mistaken in me. I am—am no Secessionist at all; I am a—a—Union man."

Anne sits looking at him with wonder, taking full note of his, to her, handsome face and form; it is as if some sweetness kindled at her feet. "A Union man! Why, Dr. Peel, who would have thought of it?" troubled, wondering, bewildered by the whole matter.

"I knew you would reject me when you knew it. And I swear to you it is so," continues Dr. Peel, wonderfully calm, with painful impress.

"A Union man? Why, who in the world! Yes, yes," Anne adds, rapidly, half in earnest. "It's a pity you're not a great pity. Pa said I thought you the very best Southern man we ever knew. But then I'll give you pa's newspapers to read. Besides, I could convert you myself. I will tell you all how they treated us, about—you won't it about Kansas or Nebraska? one or the other; and how they wanted to free our negroes, and what women's rights people they are, and all their revolutionary ideas, and the way they have marched their soldiers over our country burning and plundering. Oh, ever so much! I can certain it will convert you—you—loving with beautiful confidence—"positively certain!"

"Never, Miss Anne. Not even you. I always knew how it was. Will you be—one for ever and ever," says Dr. Peel, very slowly, and Anne sits wondering and troubled, while her lover watches her with eager eyes.

"Ha! I never thought of it. Dr. Warner there in Somerville, Mr. Ferguson, Mr. Brooks; there is Mr. Hill, who is never to marry in Somerville are Union people, they say," breaks in Anne, at last, "and they are not such despicable people, I suppose. Besides," and the artless girl puts her fair curls from her glowing cheeks, and laughs with delight, "there is Mrs. Wood, and I'll be the most in the world. Alice Bowles, I know she is Union; she told me so herself; or, at least, she wouldn't say she wasn't, couldn't quite, for she is when she was here last week. Yes," added Anne, eagerly, and with a tone, "and Alonzo's mother, too, is a good Secessionist; and I needn't be Union, must I? Please not. I never thought of that. Yes," she adds, with a little pout of a child, "and then the war is over. Pa himself says we are whipped. Very soon there won't be such names as Union and Secessionists at all, will there?" And the difficulty has passed as entirely away beneath her artless affection as a cloud before a gentle wind. "If you only say you really and truly love me," she adds, with archness and joy.

"Love you? I love you as the flowers do the light. I adore you as you adore God," breaks out Dr. Peel, with feverish energy, but with the cowering eye and trembling and apprehension of manner as before. And again the baffled lover walks the room, Bible in hand, in deepest, most painful thought, while Anne wonders and —loves.

"Miss Anne," says Dr. Peel, "I have not told you all yet. Remember your oath," and he holds up the Bible in his hand. "My life is in your hands. Will you swear one thing I will tell you. If your father but guessed it, had the faintest suspicion of it, he would shoot me down as sure as you are sitting there. Had I better not tell you? You will reject me with horror."

Anne looks at him with blue eyes opening again with wonder. But love is fast rallying all other sentiments in her heart, for it is master of all else in her nature, to its support. Here is this man, whom yesterday she loved yet so fearfed, the grandest and most powerful of all men she ever knew, at her feet, but just as in the most confident in her, will hide nothing from her, places even his life in her hands.

"I love you, and you need not fear me." She wonders and laughs—"Why, what on earth?"

"Miss Anne," says Dr. Peel, coming near her and speaking in fervent tones, "I am an altogether different man from what your father and yourself have supposed me to be—totally different in every respect. I am not an officer in the service of the Confederacy. I am, really and truly, an agent, have been from the opening of the war an agent, an active secret agent of—the Federal Government. I am one this moment. I intend to be one as long as the Government wants me. There! All! Ask is that you only reject me, not tell your father or any one else what I say and do." And Dr. Peel, with sobers face and cowering eyes as before, watches her lips as if for his destiny.

Poor Anne! The matter is altogether too much for such lovely curls, and blue eyes, and rosette complexion, and lithe, childish form. She is bewildered, stunned; puts her hand wearily over her brow, tries to think. Love besirits itself in her bosom, summons all the sentiments of her nature to its aid. Romance! Anne has long dreamed of a hero of romance as her true knight; if ever woman had such a lover she now has. He is a hero in a glory and grandeur, too, these latter days, in the very name of the Federal Government; it is something very much to be interested, but very powerful and magnificent; and all this vague grandeur now falls like a mantle around her lover. Pity, too. Yes, if my father knew it he would lay him dead on that floor. One little whisper to her father, and—she knows him well—there are the rapid crecks of a revolver, and the stately Prince of hers lies his length on that parlor floor a dead man in his blood. Her lover is in her power, and the delicately placed himself there—such his confidence in her. Besides, it strikes her with wonderful force: what a brave man! To think of his spending years in Somerville, being here now with a sword suspended over his head—why, it is the very chivalry of romance! Love him? She never so dreamed of loving him. She loves him the more she thinks. Rejection? Reject him now she knows all this? It would be like rejecting the whole universe!

"Dr. Peel," she says at last, lifting up her eyes like those of a little child to his face, "did you say that you loved me, loved me really and truly?"

With singular contrariety between cowering eyes and impassioned words, Dr. Peel renews his protestations vehemently.

"I will marry you," she says, quietly and simply; placing, as she says it, her little hand in his.

The strong man is convulsed with emotions beyond his control. He grasps the little, soft hand, and kisses it. He grasps and crosses half aloud. He actually weeps. Anne notices the beads of perspiration start upon his brow. He lifts her hand to his lips, and covers it again before touching it with them. And although his agony it is with covering eyes. Anne is astonished. There rises against her love a great amazement, which, like a billow, threatens to overtop and drown it.

She follows him with alarmed as well as wondering eyes while he, again risen from her side, paces the floor in agonies of thought. The tears actually trickle unnoticed by him down his cheeks; he grinds his teeth, and curses under breath.

"Miss Anne," says he, at last, "I have not told you all even yet. The worst is to come, intimately the worst. Do you think you could love me, be my wife, cleave to me whoever and whatever I am?"—but the emphasis he puts into the words can be written. "I want a answer yes. Think. Imagine of me the worst possible thing that your imagination can frame—be very merciless in your worst. Say, now. Stop! Do not be in a hurry. Think. And the man ventures to look straight at her, with the look, ghastly and dreadful, of a criminal convicted of the foulest of crimes.

"Dr. Peel, I am an innocent country girl," says Anne, at last, even plaintively. "I have had no mother to guide me since I was a little child. All you have told me this morning has astonished and shocked me. I am so bewildered I can hardly think at all. But one thing I know. You have told me a thousand times this afternoon that you love me with all your heart. I can not understand what you mean by what you now say. But I know that I love you, and will marry you. Is not that enough?" asks Anne, like a little child. "Though what in the world you mean—"

"Halloo, man! did ever a fellow need more than that?" It is Mr. Wright, who breaks in upon them, the opening door unperceived by either in their excitement. "Why, Peel, you look more as if you had seen a ghost. You little rogue, Anne, I didn't think to receive cow and terrify a man so, you little Tartar! Yes, I heard her, Doctor. All right! Give me before you go, Peel, a glass of wine. Peel, I have taken a fancy to you! I knew it was all right what you insisted about Anne's having you. As was because you had not asked her—and no one would ever have suspected you of holding back!" And Mr. Wright rattles on in the highest spirits.

Before night Dr. Peel, after an interview with Anne, has agreed with Mr. Wright that the marriage is to take place almost immediately—for pressing reasons. "Meanwhile we will keep it all, of course, a profound secret. And I must leave the day of the wedding with Miss—Miss Anne: most pressing and important business," his lover says.

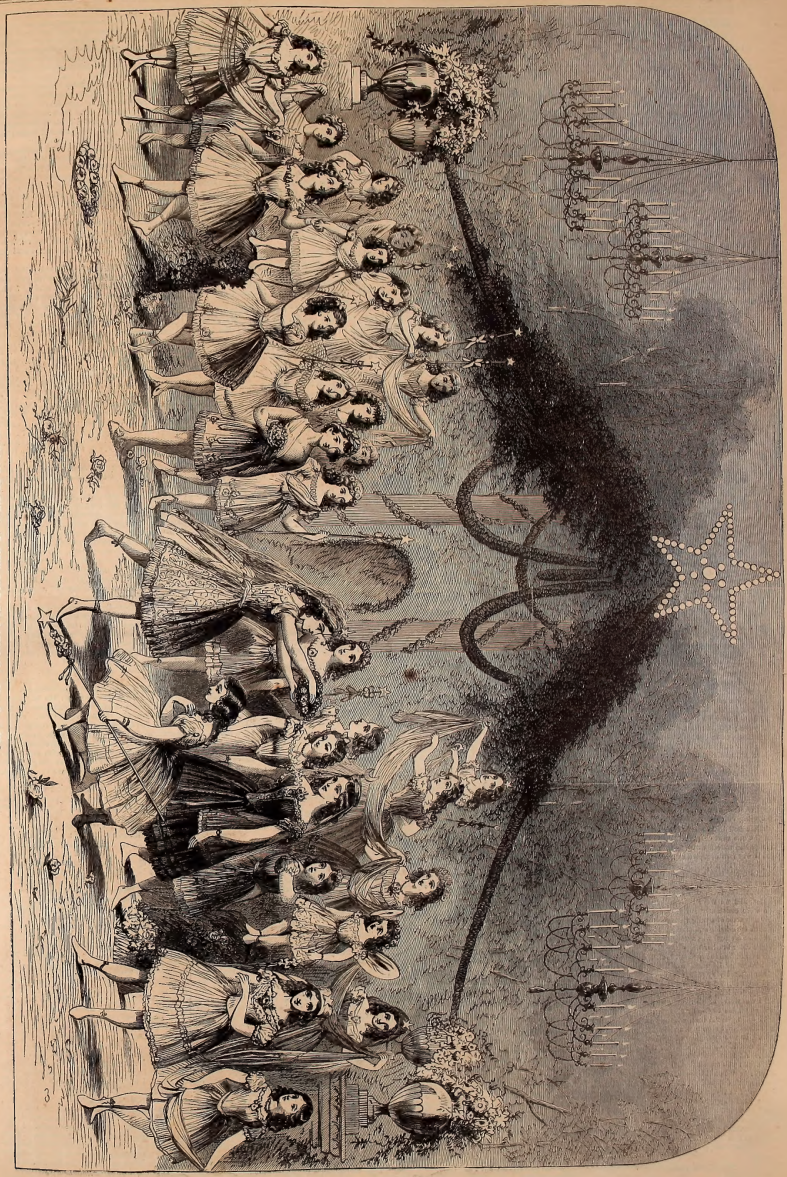
Dr. Peel may be a happy man, but he seems to be singularly cold and hard—with always the cowering eyes.

AT SEA.

FAR away, the flowers are growing,
And the sweet June breezes blowing,
Rich warm light on hay-fields glowing,
Sleepy cattle, lowe-ing soune;
By the leafy hedgerows lowing,
Lights and shadows waver o'er,
Lovingly, the lovely shore,
Far, far away.

Here the winds are round us sighing,
And the desert waves replying,
And the sea-bird skimming, flying
Round our ship, her rough track plying,
Day and night with tireless toil,
Round our course—for evermore
Passing from the lovely shore,
Far, far away.

Far away dear hearts are sending
Thoughts of love, all space transcending;
Dear and honored knees are bending,
Voices sweet for us ascending,
Many a note of blessing blending—
Mighty blessings—Heaven over,
Guard us to that other shore,
Far, far away.



Moonlight on the waters sleeping!
Sun, in golden glory steeping!
Stars, your watch above us keeping!
Waves about us rolling, leaping!
Winds those liquid mountains heaping,
Light us, roll us, bear us on
To that other unknown shore,
Far, far away.

BARS IN THE LANE.

BY GEORGE COOPER.

AFTER the milking was over
Annie would follow the cows
Half a mile, down to the clover,
And turn them in to browse.

Neat little figure is Annie,
Handling the bars in the lane,
Letting down over so many
Just in the sunlight's wane.

Wild-roses blooming beside her
Match not her cheeks' lovely red;
And the leaves, trying to hide her,
Dance at her musical tread.

Witching curls peep from her bonnet—
Peep like bright birds from their nest!
And her heart—oh to have won it!—
Beats with a gentle unrest.

Lips may be humming a ditty,
And faces may show unconcern;
But secrets there are—what a pity
That some are so coy to learn!

Now while the robins are nesting,
Why does she wait in the lane?
Though, if white arms need a resting,
No one, of course, could complain.

Lights in the farm-house are gleaming,
And bars must be laid in their place:
But little Annie stands dreaming
A blush on her beautiful face.

Is it late? Not that she cares now;
Ah! merry eyes, mild and brown,
Could you not tell why she wears now
Just the least mite of a frown?

Over the path by the hill-side
Some one would wander by night;
Some one who came from the mill-side,
Lured by two eyes that are bright.

Meadow and valley grow stiller
Under the earlier stars;
Would it be strange if the miller
Help Annie to put up the bars?

FLINT AND STEEL.

LOOKING at me now you can hardly realize what a gay, wild, reckless girl I was in my teens, when I was Stella Martin, instead of "Grandma Flint." I was an only child, and my parents made an idol of me. They never shrewd itself (the mother's pity) in letting me have my own way in every thing. Short of my running into fire or water, I do not think I was ever restrained in, and unless it might have been the moon or stars, there was nothing I cried for that I did not have. When I went to school I met with resistance and discipline for the first time, but my gay temper, pretty looks, and coaxing ways made me a favorite with teachers and scholars, and I soon had my own way almost as much as ever.

When I was fourteen I declared myself tired of our quiet village life, and persuaded my parents to let the farm and remove to a large town, where I went to a fashionable school and made new and gay friends. I enjoyed myself thoroughly for nearly four years; then I met a power that no prayers or persuasion, or tears or passion of mine could move. The power of Death. It had never come near me before, but now it snatched away my dear, gentle, indulgent mother. My grief was so unreasonable and violent that my health became affected. I hated the town and its gayeties, and father gladly took me home to our quiet red farm-house on the hill, surrounded by its well-known corn-fields and pastures, and overlooking the winding river and straggling village.

There had been many changes in our absence, but the one that concerned me most was, that the Greens had carried away from the farm next ours, and it was now occupied by a family of orphan girls, all younger than I, and under the care of a brother much older. Percy Flint, the elder girl, came to see me and we became fast friends, for she was a tender, loving, little thing, always glad to be guided, and we were both mourning our mothers. We were constantly together, for our homes were only a mile and a half apart, and the path through father's corn-fields and along the lonesome lane to the Flint orchard was a very pleasant walk.

The elder brother was away nearly all day, but Prissy had a great deal to say about him, and I soon learned that "brother Edmund" was the light and the law of her life. Every plan, every enjoyment, every wish had been formed by or must be referred to him. She quoted him, praised him, and referred to him till I had a weary of his name and wished that there was so unable to do any thing without his knowledge and approval that, with my hatred of control and dictation, I soon took a violent prejudice against him. It was strengthened by hearing his praises sung and his opinions deferred to by every one I met. At meals—besides the girls' and old man—I "Haven't you seen Edmund Flint yet?" "What a pity!" "You'll be sure to admire him." "I'm sure you needn't expect he'll admire you; he's as cold as ice." "Even you can't break his heart, Stella." "He hasn't any to break," said another. "Oh yes he has, but Stella isn't the kind for him. She isn't good nor steady enough."

"She won't dare to carry on in the singing seats when he gets home," said Sally Bowers.

"And why not, pray?" I retorted, losing patience at last.

"Well, you try and you'll find out—that's all," was the reply.

"Oh, don't," implored little Polly Colby—"Edmund Flint's as good as the minister. He makes us all behave."

"I shall not be afraid of him. I shall do just as I please."

"He won't let you go with Prissy then."

"One would think he was a king, by the way you all talk," I returned, scornfully. "I shall not bow down to him, you will see. And now do let's talk of something else."

As usual, my will prevailed. I had always been the queen and leader before I went away, and now, with my town dresses and manners, I had easily resumed my sway. Sally and Polly's summer passed away; I had recovered my old health and spirits; Prissy and I were more intimate than ever, and her brother was still absent. On Sunday morning I waited for her to call for me as usual on her way to church; waited till it was late, then hurried on alone, my aching head and misery, found by Prissy in her place in the choir, and the "long prayer" begun. I was very irreverent then, and began to question her as soon as she had closed, and point out her finger imploringly on her lips. Not a word would she speak till the prayer was over, and then only a hurried whisper.

"Don't, Stella, please; brother's here, and he never likes me to talk in church time."

I threw back my head scornfully, and caught a glimpse of a tall figure and a grave, brown face in the tenor row. I was careful not to look that way again. He should see that I, at least, took no interest in him, the conceited tyrant; but I couldn't help listening for his voice with great curiosity when the singing began. Will my head have to find fault I could only admire its perfect sweetness and wonderful flexibility and compass. It was only irritated me the more, and determined to plague him. If I couldn't make Prissy talk I would make her laugh, and as soon as the service was fairly under way I began to draw caricatures in my hymn-book and show them to her. I was very clever with my pencil, and soon had the poor girl in an agony of suppressed laughter, and could hear her brother moving uneasily.

I rejoiced, but not long, for a hand was placed on her shoulder, and a stern, handsome face bent down between us, whispered a few words that changed her laughter to frightened tears. Not another look would she give at my sketches. I was not to be so easily put down, and soon had a new one passing around among the more reckless members of the choir. Presently Dick Price, the minister's son, a wild scamp of a boy, leaned over and said,

"Let's see the fun, Stella," and some one handed the book toward him. Hardly had he grasped it, when I heard that new voice, quick, low, and decided.

"Give it to me, Dick: are you not ashamed of yourself? If you have no reverence for God's house, you might, at least, have some gift at ence—but I did not love him well enough to bear with his stern temper, and so we had best part. I saw that he was in earnest; that his sincerely professed my happiness to his own, and was resolute; though his face was pale with pain as he refused my caresses and cravings. Oh, how little and poor and mean and unlovely I felt—how senseless my past selfishness!

In that moment a new and great love filled my heart: I felt a thrill of assurance that to be guided by him would make me happier than to rule a world. That under the sway of his firm and noble will I should be more by high principle and wise judgment, I should be more content than if left to my own caprices.

At last I made him understand this, and then we were blessed indeed; and through the forty years of our married life there was never again more than a momentary cloud between us. Had he been a man of a mean or tyrannical spirit, he would have taken advantage of my penitence; but he proved so noble, so just, and just that it became my pride and joy to acknowledge his authority.

When dad called him from me twenty years ago, when the brave, clear voice was only a fluttering whisper, and his once strong arm could not lift my weary hand that lay so light in mine, he told me:

"Stella, you have been the great joy of my life; if I could live it over I would alter nothing in you. I would only try to serve God better and love you more." And then God's gates were opened for him and I was left desolate, only praying that I might follow soon; but the Lord willed that I should live on, long and lonely, to see all those whom my friends most strength and usefulness and sight, but not past memory. That gives me still my youth, my husband, and all those happy years.

CHAPTER VI.

THE Reis went by the next day's mail. It was such a fine, bright afternoon, in spite of the March wind that went roaming about, peering after squirrel-cups, and elder flowers, and I know not what, that every body was out. Mr. May drove off soon after dinner to Hiccory Corner, the nearest village, saying nothing, like a wise man, of what he might find at the freight-station. Mrs. May was away on some good errand among her poor neighbors; and the children were clustered in the work-shop, waiting.

I'm afraid that people who are fond of yellow satin and such light trifles would not have admired this old work-shop: but children thought it perfectly charming. It was but a room in the carriage-house, with two extremely cheerful and dusty windows, where a generous colony of spiders had spun their threads and woven their tapestry unmolested, doing out amusing parties, with but short imprisonment nor even the form of a trial, to all such wasps, gnats, and blue-bottle flies as came in their way.

In the middle of the room stood a long workbench: and the sides of the room, and every corner and window-ledge, were full of tools. Tool-chests stood on the floor, boxes of nails and screws, old pieces of iron, old hinges, lay in the window. Here hung up a saw and being rested a while with twenty other things of which the children knew not even the name. At present their whole attention was fixed upon the—possessory mark of the big gimlet, wicking their eyes at every blow of his great hammer—so they stood in a trance of pleasure.

Sam was working away at a small box with a sloping roof, or rather with ends prepared for a sloping roof; and two other such boxes stood on the work-bench, a saw lying rested in with neat, close-fitting pases of glass.

"I don't see what the glass is for, after all," said Lily.

"Don't you?" said Sam. "Suppose we should break out all the glass in our windows some cold night, what then?

"Oh, to be sure! the glass keeps the heat in. But then the heat is got in, Sam? you can't make a fire in this little place."

"This little place would burn up pretty quick if I did," said Sam, with a wise look over his spectacles, Lily, from the sun. And it gets in better and quicker when the glass is sloped in this way toward the sun that if it were set up straight as it is in our windows."

"I wish I understood why," said Clover.

"Papa'll tell you some day, or I will," said Sam, hammering away. "I haven't time just now."

"Here's papa this minute," said little Primrose. "Why, he said he'd be busy, going to one of the dusty windows. "He's left the wagon, and is coming over here with a big package in his hands."

Sam looked up for a moment and said, "Ah!" with an expression which proved that he understood the package thoroughly; and then began to whistle "Yankee Doodle," and to use his hammer with great energy all at once.

"Sam likes something," said Primrose, with a laugh. "He always does when he whistles that."

Sam likes many things—Primrose among the rest," said her brother, stooping down to kiss her. "But here's papa."

And Mr. May entered, bearing the great package. Such a package! with long, white handles sticking out atop, and sharp, black points and corners piercing the brown wrapping paper below: the whole tied up and bound together with "forty strings," Lily said, as if on purpose to keep curiosity at a respectful distance. The children clustered round, asking at least a question for every string; Sam stopped his whistling, indeed, out of respect to his father's presence, but there was the fullest smile of pleasure on his face as he laid down his hammer and stood still to watch the proceedings; and as for Mr. May himself, he was clearly as eager as the children, but he would not answer a single question. There he stood, untying some strings, cutting others with his knife, laughing at the children, giving their checks a pat on a kiss, as the case might be, but still at work on the package.

Such a package! I must say again. It was utterly bewildering and mysterious. And, like an Arabian Night's story, the unfolding took another just as great, the large package presently resolved itself (when the fortieth string was cut) into three packages—each one wrapped up in brown paper, tied round with numberless strings, out of which peeped white handles and black corners, just as before.

"There," said Mr. May, with great satisfaction, taking the last string carefully off and measuring the respective length of the white handles, "the tallest one is for Clover, and the next for Lily; and this smallest one must be for Primrose! In fact, it looks just like her!"

"Papa!" said Clover, doubtfully, as she took the package.

"I know! I know!" exclaimed Lily, tearing off the brown paper which shielded hers. "It's our tools! our garden tools! Oh, papa, how good you are! Oh, whatever shall I do with these strings! What is the use of tying things up so! Oh, Sam, don't be too old and grown up to care for a ribbon!"

And Lily tugged at the strings, and pulled, and tore the paper off, leaving the strings yet on; and finally caught the tool out by the head, and looked at the fastenings with that in an alarming way.

"Here, here!" said her brother. "If that is to be the style of Primrose's gift, you may as well help and a better tool." And Sam took out his knife, and quickly cut the cords, one after the other.

Clover, meanwhile, was patiently untying her knots, one by one. She had hardly spoken, but was looking at all: the two pink spots in her cheeks grew very deep as she wrought with the hard, unyielding bits of twine, her fingers trembling with eagerness, though they went on as steadily.

Little Primrose, on her part, was another picture. After one prolonged look at her package, as if to find out whether it contained her expected doll-baby and golden hair and little white ruffle, she stood at a sort of "parade rest;" the package "grounded," her hands clasped behind her back, and her face a whole attention given to Clover's knots and Lily's fingers; her eyes dancing as each fastening gave way, and her head nodding with each cut. Mr. May stood, and the bright little steel tools, with their neat white handles, came full into view, Primrose gave one long "Ah!" of intense delight, and then, as the only other thing she could say, turned round to her father and held her little mouth for a kiss.

"Why, Primrose, are you like them?" said Mr. May, laughing and holding her fast, package and all.

"Well, young ones, be busy now," said he, setting her down, in a silent embrace from Clover, and a rather vociferous one from Lily, Mr. May departed.

"Well, you two," said Lily, "you just hold up and tell us all about these things. Oh dear! I never was so happy in all my life!"

And Clover and Primrose down on the work-bench drew Primrose into his arms.

"Does not this little one want to see her tools?" he said.

"Oh yes!" said Primrose. "But my fingers aren't strong enough."

"Let me help," said Sam. "There, you sit up here by me on the bench, and we'll untie all these knots, and talk to Clover and Lily at the same time. What do you want to know about them first?"

"This, I suppose," said Lily, displaying one of her tools, "is a spade."

"Right the first time. See what a beauty of a little one papa has got for Primrose! with a we, wee handle just big enough for her little fingers. It's pretty!"

There could be no doubt about that, from the way the little fingers took hold of it.

"But I think papa is not going to dig the ground for us, Sam?" said Lily.

"So I hope to do the first time. But then there may be light digging to do afterward, and transplanting, and all that."

"And we want to learn how, any way," said Clover.

"Well, what's this?" said Lily. "Oh dear! there comes Jack. Now we'll have a bother."

"This?" said Jack, unceremoniously setting it from Lily's hand, "that's a fine tool, I declare! This, young ladies, is called a rake; and it is to rake the ground and make your flower beds into long strips, to make them look fringy. It adds very much to the striking effect of a flower-garden. So says Sam, with a trowel."

"And trowels are used for digging up stones, and carrying them to the gravel-walk or the grass," said Jack.

"They're for transplanting," said Sam, smiling, "for taking up plants, and moving them to fitting flower-pots, and for smoothing the ground where you want to sow seeds."

"And this," said Jack, taking up another tool, "is commonly called Neptune's trident, which you perceive it resembles. In the sea, as used by its original owner, it was excellent for spearing fish; but by the strange mutation of mortal things it is now used in gardens, to spear caterpillars, grubs, and earth-worms. This is one of Prim's, you see."

"Indeed some won't be used for any such thing," said Prim, indignantly. "Spear caterpillars, truly! I don't mean to have one in all my garden."

"Oh! don't you?" said Jack. "That alters the question."

"It's a weeding-fork, Prim," said her oldest brother; "and weeds, I'm afraid, you will have plenty of them to use it on. They grow like fun, and it loosens the earth, and the weeds can be pulled right up by the roots."

"How nice!" said Lily. "Only I don't mean to have any weeds. Oh, I'm so happy! Come, let's go and show all to mamma."

"But just wait till I gather up my strings," said Clover.

"Leave 'em here," said Lily, "you don't want 'em."

"They may be useful," said Clover, soberly.

"Ha! ha! ha!" said Jack, turning a somersault in one corner of the work-shop. "Such model gardeners! One will be eaten by caterpillars, and t'other will have no weeds; and the other—I don't know. I'll keep watch about Clover's. She's an old-fashioned as a gray rock, and about as steady.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Some ten years ago, at the Commencement exercises of a New England female college, the theme was ready, entitled "A Visit to the Moon." In this theme was a description of a balloon ascension among the Laxonians; and we remember being struck by one fact that was stated, namely, that the Laxonians had no small children—having reached a point of perfection that even Delsmsize might envy—dispensed entirely with nurses. In place of them were large, fine, steam-engines, conveniently fitted up, running around the dining-table on circular tracks, and distributing every imaginable delicacy to the guests. We believe, also, that there was some contrivance for conveying the victuals to the mouth of the infant. We give publicity to these statements, in the hope that some enterprising person may hasten to make his fortune by appropriating their invention. We have no claim to the patent right. And in these days of "dying ships" nothing should be considered impossible.

There are machines for every thing nowadays. Sewing, knitting, washing, reading, boring machines (pray how on gas so be called?), and so on ad infinitum. It may be mentioned, however, that as yet no eating-and-drinking machine has been invented, and there is a chance for somebody! The day may not be far distant when authors and editors, sitting down to their tables, each with a steam cook, and the machinery ageing, lean back, close their eyes for a moment's repose, and, on want to feel a thrilling novel or a learned editorial all ready for the press!

Speaking of machines reminds us of a little note recently found among a package of love papers in the pocket of a New York lawyer. It is without date or signature:

"DEAR BROTHER,—The curious to learn how you make the new washing machine go. You said you were tied in knots at the prize in a week or so. Can you work whatever you want to? from a shirt to a pair of lace curtains? And can you tell me anywhere where the sale run a grabbing to catch all the buttons? I imagine you genuinely happy. Does the machine work by steam? Do you have to slowly turning the crank, you cool carelessly wash a baby? I suppose after you get home to-day, so you get to bed without your bootees, you step on the way to the kitchen and do the whole washing in a minute. And after a little more practice, I imagine, my versatile brainer, you'll do all the washing with one hand, while you polish your boots with the other.

"Now, brother, you know I envy you. If, do you see it yourself all alone? Or sometimes let family try it, while you stand and look on? Or don't? Does the machine labor your hands? Do the rollers get rusty and squeak? Is there any thing what it's cooked up to be? And if it's actually, does it look? If it still holds its own in your mind. Why, then I will be glad as right! Why should a human-cuts be found when the machine never will stop? Excuse me, brother, if you please, for the ignorance of knowing: Do you keep such washing-machine still, or do you keep it kicking?"

A NEW proposition to the condition of some of the city railroad cars would be out of the province of the Board of Health. Many of them are kept in a state of filthiness quite intolerable. The old, nasty carpets, which have served the public for years and years, should be removed, and clean cane-bottomed seats be substituted.

A large milk establishment in Boston was recently examined by the authorities of that city. Four large casks, weighing probably two thousand five hundred pounds, were discovered, and they investigated the contents of one of them. It was filled with water, and the milk was taking a sample for experiment, they found that mixing it with water gave a very good imitation of milk.

A new method of teaching boarding-school young ladies has been recently adopted at a seminary in Indianapolis. The other day the principal learned that some of the pupils had packages of letters from young gentlemen in the city—tender epistles. Exasperated beyond endurance at the impudence of the boys, she read up before the entire school and read the letters in full, with the names of the writers. She is now living in the attics.

Professor Agassiz has been presented with a large and beautiful collection of fishes by the Emperor of Brazil. A pleasant memento of the days he spent with the gift.

Small as ladies' bonnets are nowadays the newspapers can't let them alone. One says:

"A lady in a bonnet store went to a friend in the city to purchase for her a new spring bonnet. She desired the crown to measure just five inches—just enough to cover her eyelids—and a red ribbon."

Another announces:

"A new bonnet is out—a common white handkerchief is passed over the top of the head and tied under the throat, with a wreath of roses in the shape of a horseshoe on the top."

Still another:

"A new style of bonnet has turned up at Richmond, Indiana. It is described as 'consisting of two straws, tied together with a blue ribbon on the top of the head, and the straws suspended at each of the four ends of the straws. Price, nineteen dollars."

A Dutchman was recently called upon to testify in court as a witness, exhibited a singular confusion as to his own identity. "Now, my friend," said the judge, "what is your name?" he replied, "Vell, I calls mineself Fred, but maybe so—I don't know—it is Yawcop. You see, chudge, I remember the last vone I vas, they—one of them vos me and one vas my brodder, or one was my brodder and t'other vas me, and I remember vell enough that I was glad to see my brodder vas young, or my brodder was chust as old as me, and I don't know which, and mine moddher she don't; and one of us named Fred and t'other Yawcop, or one named Yawcop and t'other Fred—I don't know which; and I don't know as my brodder—moddher she never could tell whether it was me or mine brodder what got died; so, chudge, I don't know whether I am Fred or Yawcop, and mine moddher she don't know."

Those who have hitherto failed in making for themselves a place in the "Temple of Fame" may find consolation a bit which we cut from an exchange:

"A gentleman in Scotland has preserved an old pair of boots, the property of Alexander Selkirk, remaining the following announcement:

"'Notice to Correspondents.—T. C.—The lines commencing "On Linden, when the sun was low," are not up to our standard. Poetry is evidently not T. C.'s forte.'"

These two little gems of thought are full of truth and beauty:

"The last, best fruit which comes to late perfection, even in the kindliest soil, is tenderness toward the hard, forbearance toward the unforbearing, warmth of heart toward the cold, philanthropy toward the misanthropic."

"Christian graces are like perfumes—the more they are pressed the sweeter they smell; like stars, they shine high best in the dark; like trees, the more they are shaken the deeper root they take, and the more fruit they bear."

It is stated in the Paris journals that on the recent journey of the royal family to Auxerre the Empress was attired in the "most simple style." Her dress is described as of rich black gros silk, with an immensely large train, which was covered with small jet stars; a tiny zar-gadelet, likewise studded with jet, and trimmed with guipure, and a white crêpe-tulle bonnet of the Lamballe form, fringed with jet, and ornamented with Bayeux lace ribbon strings, was Her Majesty's traveling costume. An anecdote is still relating to this Auxerre journey which shows how observant the Empress is, and how gracefully her remarks are responded to. Among the notabilities who came to welcome Her Imperial Majesty, M. Camille Doucet was conspicuous in his dress as counselor-general, having been gazetted only a few days before to the office. Perceiving this, the Empress soon singled him out, exclaiming, "You are very soon changed, you have a different dress to-day." M. Doucet replied: "Yes, Madame, I do change my costumes very frequently, but my sentiments never."

Among the new materials for summer dresses are the piqués, which are woven the same so as to look as though they were coarsely ribbed, and they are generally covered with a pattern. The patterns imitate braided arabesque guipure; there are also flowers and horseshoes, and several other designs, generally on white ground. Percales are very popular for demi-toilette, and the newest patterns for this material are stripes of a dark color and large dahlias or cameo, or stars in the stripes; the ground of the dress is either white or of a pale color.

As a change, there is a new material called the Sultane. It is made of very fine wool, with satin stripes, and is something like the old-fashioned barège. It is very pretty in light color, such as the new blue, pink, mauve, or gray. Besides it is not expensive, and many pretty promenade toilets are made of it, trimmed with ribbon of the same color as the Sultane itself.

It is not such a difficult matter to be well dressed in summer without spending a great deal of money, as most persons try to do. It is an error. Freshness is the great merit of a summer toilet.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHY was NOAH'S ark like a smoke-house?—Because it had a hold in it.

VERBUM SEPIENTI.—"Taking a Sight."

DRAWING THE LONG BOW.—We have just been informed, by one competent to know, that one of the most lucrative professions is that of a bass-fiddler. We can only believe it is much more so than that of Footster, but that is a matter of opinion, perhaps. Any one who is willing to call to see, and suggests the remark that such a note must come out of the measure so well known as a Fiske Jess, can.

"A lot of copper ore in pigs!" said Mrs. Partington, as her eye caught the account of some mining operations. "I don't wonder they have the scrofula and every thing else that is bad. I believe that if nothing but verdigrease, for copper is very deleterious."

BOARDING-SCHOOL GIRL'S LAMENT.

Parchase I ask me down to eat,
With Harper's table, which I hate,
Impatient that the milk be hot,
And grieve to find bread a path!
My worse was me 'tis vein to tell
When even salt becomes a sea!

A cabbage head
My money is disguised in mold;
For water I must swollen pay,
The town I find dishes up in viello!
I grumble at the beef I take
Like old John Rogers at his stake.

A word to you, my reader friends,
I'm forced to brief it ever more,
No language but the French can lend
An old schoolmistress to the school:
The truest word of all their woes
Is, oh! pity me the miss.

"What is the future state?" said a clergyman to a sprightly little girl. "Illinois, Sir?" "No, no," said the clergyman, "I mean what will become of us when we are dead, women?" "Why," replied she, after some hesitation, "I suppose they are to be married."

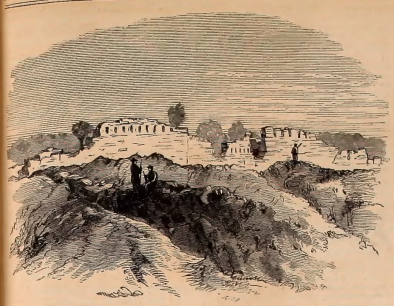
FENIAN RAID INTO CANADA—SKIRMISH ON THE 2d OF JUNE, BETWEEN THE BRITISH AND THE FENIANS.—[SKETCHED BY J. P. HOFFMAN.]

THE FENIAN RAID.

We give on this page and on page 397 illustrations of the Fenian invasion of Canada. Waterloo is just a little way from Fort Erie. The following extract from the Army and Navy Journal gives a very good account of the raid:

On Thursday, May 31, a considerable number of Fenians had quietly gathered into Buffalo, calling themselves Lancers, bound for California. At about half past two next morning they had collected at Black Rock, some three miles north of Buffalo, and here they at once crossed the Niagara River by the aid of two tugs and two canal-boats. They landed safely, under the green flag, and at once took possession of the ruins of old Fort Erie, which is the place where the lake narrows to the river. Their force was somewhere from one to 1500. Their military organization consisted of four regiments, the Thirteenth, the Tennessee, the Seventeenth, and Kentucky, the Eighteenth, of Ohio, and the Seventh, of Buffalo, besides an Indiana detachment. All these had colonels, and the whole were under Col. O'NEILL, formerly known as having enlisted a regiment for the rebels of such of our soldiers in the horrible den at Andersonville as preferred death to dishonor to death.

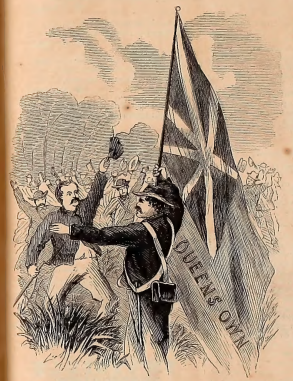


This crossing had been successfully concealed from the United States authorities, and in embarking in the Fenian boats the men received arms and ammunition, but no commissariat seems to have been organized. They at once cut the telegraph wires leading into Canada, tore up the track of the railroad near them, and advanced eastward along the lake shore toward Fort Colborne, at the mouth of the Welland Canal.

The first Canadian force to come into actual conflict with the Fort Erie Fenians was a body of about 1400 Volunteers, under Colonel BOSWORTH CHANAN, which had landed at Fort Colborne, while another force, under Colonel PEACOCK, was advancing upon the Fenian rear, up the Niagara River, via Chippewa. Bosworth's troops met O'NEILL and his Fenians about 8 A.M. on the morning of Saturday, June 2. O'NEILL was advancing westward, and now took post at Limestone Ridge, somewhat less than half-way from Fort Erie to Fort Colborne. Then was a sort of battle, in which —though there are various reports—the Canadians seem to have despised their adversaries, and to have advanced in pursuit of them as if already victorious, when the Fenian line was scarcely falling back to rectify an error. Many of the Fenians are veterans of the Rebellion, and not to be discouraged by a charge; so they charged bayonets in their turn upon the confident Canadians, and very easily dispersed them. But the losses are reported at only 9 killed and 15 wounded on the Fenian side, and 3 killed and wounded on the Canadian side.

After pursuing the beaten Canadians for some distance, the Fenians fell back toward Fort Erie. They had improved some provisions at that place, but their supplies quickly fell short, notwithstanding what they could find in the vicinity. More Canadian troops were coming up to Fort Colborne; PEACOCK's force was approaching from Chippewa; the Michigan and one or two tugs had effectively closed the Niagara River to any reinforcements. As the Fenians approached Fort Erie again they had a brush with a small Canadian force, but easily repulsed it; and at night, worn out with fatigue and hungry, the Fenians attempted to cross the river into the United States. The main body was promptly captured, with the tugs conveying them, by the Michigan; but stragglers and parties who reached on the Canadian side, and were taken by Colonel PEACOCK's force, which went into camp at Fort Erie; and the left-flank movement of the Fenian invasion was over, and a failure, and its troops were prisoners to United States Marshal Dorsey, though in the immediate charge of Captain Bryson, of the Michigan.

The sketches on page 397 show the ruins of Fort Erie and the flag captured from the British at Ridgeway by the Fenians.



Since this failure other attempts have been made, but have not succeeded. The Fenians made a great mistake when they began the work of emancipating Ireland with the infraction of the laws of the country of which they were the adopted citizens. The President's proclamation, and the vigilance of our military forces on the frontier, will prevent an early repetition of the collision at Fort Erie and Ridgeway.

THE FIRE IN SARATOGA—BROADWAY THE MORNING AFTER THE FIRE.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. S. AVERY.]

THE FIRE IN SARATOGA.

CONGRESS HALL HOTEL in Saratoga was destroyed by fire on the morning of May 20. At twenty minutes past twelve the flames were discovered in the north wing of the building, and issuing from the apartment known as the ironing and linen room, wherein the women ironers had been at work until an unusually late hour on the night before to be in readiness for the annual opening of the house, which was to take place on the very day of the fire. The frailty of the immense structure was soon apparent in the instantaneous spread of the flames, and but little more than an hour elapsed before it was a complete and impressive heap of ruins. The glare of the fire was plainly visible in Troy, Albany, Schenectady, and throughout all the adjacent country.

The loss involved in this fire was nearly $200,000. Congress Hall was built in the year 1812 by Mr. GIDEON PUTNAM, and it was while superintending the work upon the building that he fell and injured himself, and afterward died of his wounds. The hotel was kept in the family for a number of years, when a Mr. VAN SCHOENHOVEN bought it. He left it in his will to MR. KINSLEY, his son-in-law; and in 1850 the only surviving heir, MR. E. V. KINSLEY, came into possession, all his relatives being burned or drowned, or both, on the ill-fated steamboat Henry Clay. Mr. H. H. HATHORN, the last proprietor, bought the house on the 9th of September, 1864, and had retained his right in it ever since. He has had partners with him, but he himself had been the man of the establishment. The large number of improvements which had been made in and around the hotel are too numerous to mention, but they were such as made it equal, if not superior, to any in the place. A new office had been made in the front of the building, which included the room formerly occupied as a bar-room, and extended back as far as the piazzas. The bar-room had been sent down stairs, as also several other branches of hotel appointments. Mr. HATHORN had announced his intention of opening the hotel on Monday, May 28.

WHY SHAKE HANDS WITH NEIGHBOR JONES?

My neighbor Jones is of portly mien,
His face both smooth and bland,
And he has a terrible way—to me—
Of heartily shaking my hand.
Now there is nothing of which to complain
In a good and hearty shake,
But upon my word with my neighbor Jones
I feel as if handling a snake.

He meets me at church in the midst of a crowd,
Or sometimes he meets me alone,
And his eyes they glare with a grayish stare,
And the look of a rounded stone.
I am getting afraid of my neighbor Jones,
Of the touch of his clammy palm,
And I am afraid that his stony eyes
Have always a meaning of harm.

I know that, one day, when my pipe broke through
Into Jones's pasture field,
He kindly opened my garden gate,
Where they ruined my early yield.
I know that when Sue, my bridled cow,
Was choking in yonder lot,
That Jones sat still on his fence and watched,
But Jones to me came not.

I know that Jones, in digging a well,
Cut off the stream of mine,
And I know that Jones both chuckled and laughed,
As though the joke were fine.
And I know that Jones has threatened the law
For things not worthy a song;
But I always give in to my neighbor Jones,
Though the principle is wrong.

I know that Jones once pulled at the ear
Of Billy, my eldest born,
And that I incurred, by my peaceable way,
My Billy's utter scorn.
That Billy declares when he shall grow big
That there's death to Jones's ears,
But still I have hope he will change his mind,
Like myself—when Jones appears.

But why do I shake old Jones's hand?
It is not for love, I am sure,
Or rather, why let him shake hands with me,
When his shaking I can not endure?
I wish that the fashion of shaking hands
Would go out with the spring or fall,
And I ask, when I think of my neighbor Jones,
Why do they shake hands at all?

THE HONEST THIEF.

THERE once lived in St. Petersburg an aged man, who, though poor, had always been noted for strict honor and integrity, and whose whole career of life was regular as clock-work. Each morning he left his modest dwelling at precisely the same hour, passed through the old-fashioned garden in his rear, and after his six hours' labor was accomplished returned home by the self-same route. His garments were shabby from long service, and the covering of his cap was worn to shreds. The urgent solicitations of his daughters finally induced him to replace the latter article; and seeing some of a green color one day in a shop window, he went in and inquired the price. The shopman, however, refused to sell them, on the plea that they were already bespoken, and offered to show him others of a different hue; but the old man had set his heart on green.

"Well, then," said the man, "if you must absolutely have it, take it, and if needs must I can finish another by to-morrow to take its place."

The bargain was accordingly concluded, and the next day no small excitement was created by the appearance of the cap, which exhibited to his colleagues smiling congratulations upon his successful purchase.

Two days afterward, the heat being intense in the Bureau, he left in his pocket for his handkerchief, in order to wipe the perspiration from his face, and drew forth, to his great astonishment, one of fine India foulard silk. He showed it to his colleagues, and inquired if he had not by mistake appropriated another person's property; but one and all disclaimed all knowledge of it, and agreed unanimously that it must be a surprise from one of his daughters.

"Children," said he, upon his return to his house, "who has done this? Do you wish to make me vain in my old age?"

His daughters also declared their ignorance of the matter, and, after many random guesses, finally made up their minds that it must have been put in his pocket by their cousin, who spent the last Sunday with them; and the handkerchief was carefully put aside by their father.

On the following day, as he was carefully spreading his coat-tails in order to seat himself at his desk, he felt something hard in both his pockets, and putting in his hand brought out from one a gold watch and from the other a well-furnished purse. This time his reason was overwhelmed; but after long reflection he formed a sudden resolution. He had been more punctual than the other officials, and was alone in the room; he therefore determined to say nothing to them of his discovery, and as soon as the office hours were over he went directly to the Chief of the Police and solicited a private audience. He then produced the watch and purse, and related the history of the handkerchief. After the Chief had fully possessed himself of all the particulars he said:

"Is it very singular! Has nothing of the kind ever happened to you before?"

"Never before last week."

"Have you made any change in your dress within that time?"

"No."

"Recollect!"

"Oh yes, certainly! I bought a new cap!"

"Tell me how and where you bought it."

The old man told him every thing connected with his purchase, upon which the chief laughed heartily, and exclaimed:

"Poor, honest man that you are, you have become a member of a band of thieves! Do you not perceive? The twenty caps of the same shape and color were to serve them as a mark for recognition; and as every pickpocket seeks to divest himself as quickly as possible of his stolen goods, they have taken you for an accomplice, and transferred these articles to your pockets. You are greatly indebted to accident and to you. Take this money and buy another cap from one of the principal magazines; then bring this one back immediately; for as I hope to have the whole gang in my power to-morrow you must not run the risk of being arrested also."

The old man went back and purchased another covering for his head; but as he was about to tie up the cap in his handkerchief, in order to take it back to the police-office, he found in the crown, to his no small surprise, a costly piece of lace. He hastened to deliver this fresh booty into the hands of the Chief, who again bent into a peal of laughter when he beheld the despairing countenance of the honest thief.

The necessary measures were immediately taken. Two dozen detectives were made acquainted with the form of the cap at simultaneously, and precisely the same hour, every possessor of the sign was placed in durance vile.

THE SOUTHERN METHODIST BISHOPS.

THE Episcopal College of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, consists of ten Bishops, three of whom are not assigned to regular duty because of their advanced age, and four were elected and ordained at the late session of the General Conference, held in the city of New Orleans.

We present this week a representation of the whole body, with the exception of the venerable Senior Bishop, SOULE, whose feeble health detained him from the Conference at which the photograph was made from which the engravings were drawn. The subjoined sketches give an outline of the main facts in the history of each, with his distinguishing characteristics:

1. JOSHUA SOULE is a native of the State of Maine, and is now in his eighty-sixth year. He entered upon the work of the holy ministry in the last year of the last century; was ordained Deacon in 1801, Elder in 1803, and Bishop in 1824. He is a man of large body and powerful physique, and majestic appearance; has endured immense hardships in the pioneer work of the itinerant ministry, and exerted a very great influence upon the growth of Methodism on this continent. For several years he has been relieved from regular Episcopal duty, and in a recent old age is waiting his change at his simple residence, near the city of Nashville, Tennessee.

2. JAMES OSGOOD ANDREW was born in Georgia, in 1794; entered the ministry in 1812; was ordained Deacon in 1814, Elder in 1816, and Bishop in 1832. Without learning, he made his way by the natural powerful eloquence of his strong mind and the great industry of his pastoral labors. He is genial, warm-hearted, and simple. He has retired from the active Episcopacy; but in many of the more labor labors, and in respect for the great purity of his character, he is very cherished by his colleagues.

3. ROBERT PAINE is a native of North Carolina; born in 1799; a Licentiate in 1818, a Deacon in 1822, his ordination as Elder having been by the absence of Bishops; an Elder in 1824, and a Bishop in 1846. He is a man of high intellect, strong judgment, unquestioned integrity, and sterling culture. He is represented as the philosopher of the Episcopal Bench. He seems sluggish in his movements, but is very active in his habits. He is courteous, he is always generous. His knowledge of law makes him an excellent presiding officer. As a preacher he is instructive rather than popular; he succeeds his pulpit efforts are very impressive; his failures are total. He was, we believe, President of La Grange College. He was, during the war, of Bishop. His uttered opinions have great weight in the Annual and General Conferences.

4. GEORGE FOSTER PIERCE was born in Georgia, in 1811; began to preach in 1830; ordained Deacon in 1832, Elder in 1834, and Bishop in 1854. He is affable, careless in his manners, very handsome in face and person, with a dark eye and a remarkably charming smile. In the pulpit he has had the reputation of great brilliancy. He is still a popular preacher. His voice is like a bugle; it stirs you from afar. Not remarkable for discrimination, he carries his measures by the force of his splendid and magnetic style seems to kindle. He is a liberal host, and a genial companion. In Georgia his influence is unrivaled.

5. JOHN EARLY was born in Virginia. He is believed to be in his seventy-second year. He was admitted to the Virginia Conference in 1807; was ordained Deacon in 1809, Elder in 1811, and Bishop in 1854. He is a man of remarkably commanding presence. In all crowds where he is a stranger his appearance attracts immediate attention. It is a combination of the Apostle and the General. He was born to command, and he does command. He has been a great worker. His energy is tireless. At his advanced age he does as much as any one of his colleagues; and although, by reason of his multitude of years, he has been relieved from the burden of Episcopal labor, and has his quarters with Bishops Andrew and Soule, his presidency at the late General Conference is said to have shown his clear head and strong hand, grasping and managing the reins to the last.

6. HUBBARD HINDE KAVANAUGH, a native of Kentucky, was born in 1802; entered the ministry in 1823; was ordained Deacon in 1825, Elder in 1827, and Bishop in 1854. He is a hearty Christian—very simple, very discreet, in the chair on a point of order, very reliable upon points of law if time be given, happy, pure, peaceful, much loved and much respected. As a preacher he is not quires a long time to fire up, but when heated he is a pulpit engine of several-preacher-power.

7. WILLIAM MAY WYCKLIFFE, a native of South Carolina, was born in 1808; entered the Conference in 1828; was ordained Deacon in 1830, Elder in 1832, and Bishop in 1866. He is below the medium height, with a head and face not very indicative of high intellect, yet he is in reality a man of very considerable ability and elegant culture, has been editor and professor, and was President of the Southern University when he was elected to the Episcopacy. Those who are intimate with him manifest a warm affection for his person and character.

8. ENOCH MATHER MARVIN was born in Missouri, in 1823; was a Licentiate in 1841; ordained Deacon in 1843, Elder in 1845, and Bishop in 1866. He is a tall, thin, cadaverous man in his appearance, wears his hair long and curled, is slightly unshaven; has a clear, blue, deep eye, a high intellectual brow, and a nose which makes his whole face look like the portraits of CALVIN. His mental endowments are lofty, his temper gentle, his spirit Christian, his preaching very superior, and his laboriousness—notwithstanding his apparent feebleness—really exemplary.

9. DAVID SEWARD SCOTT was born in Virginia, in 1810; entered the Conference in 1829; was ordained Deacon in 1832, Elder in 1833, and Bishop in 1866. He is a slender, graceful, pleasant, cultivated, and eloquent. He is a good man, a scholar of considerable acquirements, and a delightful and edifying preacher. He has been editor of several periodicals and a professor.

10. HOLLAND NIMMONS MCTYEIRE was born in South Carolina in 1824; entered the ministry in 1845; was ordained Deacon in 1848, Elder in 1849, and Bishop in 1866. He has been editor of several Church periodicals. As a preacher his matter is solid, but his delivery is slow—very slow; as a writer he is most lucid and pungent. Nothing comes from his pen which does not arrest attention. He is very vigilant and very sagacious. He never barks at what he thinks wrong; he bites, always putting his teeth into the point of the error. He is upright in person and character, has a steel-gray incisive eye, and a hard face, which is wonderfully relieved by a remarkably illuminating smile. He is a man of rare executive power, and upon this characteristic his friends base their hopes of a most useful Episcopal career for this youngest of the four Bishops called to that office by the Church at its late General Conference.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH.

MR. A. R. W.'s sketches on pages 392 and 393, illustrating the May-day Festival at Claflin College, Louisiana, and the Freedmen's School at Vicksburg, Mississippi, are thus described by the artist:

"FREEDMEN'S SCHOOL AT VICKSBURG.

"One of the most noticeable features of these schools for freedmen is the cleanliness and good clothing of a majority of the scholars. Of course there are exceptions and rough specimens, but these are not the rule. It is one of the many evidences I have found in Mississippi of the general well-being of the colored people, that they take such care of themselves. These scholars, embracing all ages from the grandam down to the infant, are attentive, and minding nothing without any appearance indicating that the labor is irksome. The lady teachers, with a little tact, do almost any thing with them; and, although all teaching is a wearisome business, I should judge that these people showed the average intelligence displayed in the New York public schools. The Superintendent of the schools, Chaplain WARREN, considers that in all that pertains to language they are, perhaps, ahead of white children in every grade of progression. How far their capacity for education would carry them is doubtful. That these schools will surely improve the colored people there is no room for doubt; the evidence is conclusive on that point. The school-house is a dilapidated affair, and the owner is anxious to get it into his possession again. The location of the school will have to be changed. The prejudice of the Southern people against the education of the negro is almost universal.

"MAY FESTIVALS IN NEW ORLEANS.

"New Orleans has been the scene of a number of festivals during the present month, in honor of May and the flowers.

"The Germans have, according to time-honored custom, sweetened and guzzled lager, with additions in the way of loud-smelling cyclones, louder sausages, and absolutely noisy garlic and cheese; after which they danced in the hot sun, in a mob, on a platform, perspiring happily; and causing the air to reek with recollections of the above-mentioned comestibles. The Creoles have had their festive picnic (in peace), and their May picnics are in contemplation; but the prettiest festival was that of a dancing-school—patronized, I am informed, by some of the children of the Elder Fairs of New Orleans.

"This entertainment came off at the French Opera-house, where the little pupils revolved themselves into an amateur ballet-corps, and gave tableaux and dances, succeeded by a grand ball, in which the spectators were allowed to join after eleven, the hour when most of the little ones went home.

"The tableau selected for the sketch is the crowning of the May Queen by the Fairies by Morning. Their standing near by, and a little way, personating Bacchus, ready to present a bouquet—although what in the name of goodness Bacchus has to do with the fairies deponent is unable to tell! Premature "three-year-olds," who might be the originators of all the jokes attributed to that age in the 'Editor's Drawer,' occupied pedestals in the character of Cupids. Gas, candles, flowers, scenery, and, above all, Blue-fire, made quite a pretty spectacle; and the children acquitted themselves with a self confidence and ease quite remarkable. The New Orleans children are much older, so to speak, than the children of the North. They have left childhood at the mature age of twelve years, and are comparatively behind them, and are prepared to—and do—act the part of men and women.

"Going to school at a very early age, the climate, like a hot-house, forces them quickly to maturity, but whether the average of life is so long as in less forward countries is very doubtful."

CROONS FOR THE CRADLE.

FULL well I recollect the rhymes,
The ballads of my cradle times;
Nursery!

For often Emma Jane would bring
Her darning to my crib, and sing
Of—well, of almost any thing!
Nursery!

She rocked my cradle to and fro
The while she chanted soft and low,
Nursery!

And I remember how I hung
On all she said, on all she sung;
For I was musical, though young.
Nursery!

She said, "There was a little man!"
Ay, marry, thus the tale began,
Nursery!

"He had a little gun," she said,
"With bullets that were made of lead"
(They generally are, I've read).
Nursery!

Anon she sang about the full
Of Humpty Dumpty from a wall,
Nursery!

And then her voice would sink again
To something of a softer strain—
Some exhortation to the rain,
Nursery!

She said that if it went away
It might return another day,
Nursery!

She sang to me of Jack and Jill,
Who came to grief upon a hill,
Through taking up a pail to fill,
Nursery!

I would I were a child again,
To hear the songs of Emma Jane,
Nursery!

Oh! croon-a-days forever flown!
Young hopes forever overthrown!
I walk the world alone—alone!
Nursery!

Brandreth's Pills
COSTIVENESS, DIARRHŒA.

They are taken up by the absorbents, find carried into the circulation, through which medium they are conveyed to every part of the body.

If the pill selected be one of Brandreth's, a single dose produces remarkable benefit. And the same rule applies to costiveness, diarrhœa, and dysentery; though with the latter named they are more frequently aided and relieved by one drop before decided relief is obtained. In affections of the lungs, throat, head, and in Pleurisy, the relief is certain; the excretory organs throw off with ease the phlegm, and the breathing becomes freer. Spasmodic asthma is often cured by a single dose.

No. 259 Spring Street, No. 66 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, corner Concord Street.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small Stores (to which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled; and in case of clubs can have each party receive the same number of pounds as ordered, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St.

Our friends are getting up Clubs in most towns throughout the country, and for which we feel very grateful. Some of our Clubs send orders every week or two, and so often, while others have sent a standing order to be supplied with a given quantity each week, or at stated periods. And in all cases (where a sufficient time has elapsed) Clubs have requested their orders.

Parties forming Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send Post-Office Drafts or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to collect on delivery.

We return thanks to parties who have taken an interest in getting up Clubs. And when any of them come to New York we shall be pleased to have them call upon us and make themselves known.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up a Club of over $30. Our prints are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

The following letter tells its own story:

CHILLICOTHE, PEORIA CO., ILLINOIS, June 2, 1866.

Great American Tea Company:

(From the Rev. I. W. Poland's Autobiography.)

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1855 that this Compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a severe cough. I had for some months previous thought that a preparation, having for its basis the cubic bark of white pine might be so compounded as to be very useful in the cure of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in disease alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the medicine, had it made into pleasing, and put in inexpensive boxes. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within three days from the time the first dose was prepared, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after the Lenten season of 1855, while in Lockport, N. Y., my son had been suffering for some weeks with a bad cough, occasioned by a sudden cold, which had settled upon his throat and bronchial tubes. He soon found relief, and went for more. She took about two bottles of it, and got well. In November, 1858, I first advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

As a remedy for kidney complaints the WHITE PINE Compound stands unrivaled.—Boston Journal.

This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the trial of thirty years in the New England States, where its merits have become so well known. It removes sore throat, coughs, difficult, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally. It is a remedy unsurpassed for diseases of the kidneys and bladder, and gravel; and for piles and scurvy it will be found invaluable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicines generally.

"THE HALT."

THIS picture, from a painting by THOMAS NAST, has lately been on exhibition in Chicago, and the Chicago Tribune thus speaks of it:

"A pleasant farm-house, shaded with vines; a tired soldier, leaning upon his gun, taking a cup of water from the farmer's wife—the children looking on in youthful wonder; you can not see their faces but you know how they look. A little farther on a soldier sitting down tantalizing a dog; a splendid distance and back-ground, with a baggage-wagon and soldiers, beautifully-drawn foliage, and delicious bits of sky. Such is THOMAS NAST'S 'Soldier's Halt'—hard, perhaps, in coloring, and filled with idiosyncrasies; and yet bearing the impress of great talent. Better or more conscientiously elaborated foliage you will rarely see, and the same as to sky and atmosphere. NAST is well known to all art lovers. He is known to every body as the delineator of the splendid cartoons in Harper's Weekly."

LEWIS CASS.

THE HON. LEWIS CASS died at Detroit, Michigan, on the morning of June 17.

Before the late war CASS was held by our people to occupy a very large place in our history—he was looked upon, in some sort, as a monumental figure. Just that place he can never hold again in the popular estimate, simply because the war of the rebellion has, like a vast cataclysm, swept away many former political and military idols from their lofty pedestals.

The New York Tribune thus briefly epitomizes the life of General CASS:

LEWIS CASS was born in Exeter, New Hampshire, the 9th day of October, 1782. His father bore a commission in the Revolutionary army, and took part in the battles of Bunker's Hill, Trenton, Princeton, Germantown, etc. The young LEWIS was educated at Exeter, and studied law at Marietta. He was admitted to the Bar in 1802, and practiced with success during several years. In 1806 he was elected to the Ohio Legislature. Being placed on the committee instituted to inquire into the movements of Colonel BURR, his hand drafted the law which enabled the local authorities to arrest the men and boats engaged in that enterprise on their passage down the Ohio. He also drew up the address to Mr. JEFFERSON, embodying the views of the Ohio Legislature on the subject. In 1807 CASS was appointed Marshal of the State, a post which he filled until 1813. In the war of 1812 he volunteered to join the forces at Dayton under General HULL, and was named Colonel of the Third Ohio Volunteers. Colonel CASS commanded the advanced-guard when the army crossed from Detroit into Canada, and drew up the proclamation addressed by the General to the inhabitants of that country on their arrival in it, and recommended also the detachment which dislodged the British forces posted at the bridge over the Cassards.

Shortly afterward Colonel CASS was included in the capitulation which ensued on the signal defeat of the American army, and, after making his report at Washington, was appointed to the Twenty-seventh Regiment of Infantry, and, after a short interval, promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General.

He took part in the pursuit of General PROCTOR, and in the triumph at the Moravian towns. At the close of the campaign he was left in command of Michigan, with his head-quarters at Detroit, a command he exchanged for the post of Civil Governor over the same State in October, 1813.

In 1814 he was associated with General HARRISON in a commission to treat with the Indians, who had been hostile to the United States during the war. In 1819 he established himself permanently with his family in Michigan. From the year 1819 to 1820 General CASS was the main instrument in the various treaties concluded during these years between the United States and the different Indian tribes located along its entire frontier. In 1820 he was made President of an historical society established in Michigan, and in the following year delivered an inaugural address embodying the early history of the State, and bringing it down to the period when it became a part of the Union.

In 1830 he received the degree of LL.D. from Hamilton College, New York. In 1831 he was made Secretary of War by the then President, General JACKSON. It was during his tenure of this office that the war of the Seminole Indians broke out, a calamity which by some has been attributed to his want of judgment. In 1836 the same President appointed him Minister of the United States to France, where he published a book entitled "France, its King, Court, and Government," in which Louis Philippe and his supporters are somewhat lavishly praised.

In 1843, President TYLER having been placed in power by the death of General HARRISON, General CASS was at his own request, recalled. From his return to America many acts of his life are felt to be perplexing, not to say irreconcilable. He now declared himself in favor of a high protective tariff, a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, and of the constitutionality of a bank of the United States.

These views brought him in close alliance with Governor POLTER, of Pennsylvania, and that portion of the Locofocs party who had a leaning to those measures. He was afterward elected to the Senate of the United States, in which he has always been a prominent politician. Being now in a position of influence he commenced bidding for the Presidency, as we say.

Accordingly, a public meeting in Kentucky was got up in 1848, when he was recommended as a candidate for the Presidency. He next espoused additional territory in order and the war with Mexico, for additional territory in order to promote the extension of slave industries, as now he can be perfectly. Whatever the extension of slavery by his celebrated proviso against the Mexican measures, popular from Territorial Sovereignty, as a Democratic Senator in the Free States and offices in the South.

of whom RUSKIN speaks would in this country as zealously discountenance a cruel fashion as he declares they could successfully oppose a cruel war, they would not be the less public benefactors. For any fashion is cruel which compels vast expense. Any fashion is cruel which encourages extravagance. Any fashion is cruel which debases society, and every thing which gives money the reward of merit is degrading.

The wife of Prince METTERNICH, the Austrian embassador in Paris, now dictates the fashion. The empress is the obsolete. If Punch Assassinée should wear cowhide boots, cowhide boots would be de rigueur in the choicest circles. If she should drape her pretty person in cloth of gold and throw hoops out of the window, the streets of the great cities in the world would become impassable, and the drawing-rooms every where would glitter with splendor. What a power this lady has! For if she wore a plain straw hat and a plain dress, simplicity and economy would be the fashion. But, after all, what is her right divine? If she chooses to wear a net of old Venetian sequins on her head, why should the sylphs of Saratoga take to thatching themselves with gold dollars? If she chooses to draggle a satin train along a grassy walk, why should the damsels of Newport wipe the sea beach with silk? Why don not each dainty American dame show her equality with Pauvérissa by following her own sweet will and regulating it by the eternal fitness of things? To be fashionable is not necessarily to be unseemly and ludicrous. What if those who can effect it should resolve that only what is womanly and ladylike shall be fashionable?

FORT MONROE AND ANDERSONVILLE.

JEFFERSON DAVIS is charged by the Government of the United States with complicity in the assassination of President LINCOLN, and the Government can not decently parole him until it has withdrawn that charge. Should it be withdrawn he would remain a prisoner under indictment for treason, which is not a capital crime. So long, however, as he is imprisoned upon whatever charge humanity requires that he be treated, and that there should be no delay in his trial. There has, however, been a foolish attempt to excite sympathy for him and odium against the Government by depicting him as a martyr, a Bastile sufferer, a dignified and pathetic victim of a haughty and cruel Despotism. Yet there is no other prisoner in the land, any country charged with a capital crime who is so comfortably lodged and honorably treated as JEFFERSON DAVIS. He has a casemate properly furnished. He has a daily bill of fare such as no other prisoner in the world enjoys, and which would amply satisfy any honest man. He has the range of the ramparts to walk and to breathe the ocean air, and he has books, newspapers, wife, and friends around him. He has, or had, a physician also, who apparently sat at his feet to catch the drop of wisdom that fell from his mouth; a physician who has prepared a book about the prisoner whom he calls "ex-President" and "distinguished captive."

Let us not forget that this man, for whose comfort sentries must tread softly, for whose delicate stomach the bill of fare must be daily changed, for whose gratification the recreations we have named are provided, is the same man who could see from his house in Richmond the island prison where Union prisoners were slowly starved and frozen, and who knew that thousands of his fellow-men imprisoned at Andersonville were pitilessly tortured into idiocy and death. Let us cast back pang of their horrible bodily suffering would we have retorted upon JEFFERSON DAVIS; not one touch of retaliation should the most peculiar agony allow to be visited upon him. But when they are asked to believe that he is tortured by the authority of their Government, it is wise for them to perceive the difference between the treatment he receives from the Government which he sought to destroy and that which he countenanced in the case of those who strove to defend it. Nor will those people forget that the same papers which furiously denounce the pretended cruelty of the Government toward him were silent over the awful tragedies of Andersonville and Belle Isle, or flatly denied them.

MOSES F. ODELL.

THE name of MOSES F. ODELL, who died a few days since at his home in Brooklyn, after a long and painful illness, has been of late very conspicuous as that of a most faithful and efficient public officer, and as a leader among those Democrats whom the most stringent partisan sympathy could not reduce from the plain path of patriotism. Although he had always been a Democrat and an active party man, President of the Empire Club, Assistant-Collector of Customs under Democratic ascendency, and Democratic Representative in Congress, he devoted himself ardently at the outbreak of the rebellion to the support of the Government; served with the utmost diligence upon the Congressional Committee on the Conduct of the War; effectively aided the raising of troops, and was a constant, helpful, and sympathetic visitor in the camp and hospital. Strongly attached to his party name and traditions, he did not hesitate to follow his convictions, and was the first that emphatically censured MCCLELLAN; and he voted for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and for the Emancipation Amendment. Had he been still in Congress we believe that he would have declined to yield to the ignoble party policy of opposing every humane and just measure intended to secure peace, liberty, and union, and have voted for the Constitutional Amendment recently adopted.

His object, however, like his private life, was spotless. Energetic and sagacious, he clearly comprehended his duty and promptly did it. It is stated, we believe without contradiction, that President LINCOLN, who saw and justly valued his worth and efficiency, offered to MR. ODELL the office of Collector of New York. But MR. ODELL suggested that PRESTON KING would be a more suitable offering; and MR. KING was subsequently appointed, while MR. ODELL was made Naval Officer. For many weeks he had been necessarily absent from his post, suffering acutely from a disease which he knew to be mortal. But in illness as in health his warm religious feeling kept his soul serene. For many years he had been a devoted member of the Methodist Church, and especially interested in the Sunday-school. At the annual summer festival he was always present, directing and counseling, and thoughtful of the children to the last, he asked to be carried to the window when they marched by at their late celebration, that he might see the little faces and show his young friends that his heart was with them in death as in life; while but an hour or two before he died he sent for some of the Sunday-school scholars to sing to him the hymns he loved, and so peacefully sank to rest.

Mr. ODELL will be long and kindly remembered even by many who did not personally know him, but who had learned to honor his patriotic fidelity.

EXERCISE VERSUS DEFORMITY.

A CROOKED back if a very common thing in indeed, as every dress-maker knows, and a tailor seldom finds this deformity in gentlemen. On this point DR. WARREN of Boston says: "Of the well-educated females which I meet in the street, nine-tenths have one-half are affected with some degree of distortion of the spine." A very judicious French writer has even further than this, and says: "It is so common that out of twenty girls who have attained the age of fifteen years there are not two who do not present very decided curves of the spine."

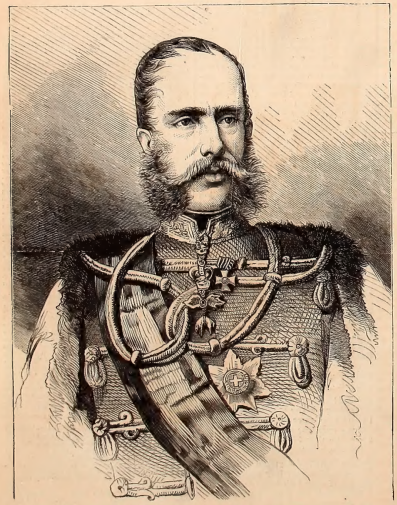
Whatever discrepancies there may be between the estimates of different observers, all agree that the deformity is very common, especially in those that are delicately brought up. Why is it so? Is it a necessity under the circumstances, or can it be avoided? It seems to be much like the sentence about

BUNKER HILL.

BUNKER HILL is a round, smooth elevation in Charlestown, Massachusetts, 110 feet high, commanding the peninsula of Boston. It was connected by a ridge on its southern slope with a smaller elevation known as Breed's Hill, 75 feet high, the crests of the two hills being about 700 yards apart. These heights are famous for the battle fought on them between the Americans and the British, June 17, 1775. The city of Boston was at the time occupied by the British General, GAGE, who had just received large reinforcements, under Generals BURGOYNE, HOWE, and CLINTON. The American forces, with their head-quarters at Cambridge, knowing little of military discipline, and made up of independent companies of militia and volunteers, were under command of General ARTEMAS WARD, who had under him PRESCOTT, PUTNAM, GRIDLEY, STARK, and POMEROY—men who had learned the art of war in the battles with the French. This was the situation when Colonel PRESCOTT, with 1000 men, was sent to seize the hills commanding Boston. Bunker Hill was occupied first, but the position was abandoned for Breed's Hill, nearer Boston. During the 17th PRESCOTT was reinforced by PUTNAM and WARREN. Intrenchments had been thrown up, and the Americans awaited the attack, which came shortly after noon. The British numbered about 2000 men. The attack was made in front, the British moving up to the breast-works.—But they were repulsed again and again in several charges, until at length the ammunition of the Americans gave out, and the latter were compelled to retreat. The loss of the British was over 1000 men, that of the Americans 449.—Among the killed was General WARREN.

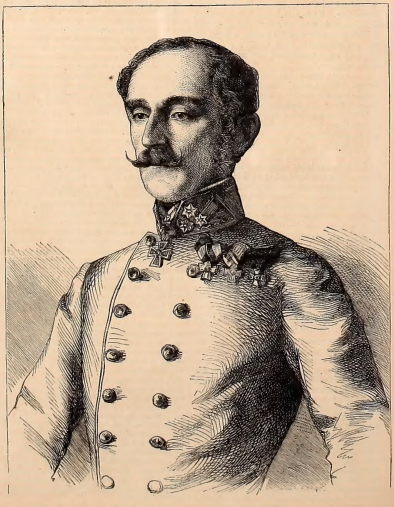
The Monument commemorating the battle stands in the centre of the grounds included within the redoubt on Breed's Hill. It is a square shaft of Quincy granite, 221 feet in height, 31 feet square at the base, and 15 at the top. Inside the shaft is a winding staircase of 294 stone steps, which leads to a chamber just under the apex. This chamber has four windows, which command a magnificent view of the surrounding country. The corner-stone of the Monument was laid on the fiftieth anniversary of the battle, June 17, 1825, by General LAFAYETTE, then the nation's guest, when DANIEL WEBSTER pronounced an oration to an immense audience. About forty survivors of the battle were present on that occasion. The Monument was completed in 1842, at an expense of $150,000. It was dedicated June 17, 1843, the oration being delivered by Mr. WEBSTER, and the President of the United States, with his entire Cabinet, forming a part of the vast audience.

BUNKER HILL MONUMENT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY W. B. AUSTIN.]



FRANCIS JOSEPH I., EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA.

FRANCIS JOSEPH I., Emperor of Austria, King of Hungary and Bohemia, was born on the 18th of August, 1830. He is nephew of his predecessor, FERDINAND I., and eldest son of Archduke FRANCIS CHARLES and of the Princess SOPHIA, daughter of MAXIMILIAN, King of Bavaria.



The Emperor FERDINAND, tired of the cares of royalty, and the victim of disease, abdicated at Olmuts on the 2d of December, 1848. The same day his only brother, the Archduke FRANCIS CHARLES, waived his claims to the throne in favor of his son, who was declared of majority at the age of sixteen years.

The first years of his reign were disturbed by civil war. Hungary was in revolt, Sardinia had invaded the Milanese, and the Austrian empire seemed to have reached the brink of dissolution. The young Emperor had come to the throne with the promise of giving to the whole country a free, constitutional Government—a promise which he could not then, and which afterward he was not disposed to keep. The intervention of the Czar in Hungary and the victory of Novara combined to save him his throne. The reaction was terrible, and a large number of the revolutionary leaders were condemned to death.

All the efforts of the Emperor have tended to the preponderance of Austria in Germany, and, internally, to the centralization of power. On the 25th of April, 1854, he married the Princess ELIZABETH-AMELIA-EUGENIE, daughter of MAXIMILIAN JOSEPH, Duke of Bavaria, who has given him two daughters. During the Crimean war the Emperor of Austria openly manifested sympathy with the Allies, but gave no material support to their armies.

In 1859 the war in Italy came on. What followed—the victories of the French and Italians, the loss of Lombardy to Austria, and the compromise of Villafranca at a time when Prussia seemed on the point of forming an alliance with Austria—is well known to our readers. There was a new Hungarian agitation in 1860, and a war seemed imminent, but the imperial proclamation of October 20, and the suitable concessions made by the Emperor, prevented its occurrence.

The Emperor FRANCIS JOSEPH has created an order which bears his own name. He has devoted himself to the military administration of affairs, and is virtually his own Minister of War. In 1850 an attempt was made against his life, and he received a trifling wound.

LUDWIG RITTER VON BENEDEK, THE AUSTRIAN GENERAL.

THE Austrian Emperor, FRANCIS JOSEPH, has intrusted to Field-Marshal LUDWIG RITTER VON BENEDEK the command of the Austrian Army of the North, which lies on the borders of Saxony and Prussia.

BENEDEK is a Hungarian and a Protestant. He was born in 1804, at Oldenburg, and after the usual course of training at Neustadt, he entered the Austrian army as a cornet in 1823. He obtained the rank of Colonel in 1843. He took a prominent part in quelling the Galician insurrection in 1845; and in the unsuccessful Italian campaign of 1848, under RADETZKY, he distinguished himself at the retreat from Milan, at Come, and especially at the battle of Curtatone, for which he received the order of Maria Theresa. In 1849 he contributed to the reduction of Hungary and to the victory of Novara. He was, later, in the war of Italian independence, BENEDEK was one of the few Austrian Generals who exhibited very great military capacity. He commanded the Eighth Army Corps, and especially distinguished himself at Solferino, his division being the last to leave the field.

Both among the nobility and the lower classes BENEDEK is enthusiastically admired. When, on May 12, he made his headquarters in Vienna, he was greeted with applause by the people and the army. To the latter he said:

"Soldiers! I bring you my whole, warm, soldier's heart, my iron will, my highest confidence in you, my unconquered trust in Almighty God, and, with all these, the faith which I derive from my former success as a soldier!"

INSIDE.

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XXIV.

"YES, Sir, the grandest sc:t of a spree; and, as you well know, Simmons, I always said so from the start, by George! This is the smash up, Sir, and a smash up it is, ain't it?"

"I, Mr. Withers, I have refrained so far with the very desperation of hope. I can refrain no longer. It is as you say; I confess it, it is," says Captain Simmons, lugubriously dignified.

"Sir," continues he, with the solemnity of a drunken and exceedingly dilapidated Dr. Samuel Johnson, "I casually met that fellow Kelly. In reply to a question of mine, he informed me that he had ceased to think at all, that there was only vacuum where once he had possessed brains. Nealy is a Yankee, just now the bluest Yankee eyes ever beheld, and, being a Yankee, I can have no sentiment in common with his. But such are my feelings also. Words learned in earliest childhood—I think I once sang them in Sabbath-school—

"'Something and systems into ruin buried,
And now a nation bursts, and now a world.'

Something at least to that effect has been running in my mind day and night. I tell you, Sir, ours"—and Captain Simmons extends his right hand, and says it arm rotundo—"is the grandest collapse in the history of the world. Yes, Sir, the suddenest, unexpectedest, most total and complete collapse of which history, sacred and profane, has any instance."

The same phrase runs its rounds among Secessionists, with a sort of pride, too, as if there was something to soothe and console one's self with in the very magnificence of the collapse.

Yes, it is a collapse; no man in Somerville, no good Secession lady even, doubts or denies that now. There was a feeble attempt to get up a public meeting in Somerville to breathe undaunted purpose to continue the struggle; but a ghastly affair it was, very few present, tremendous resolutions presented by Lamum the editor, and passed on the ground of half a dozen yeas and no nays. Captain Simmons, Lamum, Smithers, and one or two vagrant Colonels, make speeches, in which it is well known they have no faith themselves in private circles. And Lamum publishes the proceedings of this, as of dozens of exactly similar meetings throughout the State, with all the old adjectives of enthusiastic, thrumping, harmonious, unanimous, and the weary like, but not a soul now is deceived. The whole thing is worn out. Lamum prints letters from fierce zealots here and there, some sending in spoons and butter-knives for the Confederate Treasury, representing that our hope is the fact that the United States are disbanding their armies; that Europe must certainly intervene now; that a just God—Mr. Ellis writes a series of articles to that effect—can not, will not, ought not, must not, shall not, abandon a cause so manifestly His own; that if we will only hold out a little longer, a foreign war or something else may turn up for our deliverance.

People hardly even read a line of all this. For four long years they have believed with a belief passing all calculation, but even the fecundity of belief is wearing out. Nobody has any regard even for Brother Barker these days; people withdraw their children from his Sabbath-school, or suffer them to stay away unreproved, and never go to church themselves; the very best members sunk, for the time, into a coldness, not to say apostasy, which language fails to express. Haggard, restless, sallow, lean Brother Barker, from the crown of his lank hair to the soles of his sorrowful feet, in countenance, apparel, and bearing teaches only desolation and despair. At times even he flares up, however.

"Never," he says to Bob Withers, taking up again the refrain of the general crook—a refrain, however, which Dr. Gunnis and Deacon Grimsby never utter—"never, Sir, never, never! I will go to Mexico, to the Sandwich Islands first. Rather," says Brother Barker, with a savage gleam in his eyes, "I will stay here and agitate."

"Do what?" asks Mr. Withers, who has taken Brother Barker in his hand and excited him up thus, exactly as a child rubs a match to see it fizz and burn blue, only for the melancholy fun of it. "Do what?"

"Agitate, Sir, agitate, agitate! Aid in getting up another revolution, if it is eight years hence."

The fact is, we good Secessionists in Somerville, having duly sown the wind, are now harvesting in our whirlwind, and the crop is terrible.

Mr. Arthur endeavors to promote a certain pity for them in his bosom by summing it up in conversation with grim Mr. Ferguson:

"You can hardly imagine a ruin more complete," he says. "Take Colonel Ret Roberts as an instance. He has proved disastrously mistaken in all upon which he staked his sagacity and judgment. His estate in the agonies of defeat, utter and perpetual defeat, military and political. He has lost all his property, especially his negroes. He may not even detest North himself; multitudes do who have paid them to the Confederacy, and now have to pay them over again. He may not have brought complicated property; multitudes have invested largely in that, and have to disgorge. Then there is the bitter humiliation in the triumph of the Union men, upon whom he has so trampled here in Somerville; dread of terrible vengeance, even, at their hands. We Union men had, even in our darkest days, at least hope left us; these have no hope—none. He has no future. You can hardly imagine less to a man more complete."

"Yes, I can," replies Mr. Ferguson, who has stern satisfaction in the ruin of his Secession friends painful to contemplate. "Barker, Mr. Ellis, and others like them, have, in addition, lost their very faith in their religion. In the most terrible affliction men can endure they have not even that to fly to. For the time, at least, their very belief in and use of Christianity is stunned."

"Yes," replies Mr. Arthur, even with enthusiasm; "but you will see, that in the case of the truly pious among the Secessionists—and many of the most zealous of them, in and out of the pulpit, are among the best and most devoted of Christians in the world—this defeat of the cause in which they had invested all that is dearest them on earth, this most terrible affliction and trial will, like every other chastisement in the case of a child of God, work out in each of them a deeper, more devoted piety. I do believe, Sir," Edward Arthur adds, with earnestness, "this whole thing will be as an ordeal preparing the whole church on this continent, North and South, in all its denominations, for greater devotion to God and power over men for good than we have ever yet dreamed men capable of—instruments made meet by these very times, you see, for the Master's use."

And very clearly, indeed, does this minister see it to be his duty, in and out of the pulpit, to preach conciliation, moderation, and all the kindred Christian virtues; mingling much mourning with men than for years past, suppressing all partisan exultation, glowing with quiet enthusiasm instead in this direction. But joy in the result? Gratitude to God for it? The feeling is a much more quiet one than he had imagined it would be in anticipating it in dark days, which seem a hundred years ago now; but all, it is not unspeakable one!

Yet, as these eventful days of May, 1865, sweep along, a new hue of feeling suddenly colors the wide and roaring current. Union men in Somerville had dreaded the rise of a bitter feeling against them which might result in the destruction of their lives and property. They are lost sight of, or thought of only with respect, in the new feeling which suddenly and angrily flushes the surface, especially among the soldiers returning by thousands to their homes. It is a feeling of bitter wrath against their own officers, partly because of individual grievances at their hands, chiefly on account of the belief, deepseated and universal among the army, that the officers, with scarce an exception, have been engaged all along in such systematic swindling in cotton and commissary stores as no country has ever before known. The feeling has been long growing—growing for years. Military subordination suddenly thrown off, it bursts forth with terrible vehemence. Speculators, too, outside of the army, share the deep hatred of the soldiers. The universal cry is, "While we have been enduring privations for years, suffering and without pay, these have been at home making money. At least they shall share with us!"

Suddenly officers and speculators find themselves in the very camp of enemies more to be dreaded than the Federals, and they, after a moment of bewilderment, are flying in all directions. All Government property in reach is in some instances broken into and plundered. The stores of speculators share the same fate. Demoralized by plunder, the soldiery fall next upon any supplies in reach under the same plea. No house in Somerville and throughout the State safe from their search on the least suspicion, or none at all, of secreted Government supplies. Until, at last, every man in Somerville, the officials most of all, first secretly prays for, then openly desires, ardently desires the arrival of the National forces as his only hope.

"I wish to Heaven they would come!" Dr. Gunnis does not hesitate openly to say the day the soldiers disinter twenty sacks of coffee from beneath the corn in his crib. And yet, only a week before, the portly Doctor, in acknowledging in husky voice that we are whipped, that the war is over, had darkly added, "For the present, Sir, only for the present!" with terrible intimations of glare and gesture of a guerrilla war to be waged for, at the least retaliation, forty years to come.

Even after the surrender of Lee Mrs. Smithers has denounced the panic of the hour as a mere panic. Smithers has speculated, in some complicated manner, in paper-money. The postmaster Smithers is, but of course it was not Government money he used, turning the paper into specie, and that into sugar, and that into negroes. Yes, negroes. That is Smithers's weakness, negroes.

"And as soon as this little panic is over," Smithers demonstrates to his wife, "those negroes will bring twice what I gave. Soon as the war is over, Arminny, one negro will bring more'n I paid for all."

Yet the panic increases rather. Smithers has as much as he can do to secrete about his place what valuable property he has. Colonel Ret Roberts's house is scarched by the soldiers on one side of him, and Mr. Brady's on the other, and the soldiers say they are successful, too, for Government stores. Even long, red Mrs. Smithers is terrified. With a tub and cloth ready on the front porch, and a child on the look-out, whenever a squad of soldiers happen to pass, Mrs. Smithers, dropping every thing to do so, is on her knees upon the porch scrubbing the floor on dear life—the idea being to impress upon the minds of the soldiers the fact that the house is inhabited only by the poorest of people. Until, at last, even Mrs. Smithers is ear-wrathful against the Federals for not coming as she ever was against them for coming at all.

"I must do you the justice to say so, Dr. Warner. I have never yet had an intimation, even in this dark hour, of any desire on your part for the Federals to come."

It is good Mr. Ellis who says it, seated in the Doctor's parlor at this critical period. Mr. Ellis has dropped in for medicine for his ailing wife, and in fact has never entirely dropped Dr. Warner on political grounds; the Doctor is so fat and easy and good-natured it is almost impossible to do so on any grounds. Very cold has been Mr. Ellis's manner to the Doctor; very crisp his "Good-mornings, Sir!" in passing; very reticent each to the other during the Doctor's professional visits upon Mrs. Ellis; but both are men too thoroughly good at heart to lose all "elective affinity" for each other.

"Of course," continues Mr. Ellis, in his nervous manner, "I regret you have not been more decidedly Southern, Dr. Warner. I disapproved of Secession as much as yourself, Sir; it was wrong. But when we of the South were actually attacked then I buried all that. Even if your brother or father is in the wrong, and you not defend them if attacked? My country right or wrong, Sir! Your upholding Mr. Arthur in his course has pained me. In fact, I do not heartily disapprove"—Mr. Ellis always kindles as he goes—"of your lukewarm support of the Confederacy. I think it wrong, very wrong."

RECONSTRUCTION.

"OH, MOTHER, Mr. ARTHUR IS KILLED!".

Mr. Ellis need not have reproached himself at all for saying that. He was not a bit to blame. Mrs. Warner only used it as a pretext; she had almost fretted herself and Sally, her two hundred pounds' weight of black cook, to death for an opportunity ever since the surrender of Dick Taylor, the last of her hopes to say it:

"And you think Dr. Warner wrong, do you, Mr. Ellis?" she bridled in, writhing like a gust round from her sewing-machine to say it.

"Wrong? Wrong? Ha! And you to sit there and say it, after God himself—and you a pious church-member too—has Himself shown what He thinks of Secession. Mr. Ellis, I've known you for years, respected you too, and you are under my roof. But this much I must say to you—you've been crazy as my black niggar that ever was put in a strait-jacket. And for you to believe in that lying, thieving, murdering—devil your tongue, Dr. Warner's—secreating, boasting, cheating, repudiating Confederacy, the grandest swindling concern this earth ever saw! And after it is actually gone to pieces too! I wouldn't say a word, Dr. Warner, but it is more than I can stand. You are wrong—wrong! A quiet, sensible man when he begun. A quiet, sensible man, holding your tongue in all the raging folly when you saw you could do no good, through these—these long, long, long, bad, bitter years. Standing by your minister when he only wanted to be nothing but a minister and let politics alone. Yes, I know what you would say, Mr. Ellis. I am not ashamed to confess it, now I see my error, more shame to you to find out in what you see now is all wrong. Yes, I'm glad of the opportunity to acknowledge I was wrong. Yes, openly, to my own husband. Not that I expect to turn angel. He married Helen Morris, and Helen Morris he must be till I die. But I am sick in my very stomach of Secession—sick to death. Here you've been telling Dr. Warner it wasn't Federals who killed us, but the negroes lazing and stealing, from the highest officers downward. Confessing with your own mouth that the whole thing was rotten, seeded and in touch to make it crumble of itself like a rotten, rotten old pumpkin. And Dr. Warner is wrong"—scorning" intensely sarcastic, in shrillest F sharp.

"I tell you what, Dr. Warner," rising suddenly from her seat, upsetting her sewing-machine in doing so, and crossing the room rapidly to her husband, "I've been turning to say it. It is right, Mr. Ellis has argued me up to say it—yes, and to hear me say it sits right there. I'm proud of you, Dr. Warner. You do not talk out as much as I could wish; but all these four years you've had ten thousand times my sense. There," never throw it up to me I've said it, and I'm sorry in two minutes I did it; but it is only the solemn fact, you provoking old thing!" And Mrs. Warner throws her arms about that weather-beaten mariner's neck, as he sits with the old droop of his head lower than ever, and pushing the blowing out of this most unexpected gale, stoops down, kisses him upon his bald forehead, pats again, and continues—instead Mr. Ellis; the canal-gazer open their widest, hysterical but defiant.

And good Mr. Ellis finally leaves the house, having obtained a good deal more medicine than he came for.

Mr. Ellis, wilted, shrivelled, bewildered, three in age what he was four years should have left him, looks up, as he walks home, to encounter the cheerful face and the hearty good-day of Mr. Arthur riding by. It is as the new era in contrast with the old. Only the minister chides himself for not having worn a sobener manner—nothing but the pathetic manner any even unintentional triumph over his old friend—chides himself for his respect, under the circumstances, of cheerfulness—"But how can I help it with, out playing the hypocrite? he asks himself.

But he rides fast, for he has a letter from Mr. Stapler's retreat for Mrs. Sorel. He thinks it must be from Frank, her long absent boy, only he does not know the writing upon the envelope, very much worn and dirtied by being brought so far in the soldier's knapsack. There is a singular free ease about his heart as he puts the touch of the letter, taking it out of his breast-pocket when he gets out of town to look at it again—a creeping relief, unwilling relief, as he does so.

It gathers over him, a fear, a vague apprehension, so that he almost starts to hear himself called by some one from among the corn in a field to his left.

Drawing in his horse he sees it is a rough field-hand, who is boring and the former savage of a negro, with his hair done up in little tails around his brow, the woolly beard in scant patches under his face. Mr. Arthur, as the negro takes off his fragment of a hat, recognizes him as Colonel Juggins's Jem.

"Good-day, Massa Arthur. Jest one minute. Hope all well, Sar. I want to see you. Any way, I send you ridin' along, an' it comes upon me to tell you—" the boy says, scratching his head, shifting his hoe from hand to hand, looking eagerly at Mr. Arthur, agitated and confused. "I manage he say, you hold your tongue, you fool, none of your business. Orange is a mean like you, but somehow— Look here, Mass Arthur, ebery body say you mighty good man—"

"I am in a hurry, Jem."

"One minute, Sar. Case is dis. Suppose a man owe you money, keep promisin', protnisin', promisin'—"

"Really, Jem, any other time. I have a letter for Mrs. Sorel from Frank," begins Mr. Arthur, touching his spur to his horse; for a beating defect in this gentleman's character is hurry and impatience.

"You better hear me!" It is all the boy says, but there is emphasis so peculiar in the tones, as they fall upon the rider's ears rob of that, he halts his restive horse and rides back.

"You know that man—Peel is his name—Dr. Peel? Ha! needn't tell me, Sar; I kin see you know him. I muffin to say of him, Massa, not one word to say," adds the negro, with excess of depreciation. "He rich, big, siphn-did man. Nebber saw him myself in my life. Nebber heard him say a word to me. Nebber had chance to him in my life; may Great Massa up above strike me dead in dis fence corner if I ebber did!"

"What about him?" asks the rider, with breathless eagerness.

"I hear tell he goin' to marry Miss Anne Wright, some time next week, I reckon."

One instant, only one instant, the minister sits on his horse still and cold and pale as marble. Only one instant, for the next he has put spied toward Mrs. Sorel's house, but toward her house only because it is on the road to Mr. Arthur's home.

Arrived there, he throws the halter of his horse over the post, and hurries in; it will take him but a moment. It is about that which makes causes him thus to stop, and hurry to his bedroom to be one moment there, only one moment, upon his knees—at the side of his bed only to say. Meeting Mrs. Sorel in the passage, he places her letter in her hand and hurries by. Before he has well closed his door he hears her cry. That cry, peculiar to her sex, never uttered by them save when wrung from the deepest agony, by no unknown. Frank is dead, killed probably, dead certainly. Yet he stands trembling with impatience, and listens to the white-haired mother, in the agony of her grief, casts herself upon his bosom, crying:

"Oh, Arthur, Arthur, I knew it was coming, but I can not, can not bear it. Help me, oh my Heavenly Father, help me!"

How strange it seems, how cruel! Mr. Arthur has no word hardly of consolation for her, does not draw her down beside him upon her knees in even the deepest sympathy of his own grief. With but an impassioned word, a mere syllable, in fact, of consolation, he unclasps her aged arms from about him, puts her back gently, firmly, and hastens past with cold, set face.

Fresh impediment. As he walks rapidly down the front walks he meets Mr. Peel coming up with hurried step. She is veiled, but he would recognize the form if it were only by the quick-eyed bearing of his own servant. He at once forgets for one instant all the world beside, and bounds toward her with the truest and strongest instinct it is capable of, to fell the villain who dares to draw rein. What did he say? For God's sake, Colonel Wright, one word with you! Been over in the Yankees? I had cut my own revolver and fired. I assure you, gentlemen;" and Mr. Wright brims the assurance with oaths.

"Mr. Peel is going to be my wife. I didn't even know I laid hold, or intended to touch that musical instrument, see she was playing on the piano at the time; it was over before I knew it. Something in here," says Mr. Wright, gravely, and laying his hand upon his heart, one word! is right hand up that way. Then I fired for his left breast button, last of the row, and—down he goes, dead, I reckon. Mr. Wright, interposes by, "whatever you do, gentlemen, never fire merely at a man. Always aim—I always do—at the dead-center, something like a button, a breastpin, something of the sort on him."

And so they turn to go. Dr. Peel foaming with impatience to get to the side of the man, Brother Barker wishing that he had been on some distant appointment instead of in Somerville when they came for him to marry them. Nor does his dismay decrease when Mr. Wright suddenly turns upon him when they are on the steps of the house.

"What was that you said at the time, parson? For Heaven's sake let me get down and see if he is dead. I've got to do it. You've brought me out to marry Anne and I'll kill you too if you eyes that was it—kill you too, if you try it. You parson you, and say, calling up from your eye, as if it was a grace at table, It is the awful judgment on him of God. It's very curious," adds Mr. Wright, as they enter the door—"in these difficulties I am like a spectator looking on. I know that is done, remember every thing that is said perfectly well, a kind of two of us in the thing at the same moment, a cool one and a hot one! Which is me and which is the devil I never can tell."

Only all this is pale and colorless delineation of Mr. Wright's passion, whose crimson and fervor of his profanity being omitted. As to the facts, they were as he stated.

And the minister lies bleeding, apparently dead, in the road where he fell. His horse, startled by the shots and his rider's fall, had fled from the scene for a few hundred yards, had then stopped to graze, and so had by nightfall found his way to his stable-door, carrying fresh alarm for his owner to a household already sufficiently distressed.

Mrs. Sorel had gone to town with Alice hours before and has not returned. The servants, greatly afflicted by the loss of their "Mass Frank," doubly afflicted by this new calamity—for they are all greatly attached to Mr. Arthur—hasten to inform Robby in the house of the arrival of the riderless steed. A few hours before that sedate little boy was only "Robby;" now he is "Mass Robby" with the servants. His mother, too, has clasped him to her bosom, wept over him, and kissed him as her only child. In spite of his anguish Robby is not without a sense of importance. Sorely afflicted in regard to Mr. Arthur, to whom he is ardently attached, with tears streaming afresh down his cheeks, but with the gravity of the eldest of men, he gives charge to the household to be careful, generally, during his absence, and rides in through the darkening twilight to Somerville, meditating soberly and with a sense of having matured, during the last few hours, years of growth.

Entering at last the house of Mrs. Bowles, we find known at once the long unwelcome, the steals quietly, as is his wont every where, into her chamber. But even Robby's sobriety of soul is startled at the strangely hue upon the face of the lady, lying, a mere shadow of her former self, partly in the arms of his mother, who sits upon the bed—all the illumination of the few years utterly gone, and the two friends more to each other now by far than ever before; while Alice comes and goes silently and gently, not without a pleasure in the reconciliation of the hour, even in her deepest sorrow for her dead brother, and for her mother fast following him. Common affliction has melted every coldness between these two, nude keenly alive by night and during their years of separation, to all they really are to each other. It touches Alice to observe how, in the natural manner of women, the two sorrow-smitten and white-haired friends are more to each other, like the schoolmates of years ago, than mother and daughter.

"Read it yet once more, Eliza dear; just once more, please. Not from the beginning—but anywhere, so that it be being a letter from gentleman," Mrs. Bowles is saying as Robby steals quietly in.

"No officer in the army could have been more ardently beloved—" No, that is the wrong paragraph," Mrs. Sorel says, searching for the passage in the closely and crumpled sheet in her hand, wet with tears, and already known by heart, every line of it, to these three. "Yes, here it is," continues Mrs. Sorel, at last, ceasing from the letter: "It has been my lot to be thrown with many officers from the State of one common birth and the same party of the country during the war; but among them all, I am free to say that Captain Rutledge Bowles stood pre-eminent as a high-toned gentleman and most accomplished soldier. It was only after Colonel Carrington had frequently expressed his hearty approval of the killing of Lieutenant Caldwell, Captain Bowles spoke at all upon the subject; nor then, until Colonel Carrington had pressed Captain Bowles for an utterance of his opinion. The strong manly language used by your lamented son in detestation of the crime in question was but characteristic of the man, as he already evinced himself to be in full. Nor has Colonel Carrington even the excuse of intoxication, which the delirium of his language and conduct would on occasion would seem to indicate. This crime was by found for him who by one your son in the intensity of chagrin and bitterness attending the fall of Charleston. But, in the interest of truth it should be stated, so far as any occasional action on this particular have affected any one, that individual might have better plead it in the case of Captain Bowles, he being a South Carolinian by birth, than Colonel C., who is well known to be a native of Connecticut. And this is the general rule"—

"That will do, Eliza," and the pale sufferer places her thin hand upon the paper. "I thank God for it, Lizzie dear. I did hope, even pray, that Captain Bowles might have died if he must fall there, upon some great field of victory within South Carolina. My heavenly Father has granted that prayer, though not as I thought. He has fallen on that soil—fallen in even a nobler cause—fallen in detestation and denunciation of a dastardly crime: the noblest thing to denounce it, to die for denouncing it, as it was a crime against the man in all the world whom we both—Robby Bowles and myself—have held in greatest dislike. An inscrutable Providence, Lizzie"—and here she wasted hand wanders feebly toward the sunken head—"has been against the South. We won't discuss it, dear. I have tried to understand it; tried, and tried. If you only knew, Eliza," adds the grief-struck woman, with earnest eyes upon the friend on whose bosom she leaned, "how hard I've tried! I've tried to make right things wrong, when Alice here slept sweetly by my side, trying to make it out—trying so very, very hard. I have pine over the whole Black Creek for light, Lizzie. I have wept and prayed so! Don't be offended with me; we won't say any thing more about it; but I can not see how South Carolina was wrong. I know God rules, dear; does nothing but what is right; but we would to have Lizzie.

I can not help it. That Abolitionists should actually conquer us!" and again the frail head goes to the brow, unspeakable bewilderment in her eyes.

"But I rose here my son. Alice—my Frank. Let me read you the letter again." And in quiet tones, but with the tears trickling down her cheeks and glittering upon the white sheet as she reads, Mrs. Sorel again goes over the few words of her letter, brought in the same package with the husband's, telling of the death of her boy, after long sickness, in the hospital at Richmond. The letter is roughly written by a comrade, many words misspelled, but all to the effect that it was the death of a Christian youth fully prepared to die, his last breath filled with messages of love to his mother and Robby, and confident expectations of reunion with them in a world where war is forever unknown. Very peaceful and holy was the death, and full of rest and peace even through the first anguish of the bereaved mother.

"And there in this too, Eliza, about Rutledge Bowles," says the pallid sufferer, returning immediately, though after deepest sympathy with her friend, to her own sorrows. "Alice will tell you I told her, when I recovered from my fainting fit it was my first thought, yet it is now my consolation, it is better he should have died, Lizzie, now that South Carolina is defeated. Rutledge Bowles could not have endured to see it, dear. To live under the rule of Abolitionists would have been to him a living agony and humiliation worse than death. It is better as it is. Though why our heavenly Father should have permitted—" And as the wasted fingers seek the forehead, Robby can no longer keep silence. He has stolen silently by his mother's side, she aware of his presence there, but too absorbed in the sorrow of her friend and herself for her to notice him.

"Oh, mother, mother!" says Robby, the tears beginning to flow, and the sound of his own voice, "Mr. Arthur, Mr. Arthur!" and breaks down.

Alice is seated by the bed, gently drawing out through her hands the long white tresses of her mother, too full of sorrow to speak, but at the name she looks sharply around over her mother can not but remark it, her lips parted, every vestige of color gone from her cheeks.

"Oh, mother, Mrs. Arthur is killed! His horse—" But Robby can get no farther, for Alice has fallen forward upon the bosom of Mrs. Sorel in a faint, and all is confusion.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

It is somewhat curious—even if one visits a first-class restaurant on a Sunday—to notice the compulsory change of "appearance" which some unthinking epicures are forced to make since the passage of the new excise law. An attentive waiter at Delmonico's arranges with care and nicety a cozy table for a gentleman who is evidently quite "at home" there. The order for dinner is given, ending with: "And bring me a bottle of Royal Rose." "No wine at all served to-day, Sir." The thoughtless gentleman looks at his watch—manifestly he has not been to church, and apparently has not once thought of its being Sunday! "No wine? Why, Sir, not to-day?" "All" responds the disgusted applicant, glancing reflectively at the cut-out tube in his immediate vicinity; "not even another investigating glance—"bring me a bottle of Champagne cider." And this order being complied with, and the opening "pop" seeking his imagination, the repentant tries to fancy himself enjoying real Champagne.

The workings of the Excise Law are awaking from discussion on the question of temperance; and in an unexpected quarter, the American evangelical movement has enlarged views, and a final triumph of right principles.

A Portland paper remarks—and the suggestion is worth the attention of our citizens—"The authorities ought to establish water fountains at various points about the city to meet the wants of the thirsty. People must have something to drink. It is never wise to cut off a popular and vicious indulgence without giving an innocent and healthful substitute in its stead."

In a little town away "down East," efforts were once made to have a system of town groups for the convenience of the people. The matter was brought up at a townmeeting, but was voted down because the treasury was rather low. Whereupon an orator made the following effective speech: "There's Mr. Jones, he's gin up selling milk; you've just voted that we can't have water pipes, and the Legislature says we sha'n't have any liquor! We've got to have you inside of snow on the ground, and when that's gone we shall be in a fix! Then what are we going to drink?"

Perhaps people might take to nature's pure beverage if they had a good chance to get it. It has been stated that during the summer a "jar of iced water at the door of every liquor shop will do more to diminish the rum-seller's custom than a policeman on guard." Numerous water fountains have recently been established in London, and have had a marked effect upon the beer shops. One dealer threatened legal proceedings against the authorities for allowing a drinking fountain to be opened near his house, alleging that it had diminished his returns more than twenty-five per cent.

The Parisian journals announce that an awful discovery has just been made with regard to the wholesale destruction of the feathered tribe in France. It seems that the "gigantic grenadier" of little birds who are so serviceable in French markets are killed by poison! It is asserted that tremendous quantities of our cousins are sold for the purpose. The drug is boiled with grain and spread over the fields at every period of the year. This information has created not a little alarm among epicures.

It is not long since there was an extensive poisoning by lead, in Middleton, N. Y. Great numbers of people being attacked by a virulent disease, which exhibited positive indications of lead poisoning, it was found, after much investigation, that the lead was conveyed into the stomachs of the sufferers by bread and meat, manufactured at a mill in the vicinity. It appeared that some of the millstones were old, and cavities in them had been filled with common lead instead of the usual cement. Of course the attrition detached particles of lead from the stone and mingled them almost imperceptibly with the flour. The lead, when fermented and subjected to the baking process, was immediately transformed into carbonate of lead, the deadliest of all lead poisons. Bread of this kind was a little better than if spread with white lead as a substitute for butter. Many died from its effects, while happily many were saved by having taken the lead in such large quantities as to produce counter action. But scores were deprived of health and strength. People who prayed and deal in articles of food should have sufficient knowledge to prevent such reprehensible carelessness as endangers the lives of multitudes.

Strawberries have been very abundant notwithstanding the unusually cold season; and "ice Cream and Strawberry Festivals" have been very fashionable, as they generally are in June. These festivals are in many cases given for the pinafore or benefit of Sabbath-schools; and the little folks enjoy them vastly, to say nothing of the "children of larger growth," who are so busy selling the cool things for the young ones, instead of replenishing the Sunday-school Library. And speaking of selling good things reminds us of a modern, which contains a suggestion that any charitable lady is at liberty to follow—if she pleases!

A salesman recently went to the sale of fancy articles lately held at the Ministry of War, Paris, for the benefit of the poor. He bought nearly at the end of the day what was the price of a beautiful cigar-case. "Two hundred francs," was the reply. "The trifling sum!" he said, with a laugh. "And this jewel-case?" "Eight hundred francs." "Nothing," said the salesman, with a contemptuous air. "Do you wish for any thing else?" said the lady. "Ah!" replied he, "what I desire to see is the company with any of these articles, but fix a price." "What do you mean?" "To kiss you for it." The lady's cheeks reflected, and replied, "Three thousand francs." The kind generally raised the proffered hand, and with some hesitation—but what will not charitable ladies do for the poor?—kissed the gentleman, who turned to look at your hair. 'That will be six thousand francs." "That is nothing," said the lady, and, running the lock of hair which the lady cut off for him. "Six and three are nine thousand francs." He ordered a carriage for the lady, his lordship departed pleased with his bargains."

There is a good moral to be deduced from a short poem in which we find an extract, as it is from the pen of William D. Mornage:

THE TWO DESTROYERS.

Once on a time a pious Moslem, saying
His morning worship in their spicy of praying,
Just as the sun had risen, had lit the skies,
Beheld a phantom through the mist arise—
A figure gaunt and grim, like that of death.
"What art thou?" said the saint, with timid breath.
"I am the Pestilence!"
"And whither tends thy race?"
"To slay ten thousand men in my place."
"Go not, I pray thee, if such prayer may be."
"In vain I vow, I must my vow fulfill—I go!"
"Go then, if Allah urge thy path of gloom,
But the first thousand bear a message from me:
But in the prophet's name I do implore,
When thou hast slain ten thousand, slay no more!"
"To bear is to obey!"

The vision passed,
And o'er a multitude its shadow cast.
After the plague had ceased, the saint his place
And hour in which it first unveiled its face,
Found, with pleasure, that but nine thousand fell.
Qoth spake the holy man: "Whence comest thou?"
"From yonder place."
"How many hast thou slain?"
"Victims of mine, ten thousand souls make up all!"
"Thou liest! there are twenty thousand dead!"
"To thee with Moslem life the phantom said,
"Full twenty thousand have death's power confest.
I smote ten thousand, fear struck down the rest."

A singular account is given in a recent Mobile paper of a youthful prisoner, about 18 years of age, confined in the jail of that city, who could not be induced to take nourishment like him knife was plotted in irons, the strongest and most intricate, but all to no purpose. Then the officer commanding the prison resolved to write to the parents of the lad, after which he put on a tight-fitting pair of patent leather boots. The prisoner was then taken out, and had put on a pair of cuffs attached by a short chain, above his wrists, which he was ordered to raise to a level with the wrist, which extended down to the shackles which were closely fitted and locked on his ankles. The officer then loosely remarked to him: "Now, my boy, you may wiggle yourself out of that dress I will guarantee that the sheriff will not be able to get you out of it." "I will see," said he, as you behave yourself you will never again be bound in such a manner." The prisoner was taken to a hanging, and in less than three minutes after he was left alone he stood without an iron upon him—the deed evidently being accomplished by the aid of hand. He said that he was a native of New York city, and has graduated from the Tombs.

The London Queen speaks with a mixture of earnestness and commendation of the "Spectator" newspaper hat, which so many brunettes, paying reckless homage to fashion, are miserably parting with in despair. The article is simply ruinous; one that, if followed again and again will change one silken tresses of brown or black into something, for color, like a singed cat's back; for texture not unlike a cowlick's tuft of picked and unravelled cotton. At any rate, brunettes should be cautioned. Having bleached their tresses, they should go into a darkened room and look upon their sad wreck. The information would be painful, but fashion does not haul pain. It is cruel and unfeeling, but the consequent agony is not worth trying. We have seen a portion of a dead negro's skin bleached white; wherefore there would seem to be hope of genius to a live brunette. "The Spectator announces that there is now sold in Paris a dye which instantly changes auburn hair into raw nose, pale pinkish gold, which is nearly instantaneous, and never fails, or can fail. It is called original, is the golden eighteenth of an ounce, and has only one trifling drawback, which those who want it probably will not mind. It kills, but is partially cured as swiftly as those of arsenic would.

A very coquettish-looking vehicle is now the fashion in the Bois de Boulogne. It is hung on the finest springs, and is like the rest of a water-guard—"the sentinel" one. There is but room for the fair driver and her petticoat, and she flirts it as complacently as an oyster does its shell. There are no hangers-on, either tiger behind or lion at the side; and on account of the peculiarities it is called the Excise-wire by the ladies, and the Epicier by the gentlemen.

They rather out-do us in England in regard to matrimonial advertisements, judging from the following, which we quote the subject with Irish readiness to aid desiring wives:

An Emily Jenny, just nineteen, fair, blue eyes, and handsome, would like to be married as early as possible. Husband, who is requested to apply early, having gilded hair, wishes to marry a tall young man, about twenty-four years of age.

Violet wants to be married to a tall man. She is tall, and very good-looking.

Lalla Rookh would dearly like to be married. She moves in first-class society, and has £200 a year. She is eighteen, tall, and strikingly handsome.

Some of the applicants put the matter rather upon the ground of mutual destiny:

Mary G., who has good looks, but does not wish to speak of them, wants to be married. She can read her Bible, and knows that marriage is the destiny and honor of woman. She is twenty-three.

Catherine E. B., who has dark brown hair, and soft brown eyes, with pretty features and nice figure, wishes to fulfill her woman's mission, and marry. She will have money.

Victor Hugo's home is situated in the most lovely spot that ever landscape painter dreamed of. Placed upon a height, it commands the whole island. And that charming horizon of the sea where nothing seems to trammel the flight of even genius itself. The house is celebrated in Guernsey, where it excites lively curiosity. Wonders are related of it, enhanced by the mystery overhanging a threshold till now never crossed by the Guernsey world; it is said to contain furniture worthy of an enchanter's palace. The apartments and galleries have been entirely constructed from designs by Victor Hugo; he passed three years in investing them. The rarest curiosities adorn the interior; for Victor Hugo, who loves to live in the past, has a mania for antique furniture.

Hairdressers in general, and ladies in particular, will be delighted at the good news which comes from a country situated between Nicaragua and Nicaragua. It is stated that there is a territory inhabited by the Mosquitos—at the first, but human beings—who have just been discovered. The ladies and gentlemen of the tribe are very small, but their hair would rejoice the heart of a Truefitt, being excessively long and excessively beautiful, parting in the middle in the style called Tom Noddy, and descending on each side for two yards or more according to longitudian. The color is even varied, and is some of it a light yellow, showing how nature adapts itself to fashion at the right moment. The officers of the frigate Florida, which visited that coast, also have had the honor of discovering these sons and heirs of the Mosquito land, have even house a large supply as locks of hair to their lady-loves and sweethearts—and even for a six inches in four-and-twenty hours. We can think of nothing like it except Jack's somewhat bean-stalk, which authentically-described plant is nevertheless not spoken of as good to eat, whereas this relish is said to be as palatable as it is nourishing. The pods are its edible portion, and when half grown you may pickle them or eat them as a component part in a salad. When they are allowed to grow you may blow, and they type how a combination of asparagus and green peas.

DREAM-HAUNTED.

I HAD taken a lease of Gledhills of my friend Mr. Lomond. The latter, before he would consider the business settled, insisted upon my sleeping one night at Gledhills. "Dobson and his wife, who have charge of the house, will find you a tolerable dinner, and make you up a comfortable bed. I will walk over in the morning at ten and see you; and then, if you are still in the same mind that you are in now, I will have the agreement drawn up at once, and you can enter upon your occupancy the following day."

The autumn day was drawing to a close when I found myself walking up the avenue toward the old mansion of Gledhills. An old man answered my summons at the door. He bowed respectfully at sight of me, and informed me that Mr. Lomond had sent word that I was about to become the owner of Gledhills, and that every thing was prepared for my reception. As I crossed the threshold the great door closed behind me with a dull, heavy crash, that vibrated through every corner of the house, and awoke a foreboding echo in my heart. Preceded by my ancient guide, whom (as well as others) I had best almost double, I crossed the desolate-looking entrance-hall, passed up the grand staircase, and so through a pair of folding-doors into the drawing-room, beyond which was a suit of smaller rooms, of which two had now been set apart for my use. How chill and cheerless every thing looked in the cold light of the dying day! Now that the glamour of sunshine rested no longer on the scene, my fancy refused to invest any of those bare, desolate rooms with the pleasant attributes of home; and already, in my secret mind, I half-repented my facile eagerness in being so willing to accept, without further experience, this worm-eaten old mansion, together with the ghosts, by the ghosts of a hundred dead-and-gone folks, as a shelter for my household gods, a home for all that I held dear on earth.

The tea-room set aside for me I found to be comfortably furnished, in a neat but inexpensive style; but when I understood from the old man that ever since the death of the last tenant, three years before, they had been furnished and set aside, ready for the reception of any chance visitors, like myself, who, either for their own sake or that of Mr. Lomond, might decide to pass a night at Gledhills, and that three or four would-be occupants before me had so slept there a night each, and had gone on their several ways next morning, never to be seen under that roof again, I began to think that there might perhaps be something more in Mr. Lomond's stipulation than was visible on the surface.

Having dined, and done ample justice to Mr. Lomond's choice wine, and being possessed of no measure by the demon of unrest, I took my cigar and strolled along the corridor, and so came presently into the great empty drawing-room, in which the moonbeams were now playing a ghostly game of hide-and-seek, with the uncarpeted and destitute of furniture, and its oaken floor creaked and groaned beneath my tread, as though it were burdened with some dreadful secret which it would fain reveal, but could not. Outside each of the three long, narrow windows with which the room was lighted was a small balcony, above which stretched a veritable orgiasse of lawn, set here and there with a gay basket of flowers, the whole being shut in by a clump of conifer firs. I have said that the room was quite destitute of furniture, but I found after a time that it still contained one relic of its more prosperous days, in the shape of a family portrait, which still hung over the mantle-piece, as it had hung for half a century or more. When I became aware of this fact I fetched one of the candles out of my sitting-room, in order that I might examine the picture more closely. It was a full-length portrait of a man in the military costume that was in vogue toward the end of last century. The face was very handsome, with a proud, resolute beauty of its own, that would have been very attractive for a vague, ideal picture—a showthing—a hint of something tiger-like and cruel lurking under the surface of that artificial smile, which the artist had caught with rare fidelity, and had fixed on the canvas forever. It must have been something in the better traits of the commonplace that taught me to see a likeness to Mr. Lomond; and I could only conclude that the portrait before me was that of some notable ancestor of the present master of Gledhills.

The fatigues of the day and the solitude to which I was condemned drove me to bed at an early hour; but there was something about the novelty of my position that precluded sleep for a long time after I had put out the light, and I remember hearing every clock strike twelve while I was still desperately wide awake, but that is the last thing I do remember, and I suppose that I must have slept for a few minutes later, while still in the act of assessating myself, for I have no sleep there was for me on that night, but I was conscious when I fell into those dreamers, and which, in many cases, is quite as vivid as the consciousness of real life, but throughout the strange, wild drama that followed I was without any individuality of my own; I had all the consciousness of a spectator without the responsibility of one. I was nothing; I had no existence in my own dream; I was merely the witness of certain unusual occurrences, which took place without any reference to me, and which I was powerless to prevent or influence in the slightest degree.

Before me was the drawing-room at Gledhills—I recognized it at once by the portrait of the soldier over the fire-place. The walls, painted of a dingy sea-green, were hung with numerous pictures and engravings in rich frames. A thick Autusson carpet covered the floor, and in the huge fire-place a wood fire, that had nearly burned itself down to ashes, was slowly expiring. The furniture was chintz-covered, and curtains of chintz draped the three high narrow windows. Standing in one corner, between the quaintly-carved legs of a mahogany chiffonier, was a tall Mandarin jar, with an open-work lid, from which was exhaled a faint indescribable perfume, as of the bruised sweetness of a hundred flowers; in the opposite corner stood a harp; books richly bound were scattered about the room, which was lighted by a number of wax-candles fixed in lustres over the mantle-piece.

Seated at a little table—a lovely girl, eighteen or twenty years old, making-believe to be busy with her embroidery, but with a mind evidently preoccupied by some more important subject. She had on a short-waisted white dress, after the fashion of those days, from which her long narrow skirts fell away in massive folds, utterly guiltless of all artificial modes of extension of circumference. Her face was beautiful, and she had the air of a person quite conscious of that fact. Her complexion was one of regular features there was something resolute and proud, that carried the mind back, as by an instinct, to the portrait over the fire-place. She had inherited the thick masses of her chestnut hair, and they now fell low down over her shoulders, confined only by a narrow band of white ribbon. Round her neck was a thin chain of gold, from which hung a locket, which she drew every now and then from the bosom of her dress, and pressed with feverish eagerness to her lips. The same impatience was visible in the way in which she would put a few quick strokes into her embroidery, and then pause, with the needle in her fingers, to listen intently, and so lapse into a reverie for a short space of time, from which she would wake up in a minute or two with a start, and begin to ply her needle again as restlessly as before.

That same impatience of a person impatiently waiting came at last—a low, clear, peculiar whistle, heard by me so distinctly through the midst of my dream, and so unmistakably for what it was, that when I could afterward reproduce it exactly. The young lady started to her feet the moment the signal fell on her ear. For a moment she hesitated in obedience; her soft lips pouted into a smile; while from her bosom upward a lovely flush spread swiftly, as through fine lawn, to the roots of her golden tresses. Then, with a hurried glance at the mirror, she caught up her candle, and, with a quick, light step, glided across the room, and so out into the corridor, which she drew every now and then from the bosom of her dress, and pressed with feverish eagerness to her lips. The same impatience was visible in this batants, she staggered to her feet. Her lips moved, but no sound came from them. Perhaps she was asking herself whether it were not all a hideous nightmare, which the first breath of reality would dissipate forever. With the same mingled look of horror and unbelief on her face she watched the two men coming down the room again, for Colonel Lomond was still slightly overborne by his more youthful antagonist. The rapiers clashed together; bright sparks flew from their polished blue-black surface, as they struck each other, and bent and quivered like things of life in the grasp of the sinewy hands that held them.

The combatants were just opposite the spot where the half-demented Leonore was standing like one incapable of motion, when suddenly, at a movement in tierce, the point of Colonel Lomond's rapier snapped off; an exchange which Varrel instantly followed up with a dextrous stroke, which sent the Colonel's broken weapon flying across the room. Leonore, with the quick instinct of love, darted her father's danger; and the same moment that the rapier was twisted out of his hand she sprang forward with a shriek, and, hurriedly as he tried to shield him with her body from what she knew must follow, and the sword of Varrel, aimed at her father's heart with all the strength which hate and the desire of vengeance could lend to such a thrust, passed instead through the body of the hapless girl. Her father's arms caught her as she was falling. "Papa—Varrel—forgive," she murmured in his ear; then a stream of blood burst from her lips, she shuddered slightly, and was dead.

Colonel Lomond pressed his quivering lips tenderly on her forehead; then lifting her in his arms, he carried her to a couch. "Lie there for a little while, sweet, foolish darling," he said. "Perhaps I may join thee in heaven before long."

Varrel, who was like a man half-crazed, would have rung for help, but Colonel Lomond, by a gesture, forbade him to do so. "You and I, Sir," said the Colonel, "have still our little business to arrange."

"Great Heaven! what would you more?" exclaimed Sir Derwent.

"Revenge my daughter's death!" said Lomond. "Her death was the pure accident."

"Granted. She died to save my life, and that life I now devote to avenging her memory. What I said before I say again—only one of us shall quit this room alive. Here are two pistols: one of them is loaded, the other is unloaded. Choose one of them. In five minutes that clock on the chimney-piece will strike the hour. At the first stroke we will fire across this table; and may Heaven have mercy on the soul of one of us!"

"It would be murder!" said Varrel, in a low voice, while a cold sweat broke out on his sallow face.

"Call it by what name you will," said Lomond; "but as I have said, so it shall be. Dare to refuse, and by the ancient Fiend of Darkness, whose true son you are, I will thrash you with yonder whip within an inch of your life. And send you forth into the world branded forever as a coward and a rogue!"

Sir Derwent wiped the perspiration off his forehead with his perfumed handkerchief, and his dry lips moved in faint protest. His courage was beginning to waver. The slow, patient ferocity of his enemy was not without its effect upon him.

"Choose!" said Colonel Lomond, as he laid a brace of pistols on the table. Varrel hesitated for an instant; then he did, and Lomond smiled, grimly. No fresh arrangement of position was necessary, they being already on opposite sides of the table, on which each Lomond's embroidery was displaying, as she had cast it aside in the first flutter of hearing her lover's signal.

"Colonel Lomond, I must make a last protest against this bloody business," said Varrel.

Again the Colonel smiled. "In ten seconds," he said, "the clock will strike. Be ready."

There was a great contrast between the two men as they stood thus, fronting what for one of them was a terrible strait. Colonel Lomond's bronzed cheek looked even darker than usual, and his eyes seemed to burn with intense hate as he stood quietly at his antagonist from under his lowering brows; but his extended arm was firm as a bar of steel. Varrel was terribly nervous. His face had faded to a dull bluish white; he pressed one hand to his chest occasionally, as if to still the throbbing heart beneath, while the other, which held the pistol, trembled slightly in spite of him.

Four seconds—three seconds—two seconds. The deathly breathing stillness that pervaded the room was something awful. One second. The silvery bell of the little French clock had not completed its first stroke when the two triggers were pulled.

A flash, a report, and a gush of smoke from one of the weapons, and Sir Derwent Varrel, shot through the heart, fell back dead.

So perishes a thorough scoundrel!" said Colonel Lomond as he gazed into the face of his dead enemy.

Suddenly a door opened, and showed a very old lady, with white hair, and clad in a white dressing-robe, standing on the entrance. From the movements of her hands you understood at once that she was blind, or nearly so.

"Henry! Henry! where are you?" she cried. "Some one fired a pistol just now. Oh, tell me that you are not hurt!" and she advanced a step or two into the room.

A spasm of anguish passed over the face of Colonel Lomond. "I am here and well, mother," he said. "Pray, return to your own room. I am sorry to have disturbed you."

"And Lenore," said the old lady, plaintively, "why has not Lenore been to kiss me, and say good-night? Has the child gone to bed?"

"Lenore is asleep, mother," said the Colonel, in a whisper. "We must not disturb her. She shall come to you in the morning."

"Strange—strange," murmured the old lady; "she never forgot me before;" and with that she turned and went slowly away, groping with her hands before her; and the Colonel, falling on his knees, buried his face in the white dress of his dead daughter. At which point the whole machinery of my dream dissolved away, and I awoke.

There was no more sleep for me that night. So lifelike and vivid was my extraordinary dream, so much did it seem like a part of my own personal experience, that the effect left by it on my mind was not lightly to be shaken off. There was wild cry as she flung herself into her father's arms, the voices of Varrel and Lomond in angry dispute, seemed still to echo in my brain; and I felt that every minute incident of that terrible tragedy must henceforth be, as it were, a part of my own life. Impelled by some vague feeling, I went to watch. I quitted my bedroom, and wandered, half-dressed, into the great desolate drawing-room at the scene of all the strange incidents of my dream. The ghostly splendor of the moonlight filled it no longer; it was as cold, dark, and silent, as some vault. When I looked in the doorway, longing, and yet afraid to enter, a gust of night-wind sweeping up the valley rattled the windows of the old mansion, and what seemed like a low, responsive sigh, came to me out of the gloom, a sigh so unutterably sad, that, with a shudder, I stepped backward and shut the door.

I was very glad when ten o'clock came, and brought Mr. Lomond, punctual to the minute. "It is only what I expected," he said, "when I had given him an outline of my singular dream; "and I may now tell you, Sir, that precisely the same thing occurred to myself. I strongly last night is dreamed by every one, no matter who they may be, the first time they sleep in Gledhills, and never afterward; and this Curse—for I may truly call it by that name—has hung over the house from the night on which the unfortunate Leonore was seduced by an imagination, was worked out in all its dismal reality within those walls. Now you will understand why I requested you to sleep one night at Gledhills before finally deciding that you would take the house; and it remains for you to consider whether your wife and family will say is delicate, could undergo such an ordeal as she would assuredly have to pass through the first night of her sojourn under their roof."

I decided that she could not endure the trial, and gave up Gledhills.

A STORY FOR GROWN PEOPLE.

BY A VERY LITTLE BOY.

"ARN how would you like it yourself?" said Willie's fairy godmother, knitting away very fast on her spider's silk stockings.

Willie's mamma opened her eyes wide, under the mantle border of her night-cap. "You shouldn't be dressing bell, you understand; and the fairy godmother having slipped down the chimney, had perched herself on the back of the chair sat in spectacles and high-crowned cap, with her legs twisted around the post, looking more like a nightmare than a real fairy godmother.

And, said mamma, yawning:

"But one must have discipline. you know."

"I agree to discipline," said the fairy, sharply. "So to commence with, get up; you should be ashamed to be lounging in bed at this hour. If you could see how the habit of springing up promptly at the first tinkle of the bell."

Now if mamma was any thing at this particular moment she was sleepy, and she put her nose down among the pillows, and gave herself a little twist, and would have liked very well not to hear the fairy godmother.

"What a perverse, unmanageable person you are!" said the fairy godmother. "If you could see now the expression of your face, and all because I require of you something that is for your good! I love sleep as much as you do, but then, mamma, not the brown dress, but the gray one, if you please!"

"But why not—"

"Do you answer me back?" cried the fairy; "the gray dress I say, and no arguments."

"But it is so—common-looking," said mamma.

"Silence!" commanded Willie's fairy godmother, with such a look in her little black eyes that mamma thought it best not to say any more, but get into the gray dress as fast as possible, though she disliked it, and only wore it on dismal occasions like washing days. It fitted ill, and she felt ill-dressed, and she was very wrathful at being twitched out of her sleep, and thought how you know what had happened to the pudding by the time that the old lady had tripped up chimney again. It was burned to a cinder.

Mamma was miserably vexed.

"You have as little patience as your son," calmly observed the fairy godmother. "When Hal Green offered to lend him his pony he rushed home to ask your permission for the ride; but, you remember, you were engaged with Mrs. Tuttle, who was on one of her endless histories, and you would not permit him to speak; and so he sat counting the minutes, and lost the finest day of the season. Patience is was too late for the ride. I remember you reproved him for his want of resignation."

There was no excuse for further pudding attempts, and finding a book mamma sat down to forget her annoyances and herself with. Just as she reached the interesting chapter she heard the fairy godmother:

"Mamma! mamma!"

Away ran mamma, with "What is wanted?" and—

"I wish you would go up in the attic and hunt me some spiders' webs," said Willie's godmother. "I am almost at the end of my ball of silk."

"How disagreeable!" muttered mamma, and was instantly rebuked with,

"How selfish you are! I am sorry to find you so disobliging."

Mamma found the spider's webs, tore back to her book, reached the middle of the interesting chapter, and heard the fairy godmother again.

"Mamma! mamma! I wish you would come and hold this spider's silk while I reel it."

"Tiresome!" muttered mamma, and, giving up her book in despair, sat down at her sewing when the spider's silk was wound.

"You hold your work very awkwardly," said the fairy godmother; and presently,

"Why do you not manage better with your children? Do you hear them now?"

And ten stitches after,

"What a sulky expression you wear! It is really unwomanly-like. Why are you not more pleasant and cheerful?"

And when she had nearly completed the garment,

"Mamma, put up your work," said the fairy, suddenly.

"I have only ten stitches more," urged mamma.

"But put it away at once," commanded the dame; "I require instant and perfect obedience."

Mamma folded away the frock, sticking the needle in it very carefully, as if it had been the fairy.

"And how has our mamma been?" said papa, coming in just then.

The fairy was her bed.

"We have a bad report to-day, I am afraid. Mamma has been sulky, disobliging, impertinent, and rebellious. I am really pained by her perversity."

"Are you?" cried mamma. "Why then did you take such pains to bring about all these fine results? You commenced the day by a disagreeable and perfectly unnecessary restriction about my dress. Because I did not endure it with a smiling face you proceeded to inflict on me a grievous and irreparable disappointment; and not satisfied with that, you called the family attention to my ill-humor, omitting all mention of the cause, and forbidding me to explain. You were worried on through the day with ceaseless reproofs and commands, and then rebuked me because I did not look cheerful under the discipline. You spoiled an entire morning by refusing me a moment's attention. You broke in on our quiet evening on the most absurd pretext, and then exclaim that I am irritated. You yourself have been the cause of what you so much dislike. You were pert and cross and free with unkind and vexatious supervision, that would strain to their utmost the principles and patience of a saint."

"You shocked me, then," said the fairy, "that you, a grown woman, would be fretted out of amiability and self-control by my system; but pray, Madam, is it not your own? and when did you ever find fault with it before? When you inflicted on your son a disappointment as unbearable as the one you yourself have suffered, you never asked what caused the ill-temper, for which you punished him, or if the punishment was not too great for the offence. Then you follow him about all day, with continual fault-finding about very small matters, you expect that he will bear with a smiling face and mend his ways at once; but when you are pursued in the same way you find that it only makes you cross, and you are ready to snap at your nurture; and yet he is a little boy, and you are a grown mamma. When Willie's games or project is spoiled, because little boys must not interrupt grown-up folk, we hear him still it is too late, you are shocked that he is sulky and aggrieved; and yet how intolerable you find it when a little boy, unable to control his delightful occupation, at the height of its interest, without even a look of dissatisfaction; and yet how hard you, a grown mamma, find it to practice what you preach! You say I am the cause of your shortcomings of today. If that is so, then, in a limited degree, you are the cause of much of your son's naughtiness; for I thought I could not do better than take as the system of such an experienced and sensible mamma as yourself, and I have simply copied you to the letter; and if the system works so ill when exercised by yourself, it is impossible that, though rules and a steady and firm system of discipline are absolutely required in a family, that a system, however wise, enforced with the utter disregard of the tastes and feelings of its object, is a tyranny, even when enforced by a mamma—that a few trifling points are as indispensable to a boarding fence; but that restrictions and regulations, thickset all through the day, are so many traps and stumbling-blocks for unwary little Willies; and that a mamma ought not to require more patience, self-control, and fortitude of a little child than she could use herself in precisely similar circumstances!"

Papa smiled, mamma pouted; and I, Willie, having heard it all, have written it all down for the benefit of those poor grown people who have been so busy all their lives in teaching us that they have never had any time to teach themselves.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH.

MARRIAGE OF A COLORED SOLDIER.

THIS wedding seemed to me somewhat remarkable, because not only the bride was only fifteen, and the groom only about seventeen years old. A lady, looking at the sketch, thought the decent appearance of the parlor and the taste shown in the bride's apparel exaggerated for the sake of appearance. This, however, was not the case. Every thing is given. This, however, was not the case. Every thing is given just as it appeared. The bridegroom was a musician, a straight, well-built young fellow in his best uniform. The bride was in light-colored muslin over a dress low enough to meet the requirements of the fashionable society of New York. They listened thoughtfully to the worthy chaplain's remarks; and the whole affair was creditable to the colored folks assembled on the occasion. As we left they were all sitting down to a very tempting festal supper, and the band—of which the new-made husband was a member—was playing outside. It was not an aristocratic assemblage, but there was a full party, and it is safe to surmise that the company enjoyed themselves.

SCENE IN FRONT OF WASHINGTON HOTEL AT VICKSBURG.

The scene in front of the Washington Hotel is characteristic. As you go South you notice the gradual disappearance of reading and writing rooms, and of decent sitting-rooms for the guests. Thus the sidewalk becomes the only available place for loungers. Being more limited than in larger cities, when, in Vicksburg, the pavement is covered with chairs, there is not much space for passengers, especially ladies, to get by. They do not seem to mind it though, but thread their way through the gentlemen and the tobacco-juice with commendable fortitude. It is not agreeable to ladies in New York to have to pass the groups of loungers at the hotels. What would they do if the aforesaid loungers brought chairs out and spread themselves all over the sidewalk, smoking, spitting, wrangling, and so forth?

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JUNE, 1866.—[SEE PAGE 414.]

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JUNE.

THE rain and the east wind having at last given place to bright sunshine and moderately warm weather, ladies' toilets, which during the past month were only in course of development, now exhibit a very decided change. The most striking invention of the moment is certainly the robe en fourreau—jacket, skirt, and jupe being all of the same material, and all trimmed to correspond. The jacket is usually very short, and generally made so as to open a little on the figure, in which case it is merely fastened at the neck. The skirt, which commonly has a slight trimming half-way up its seams, is looped up in festoons, to the ends of which silk tassels are sometimes suspended; while beneath it is displayed the jupe, trimmed in a somewhat similar style with scollops, vandykes, rosettes, crossbars, checks, diamonds, or other geometric patterns. Occasionally the jupe, instead of being of the same material as the robe itself, and trimmed to correspond with it, is of plain silk of the exact color of the trimming of the robe, with perhaps a rather or double rouleau of ribbon running round the bottom. These dresses are made in almost every variety of material.

The robes displayed by the "grand monde" recently at Longchamps, when the great race for the Grand Prix de Paris came off, were of the most magnificent description, and comprised the very latest varieties of the mode and all the colors of the rainbow—leaden blue, green, puce, and other dull color silks—the brilliancy of the last was subdued, however, by its being covered entirely over with open black lace; striped foulards are also de Chambéry in rose-color, porcelain blue, violet, green, and occasionally an silver gray or white ground. Some were made en fourreau, and the wearers of these, with their chapeaux Lamballe, merely wanted crooks in their hands to look very like those accredited elegant and most artificial-looking shepherdesses which one meets with in the pictures of Boucher and WATTEAU. The majority of robes were, however, with trains of considerable length, and almost the whole of them were made with jackets of the same material, and commonly cut into the most fantastic forms. Thus, some had long lappets hanging down in front and still longer lappets hanging behind, looking not unlike a bird's tail; others were elaborately notched and scolloped round the edges, and many had long open sleeves that hung down almost as low as the knees. The lappets were fastened with elegant bands round the waist, but, when the jacket was exceedingly short, it hung quite loose, open at the neck. These robes, when of some positive color, were trimmed with white or black lace, and, occasionally, with straw passementerie, the effect of which was extremely beautiful when the lighter shades and the striped patterns were trimmed; for the most part, with satin ribbon. The predominating colors of the flowers in the bonnets, and also the bonnet-strings, were almost invariably of the precise tint of the trimming of the robe; or, where the robe was of a decided color and trimmed with lace, of the same shade as the robe itself.

If the spectacle which Longchamps presented may be regarded as any indication of the coming mode, the days of crinoline are certainly numbered. The majority of the more elegantly-dressed women seem to have entirely abandoned it. These magnificent robes, with long trains, worn with a plain white jupe, with a broad ruche at the bottom of it, certainly looked most graceful without its adventitious aid, though it must be confessed that the robe en fourreau, spite of the fullness of its looped-up skirt, looks somewhat scanty when worn without crinoline.

Muslins are just now coming into wear, and many of the new patterns are not only exceedingly brilliant in color, but tasteful in design. Floral patterns, consisting of large wreaths and bouquets, and long, trailing clusters of flowers, certainly predominate, though robes, with borders of Arabesque-like patterns, seem likely to become most fashionable.

For evening dress something like a contest may be said to be going on between foulards and other materials of similar tints and small patterns and striped and other foulards of the most brilliant hues. The novelties among the former may be mentioned the foulard cerise, the pattern of which is composed of flying birds in gold-color silk; secondly, a foulard, with rose-leaves, sprigs, and buds scattered indiscriminately over the ground; and, thirdly, a foulard, with feathers of different hues symmetrically arranged. Among the richer kinds of foulards may be chosen those with carmine and blue, or violet, or turquoise-blue stripes, alternated with clusters of flowers or simple white daisies on silver-gray grounds; and one with a pattern formed of peacocks' feathers of the most brilliant and most varying red tints elegantly disposed on a ground of pearly white. Other evening dresses are of poult de Chambéry, striped with the gayest colors. When the corsage differs from the robe itself, it is not unfrequently composed of an entire-deux of fine lace and puffs of tulle.

Ball dresses are of white tulle, sometimes with delicate artificial flowers tastefully arranged upon the skirt, in other cases with rouleaux of white or some light color satin at the bottom of the skirt, the corsage being trimmed to correspond, and occasionally of white tulle embroidered over with silver thread.

There is no particular change to be noted with regard to chapeaux, except that the tulle, or muslin, or net strings, which are now worn extremely wide, have generally a blonde edging to them; the wreath, too, when joined together at the ends, falls now as frequently over the chignon as upon the breast. Below is a description of a few chapeaux observed at Longchamp.

First, a chapeau of cerise color net partially covered with white lace, and with long glass beads hanging round the rim. In the front of the bonnet, which is disposed at the top, in the style of the Tudor cap, is a full-blown rose; a branch of rose-buds hangs at the left side. The strings are of cerise color ribbon. Next, a chapeau of rice straw, almost entirely covered on one side by a large heart-shaped ornament, which is open, and having some small heart-shaped ornaments in a puffing of net to form the front. A bunch of heart's-ease forms the broad net strings (edged with blonde) immediately under the chin. Another bonnet was of some delicate Italian straw, having a full quilling of lace round the crown and a full round the rim about an inch from the edge, and a similar band across the crown. The trimming consisted principally of large purple grapes, with rich brown and green leaves fruited over with silver. Other chapeaux were wreathed round and between the brim and the crown with pearl, and one had a wreath of ivy and fig leaves, with small figs hanging in clusters over the front, the whole being of white straw material.

At Longchamp most of the parasols were of white or some delicate color silk, a few of them being trimmed with white lace. Attempts are, however, being made to introduce parasols wreathed round the edges with artificial flowers or embroidered over with ciphers and coats of arms, with lace-bands or bunches of flowers, all in their proper colors, on light-tinted and black grounds.

Ladies' boots are still worn very high and with tassels, as formerly. The fashionable bottines have merely the toes of leather, the remainder of the boot being of some thin, but quite fabric of exceedingly light materials, and for which gray, with occasionally a narrow stripe of color, is the favorite color most in favor. The heels of the boots, which are as tall as ever, are covered with the same material.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Evening Dress.—Robe of blue illac foulard, each of which a pattern formed of white flowers and stars, ornamented at the lower part of the skirt with large collisions in taffeta, and bordered with the foulard with braid and belt of taffeta, edged with narrow lace to match the trimming on the skirt. Corsage cut square in front, but on an entre-deux of open lace.

Fig. 2. Morning Dress.—Robe and casaque of white Swiss cambric, or other simple material, embroidered with palmyra, with two rows of insertion of ribbon round the bottom of the skirt. Chapeau of fancy straw, excepted with sheaves of flowers. Strings which are of green ribbon, are fixed to the top of the crown.

Fig. 3. Walking Dress.—Robe of gray taffeta, caught up in festoons so as to show a jupe of the same material. The trimming is of satin ribbon of a narrow edging of lace and with small silver or glass buttons arranged down the centre. The chapeau is of white straw, and is trimmed at the edge with a garland of white lilac and with pearl ornaments and flowers. The bride full upon the forehead and on the chignon. The strings are of tulle, bordered with lilac ribbon, and fastened together with a sprig of flowers.

Fig. 4. Walking Dress.—Robe and casaque of gray plotted mohair, trimmed with mauve or rose-color ribbon, ornamented with a passementerie of straw. The chapeau Simonis is of yellow straw, trimmed round the edge with a ruche of taffeta, of the same color as the lining of the robe, on which runs some large white daisies; at the top are bouquets of the same flowers and of daisies. The double set of strings, neither of which are intended to be tied, fall loosely upon the breast.

PARISIAN TOILETS.

Fig. 1. Foulard robe, white ground, with small, red disks. Over the lower margin of the skirt is a very narrow flounce of white foulard, gathered and bound on each side by a narrow ribbon of red silk. Corsage cut low, with epaulets formed by the continuation of a ruche similar to the flounce and fastened with a bow of red ribbon; corsage à la bien riche serves as a belt. Inner corsage of white muslin, high in the neck and with long sleeves. Straw hat, "Lumbalie," with coquelicots, wheat ears, black lace, and white "tarlatane" for trimming.

Fig. 2. Rose silk robe, with "dentelés" edges, trimmed with silk ribbon of a little darker shade than the robe, and a continuation of this trimming, in a ribbon which terminates in the middle of the back in a bow long open and still longer ends. White straw hat, trimmed with cerises of blue silk, blue ribbons, and puffs of white tulle, with blue "brides" very wide écharpes of white tulle serving as other "brides." Blue parasol lined with white silk.

FANS.

WHEN and where was the fan invented? The beauties of old Rome were as familiar with its charms as the proud-stepping dames of modern Spain; and ladies of every clime and complexion have adopted the mischief-working weapon of coquetry, and become skilful in the use of flirting a fan. Copper-colored dandies, born to the tomahawk and scalping-knife, have rejoiced in the possession of ostrich-plume fans; and the Chinese Empress has turned the instrument to uses undreamed of by less ingenious nations. In the alien-hating dominions of the Tycoon, the school-master instructs his juvenile to book by rapping their knuckles with a fan; the fop uses it as a switch; the beggar makes it a receptacle for alms; the fanciful Spaniard has a formation in its folds; the warrior brains a foe with its iron case; and it comes as a death-warrant to the high-born evil-doer.

The deacons of the Greek Church receive a fan upon being ordained, to remind them that they are expected to keep themselves cool when canvassing the superior priests in the performance of their public duties; and a large fan of white peacock feathers has figured in many a grand religious solemnity as part of the papal insignia.

In Shakspeare's day no lady thought of stirring abroad without her fan, which was the toy devoting upon her gentleman-usher; even Juliet's nurse must have Peter to carry her fan; and many a poor lover, who had ravished a feather from his lady's fan, and worn it as a favor, hesitated at carrying his love to its legitimate conclusion, for fear of his ability to Keep a lazy waiting-man,

And buy a bird and silver-handled fan
With forty pound.

The most fashionable fans were made of ostrich, peacock, or other feathers, sometimes inlaid to a metal or ivory handle. Among the unconsidered trifles snapped up by Falstaff's hungry jackals, Pistol and Nym, was the handle of a certain Mistress Bridget's fan, for which a fence of the period gave his employers three shillings and sixpence. When Elizabeth honored her lord-keeper by visiting with him at his house at Kew, a diamond-decked fan was one among the numerous gifts which acknowledged her condescension. Fans, indeed, seem to have been always acceptable to her majesty; and many such costly toys figure in the list of Newyear's gifts tendered by courtiers to their royal mistress. That terrible sea-bird, Sir Francis Drake, presented Elizabeth with a fan of white and red feathers, its gold handle enameled with one half moon of mother-of-pearl, inclosing another of diamonds and pearls, forming a jeweled frame for a miniature portrait of herself. The Countess of Bath furnished another of swan-down, "with a mask of green velvet, embroidered with seed-pearls, and a very small cabinet, and in the velvet mask a border on both sides of seed-pearls, sparks of rubies and emeralds; and thereon a monster of gold, the head and hands of mother-of-pearl." A modest gentleman, who preferred to show his loyalty anonymously, sent the queen a fan of sombrely colored feathers set in a tortoise-shell handle. Lord Leicester paid his court with a fan of white feathers, the gold handle ornamented with pearls, emeralds, rubies, and diamonds, and bearing "a lion rampant with a white bear muzzled at his foot"—a device that may have been merely significant of his loyalty to the queen, but capable of being interpreted in a tenderer fashion by the woman. When Elizabeth died, the royal wardrobe contained no less than twenty-seven fans.

Tom Coryat was charmed with the elegance of the Italian fans. He says: "There fans both men and women of the country do carry to cool themselves withal in the time of heat, by the often fanning whereof the face is greatly refreshed and pretty things. For whereas the fan consisteth of a painted piece of paper and a little wooden handle: the poor people of Italy, to save the cost of both sides most curiously adorned with excellent pictures; either of amorous things tending to dalliance, or else of some notable matters of ancient histories written under them; or of some notable Italian city, with a brief description added thereunto. Which fans are of such account with many gentlemen of the fairest of them for so much money as countervail in our English groat." The Italian gentlemen, in fact, were as fond of fans as their effeminate ladies. The gallants of the Scotch Solon's court carried fans to shield their tender faces from the role wind as they rode on horseback. "We strive to be accounted womanish," murmurs Greene, "by keeping of beauty, by curling of hair, by wearing plumes of feathers, by using fans both in warm days and cases wore on their heads." This ridiculous custom seems to have had a long life, for Addison, in the year 1711, found it necessary to censure in the habit of carrying huge fans with handles half a yard long; serving not only for their protection and delectation, but being frequently made use as instruments for correcting their grown-up daughters when troublesome or rebellious. The judges of the land were not exempt from the fan fever, and we have a note than Lord Chief-Justice Coke carried an enormous fan when going from home—a curious method of adding dignity to the majesty of the law.

Catharine of Braganza introduced the green shading fan into England. The queen's fan was relegated to elderly ladies, as "more comely and civil for old persons than the former, which is shifted with nothing but beauty" (by which we suppose the handsome, romantic scenes, and fanciful designs with which the folding fans were decorated. In Anne's reign the toy had lost much of its value, and fashionable ladies of rank acquired more decency, for we are assured that they only endured the intolerable fatigue of sitting out the operatic drama in church by making it an occasion for displaying their fine fans, white hands, and brilliant jewelry. The fan must have made deep inroads into the fair lady's pin-money, since Sir Roger de Coverley thought the profits of a windmill should be set apart to find fans for his perverse widow, if she refused to wed Sir Roger de Coverley.

To flirt a fan properly was an art only to be acquired with labor. Mrs. Abington, the actress, was a professor in it:

"Say, ladies, cope Abington:
Observe how she can bring in her airs!
There's nothing of the actress there:
Keep your fans, ladies, if you can.
And catch the graces of her fan.

Addison gives some amusing instructions in the use of the fan. "There is also upon the handle which is the instrument closed, the executant first shaking it at one gentleman, then tapping her neighbor on the shoulder, next pretending her lips to be out of the fan, and finally letting her arm fall easily and gracefully by her side. This was to be learned in about a week's time. The fly fan required at least a month's incessant practice; the manœuvres comprising little flirts and vibrations, gradual and deliberate approaches, and momentary fallings asunder of the fan. To discharge fan was to make a pop as loud as the report of a pocket-pistol. To ground fan was to lay it flat upon the table with a view to obtain air, in order to take up a pack of cards, replace a falling pin, adjust a stray curl, or perform some equally important act. All these difficulties of fan-drill surmounted, the greatest remained to be conquered; but even flirting the fan might, with great perseverance, be brought to the up pupil in three months' time. "There is an infinite variety of motions to be made with a fan, in the flirting of a fan. There is the angry flutter, the modest flutter, the timorous flutter, the confused flutter, the merry flutter, and the amorous flutter; to which we may add, there is scarcely any emotion in the mind which does not produce a suitable agitation in the fan; inasmuch that a fine lady shall put the fan of a disciplined lady, I know very well whether she laughs, frowns, or blushes. I have seen a fan so very angry that it would have done mischief among the beaux, had not she provoked it to have come within the wind of it; and at other times so very languishing that I have been glad, for the lady's sake, the lover was at a sufficient distance from it. I need not add that a fan is a prude or a coquette according to the humors of the person that holds it."

When ivory, leather, wood, and paper superseded feathers in the manufacture of fans, artists were called in to add beauty to the delicate weapon that gave

Coolness to the matchless dame,
To every other breast a flame.

Watteau fairly fanned his way to fame; Cipriani, West, and Reynolds did not disdain to use their pencils in the service of fashion, and we can readily accept Miss Burney's assurance that the result was more delightful than can well be imagined. But fans publicly sold were not allowed to have it all their own way; the engravers executed the first with vigor and success, and catered to the love of novelty with great profit to themselves. Mr. Bedcreveld was the pet of the ladies nothing would serve but representations of the church martyr at the bar. When Gulliver's Travels took the town by storm, every lady carried Lilliput about with her; and when the Beggars' Opera made Gay rich, and Rich gay, fans were covered with copies of the songs and engravings of the scenes. A correspondent of Sylvanus Urban, writing in 1753, gives a curious list of a dozen designs he saw displayed by a row of ladies kneeling at the communion in a fashionable London church. Such subjects as the "Meeting of Isaac and Rebecca," "Joseph and Potiphar's Wife," being Scriptural, might pass muster with a tender critic; but "Darby and Joan," "The Taking of Porto Bello," "The Humors of Glorgy Alley," "Silenus," "Vauxhall Gardens," "The Judgment of Paris," "Harlequin, Pierrot, and Columbine," and "The Prodigal Son," from the "Rake's Progress," were hardly in keeping with the occasion. The popularity of the printed fan-mounts seems, however, to have run counter to the interests of the English fan-makers, for they thought necessary to petition against the importation of them from abroad; and one of their advocates proposed the levying of a tax of sixpence and a shilling upon every paper and leather fan-mount, calculating on a yearly revenue of between twenty and thirty thousand pounds, to the detriment only of some half-a-dozen paltry plate-engravers, who were enriching themselves and starving hundreds.

PEACE hath its VICTORIES.

To prevent or conquer disease is a grand achievement; and as surely as bullet and bayonet are the best means by will HOSTETTER'S BITTERS preserve and prolong life.

This is the most trying period of the year. The stamina of the strongest yields more or less to the consuming temperature of midsummer. Vigor oozes from every pore. The strength of man passes away as invisibly as vapor, and weaker women become relaxed and nerveless. It was to meet such difficulties that Hostetter's Bitters were given to Society. It is to prevent that ill consequence in which an unbraced, dejected, debilitated organization is liable, that they are recommended as a SUMMER TONIC for both sexes. Old people die of exhaustion during the heat who might have kept death at bay for years to come by an occasional resort to this powerful and harmless vegetable stomachic.

Nine tenths of the community, rich as well as poor, need continually. If their hands are unemployed, their brains are busy, and head-work is no exception to which vital energies as muscular toil. But tone the system with Hostetter's Bitters, and the wear and tear of business life will be comparatively useful, even in the most oppressive weather. No hangnor will be experienced, for, so fast as the vital forces are expended, they will be recruited and renewed by this beneficial restorative. As a summer Invigorant it is indispensable to young and old. Sold every where.

THE BALTIMORE REGATTA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY STANTON & BUTLER, BALTIMORE.]

THE BALTIMORE REGATTA.

THE illustrations which we give on this page represent the June Regatta of the Baltimore Barge Clubs—Undine, Ariel, and Zephyr, which came off June 12 at Terry Bar, near the city.

Long before the hour appointed the road leading to this branch of the Patapsco was uncomfortably crowded with every description of vehicle and dust-covered pedestrians; and by five o'clock there was no point commanding a view of the race course unoccupied. The long bridge and sloping banks of Cherry Shore to the right, and the wide pier to the left of the boating grounds, afforded a fine view of the entire race, and were packed with people, while within the inclosure—reserved exclusively for the friends of the clubs—and around the boat-house and cottage, the scene was a most brilliant and animated one. The ladies gayly decked in the colors of their favorites, the members of the clubs in full uniform, the cottage covered with streamers, the soul-stirring strains of a full brass band, and the wide expanse of water, dotted with tugs, steamers, yachts, and barges—all went to make up a picture seldom surpassed in beauty and artistic effect. And the bright eyes and fair faces of those grouped along the verge of the terrace or on the verandas of the cottage, overlooking the river, grew brighter and more animated every minute.

Just before the boats of the four-oared race came up to the starting stake the six-oared shell of the Ariel club capsized, about 300 feet from shore, causing considerable excitement and some delay; but the crew bravely swam ashore with their boat, and were soon ready for the second contest. In the mean time the umpire's pistol was heard, and away from the Judges' stake (to the left of the boat-yard) shot the Io (Ariel club), Zephyr (Zephyr club), and Ripple (Undine club). The first and last named were old boats and rather wide, particularly the latter, which was in reality a six-oared barge—larger, wider, and heavier than either of the others, and with proportionably less chance in the contest. When about one quarter of the first mile the Ripple spurted ahead and steadily increased the distance to the turning stake and home, making the two miles in seventeen minutes seventeen seconds, and leading the Zephyr fifty-three seconds, and the Io a little more.

The booming of cannon, screaming of steam-whistles, and shouts of the lookers-on announced the result, and the crew of the Ripple pulled in to receive the congratulations of their friends.

THE BALTIMORE REGATTA—CLUB-COTTAGE AND BOAT-HOUSE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY STANTON & BUTLER.]

The skull Ariel, notwithstanding her mishap, was at the stake in time and ready to strive with the sixoared, outrigged barge Undine for the champion colors. It was evident, however, that the upset had shaken the men's confidence in their craft and somewhat unnerved them, while the crew of the Undine, encouraged by the success of their fourcared barge and eager for the fray, were in fair better condition and spirits. It is hardly, then, to be wondered at that the latter led, almost from the start, and was fast leaving the shell when that unfortunate boat struck west over and was run ashore. The Undine continued her course and made the winning stake in 15 minutes exactly.

During this six-oared race, prior to the upset, the excitement on shore was intense, particularly among the ladies; and from the various views by the flag along the course there after clear greeted the race boats as they passed. The presentation of flags to the winning crews closed the regatta; and before the "shades of evening" had fairly fallen upon shore and river, "all was again quiet along the Patapsco."

Thus ended the first regular regatta of the Patapsco navy, and we trust each season may add to the number of their boats and the interest of their contests.

THE NEXT ELECTIONS.

AS the political organization known as the Democratic party, which was so signally rebuked at the last Presidential election, and which, with the exception of Delaware, does not control a single one of the States which were loyal during the war, is preparing for another effort to recover power, it is well that Governor Monzon, of Indiana, in a late powerful speech, has recalled its history in that State.

It will be well also for every man to consider what its history has been in his own State, in order that he may truly estimate its claims as a party to public confidence, and determine how safe the country would be in such hands. Of the Democrats who were faithful to the Union and Government we do not speak. Their names are well known if they are conspicuous men; and if not, they are honorably remembered by their neighbors.

But the position of the Democratic party as a party during the war was one of the severest censure of the policy of the Government, and of constant vituperation of the rebellion. Feebly and technically it usually declared for the Union, while all the measures taken for its preservation were decried, and the Administration was held responsible for the war. This was natural; for the leaders of the rebellion at the South were, without exception, also leaders of the Democratic party. On the other hand, those at the North who could not conceal their joy at the disaster of Bull Run were Democrats only. Those who denied the authority of the Government to wage war—who carried out the possibility of its success—who tried in every way to embarrass it—who fomented and excused the riots of 1863—who hung, in National convention, adopted a platform of disgrace and surrender, framed by VALLANDIGHAM, and appealed to the loyal American people to confess themselves conquered—all these were Democrats, and this was the action of the Democratic party.

As VALLANDIGHAM, the most notorious rebel sympathizer in the country, was the author of the Democratic platform of 1864, so ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, the lieutenant of JEFFERSON DAVIS in the rebellion against the Union, who declares that his views are unchanged, and that he is still a secessionist in principle, is the author of the Democratic platform of 1866, upon which party newspapers and orators and men and representatives now stand, and upon which the country will be asked to join them in the next election.

But as the questions now before the country are most momentous, as they are indeed virtually comprised in this—whether the Government shall remain in the hands that have saved it, and whose fidelity has been tried by fire, or be confided to those who have sought its overthrow or manifested with the effort to destroy it—it is of the utmost importance to remember that the political contest of the autumn will be one of principles and not of men. Thus the personal character of Mr. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS has not been impeached, nor his ability. But his popular election to office would be an approval of the most pernicious political doctrines, and justly appall every sincere friend of the Union. What is true of Mr. STEPHENS in Georgia is true in any State of any candidate of the party which adopts his views. Such a candidate may be personally as honorable and able man, but no man is so strong as his party, and no party despotism is so strict and unscrupulous as that of the Democratic party. It is not the lantern in front, however bright its light may be and burnished its metal, but the huge driving-wheel behind, which is the important part of the locomotive.

We must look through the candidates, therefore, to those who nominate them. It is not likely that in Ohio VALLANDIGHAM will be offered to the voters, and HORATIO SEYMOUR in New York. Time and defeat have shown the necessity of cunning. The same spirit and principles which large leaders represent, the bitter hostility to the enlargement of liberty and equal rights, and the Tory reaction which calls itself Conservatism, will strive to conceal themselves in less offensive forms, and appeal for support in smoother phrases. The Democratic party in this country is the party of ignorance, of prejudice, of class privilege, and social disorder. It is the party of opposition to the fundamental American principle of equal liberty and law. For more than a generation it controlled the Government, and its policy, always alarmed by its steady invasion and destruction of that principle, cast it out of power, it raised its hand to destroy the Government itself when the country was in peril. It was a crime, says Governor MORTON, "for which history has no pardon, and the memories of men no forgetfulness."

Let such a party be judged by its history and by its necessary tendency, not by the personal merit of individuals whom it may nominate for office.

WHAT DO WE PAY TAXES FOR?

THE fiscal year 1865-66 will close by the time these lines are published. Enough is already known to enable the statisticians of the Treasury Department to estimate the revenue for the year. They report that the revenue from internal taxes will be not less than $305,000,000, and that the revenue from customs (which is paid in gold, or what is the same thing) will be not less than $155,000,000, equal to $205,000,000 in currency—estimating the gold at 133 per cent. In all they tell us that the total revenue will not be less than $510,000,000—a larger income than is enjoyed by any other government on the face of the earth.

This is not a small sum for the unmixed satisfaction. It is grand to think that our Government is the richest in the world. But, after all, these riches are drawn from the labor and profits of the citizens of the United States, and the proposition may just as well be put in another shape—namely, that the citizens of the United States are the most heavily taxed people on the face of the earth. If the population of the country may be safely estimated at 32,000,000, we are paying this year at the rate of $15 per head, which is double the average rate of taxes paid in Europe. It is not quite so grand to realize that we pay man, woman, and child, without distinction, twice as much money to support our free republican government as is paid by the "downtrodden masses of Europe" (we are anticipating the orators of next week) to support their "sovereign, bloated despotisms." Our whistle is a good one, and sounds clear and shrill; but we are paying for it, seemingly.

These reflections are timely, in view of the final adjustment of the Tax and Tariff bills in Congress. The Revenue Commission urged the remission of a number of very productive and decidedly inquisitorial taxes, and the reduction of others. Neither House of Congress has adopted its suggestions; and the Senate, under the lead of Senators FESSENDEN and SHERMAN, seems inclined to insist on maintaining the present scale of taxation. General economies urged upon Congress, both for the sake of tax-payers and for the sake of the revenue, a reduction of the exorbitant duties upon foreign goods. They seem more likely to be increased than diminished.

The most curious feature in the affair is that these important questions appear to be considered by Congress practically from the point of view of class-interest. When the internal revenue on tobacco is in question, committees are heard representing the tobacco-growers, the cigar-makers, the tobacco-venders; no one represents the smokers. When the tax and duty on iron are on trial gentlemen appear who represent the mining interest, others who represent the importing interest, others who represent the rolling interest; nobody at all seems to represent consumers of iron. When the tax or duty on wool comes up delegations appear before the Committee to argue the question from the point of view of woolgrowers, other delegations which look at it from the point of view of manufacturers of woolen cloths, and yet other delegations which represent importers of foreign wool and woolens; nobody seems to appear on behalf of the great community which wears woolen clothes. Every body, it seems, has his say before the Committee and before Congress except the public. The public has no friends and no friends. When the newspapers tell us that a hard fight is being waged in committee on the wool duty, we have not the slightest idea as to whether we—the poor, helpless public—shall be mulcted by the wool-growers, or by the woolen manufacturers, or by the importers. It is not a question whether or no we shall be mulcted. That is a foregone conclusion, and we are used to it. We see very little which of the rival claimants for the plunder, of which we are sure to be bereft, wins the day.

It is a nice question how long this sort of thing will last, and how it will end. We remember, about five years ago, when the tariff was being altered, that a question arose about the duty on wood-screws. The duty under the existing tariff was nearly prohibitory: it was proposed to make it wholly so. The proposition was maintained by Senator SIMMONS, of Rhode Island, on behalf of the American Wood-Screw Company of Providence, Rhode Island. There was nobody to answer him. The consumers of wood-screws hadn't a friend in Washington. A feeble protest was registered by a New York city journal, but it had no effect. Senator SIMMONS carried his point, the duty on wood-screws was made prohibitory, and the American Wood-Screw Company of Providence, Rhode Island, is understood to have since declared dividends equal to one hundred per cent. per annum. This is only one instance out of a host.

The people of the United States love their Government, intend to maintain their national credit, and are able to pay taxes which would crush less prosperous nations to the earth. But the poor, purblind, stupid old tax-paying public may nevertheless be indulged to the extent of knowing how much of the taxes it pays really goes to the support of the Government, and how much to the fattening of such concerns as the American Wood-Screw Company of Providence, Rhode Island. If the law says that we must pay money to swell the dividends of Mr. SIMMONS's American Wood-Screw Company, we, as law-abiding people, will put our hands in our pocket forthwith. And so if the law says we are to pay money to Mr. SMITH, who is a woolgrower in Michigan, or to Mr. JONES, who is an iron-founder in Pennsylvania, we shall be ready with the greenbacks on the day appointed. But "when found, we shall make a note on't," as Captain Cuttle used to say. And when election-day comes round, the chances are fair that we shall draw the attention of the regular nominee to the subject somewhat forcibly.

"Mr. BROWN or WILLIAMS (as the case may be), I calculate to vote for you as the regular nominee of the party. I expect you to support the Government of the United States, and to vote whatever taxes may be necessary to maintain its credit, and to enable it to pay in any specie-basis all of the leading nations of the world. If, in order to do this, it be necessary to pay $15.$\frac{65}{100}$ per head, as we have paid in 1865-66, I'm ready, and we'll foot the bill. But before you vote any of my money to fill the pockets of such concerns as SIMMONS'S Wood-Screw Company of Providence, Rhode Island, I want to know it. I who speak am a producer too. If any producers are to be fattened out of the public purse, I claim my share. I want you to secure it. If SIMMONS'S Company is to get money out of the public for making wood-screws, I claim an equal amount for raising onions. Mine are home-grown, by the way, at neighbor BROWN gets money for wool-growing, I claim an equal sum for growing potatoes. If JONES is rewarded for manufacturing cotton or woolen cloths, I demand just as much for my field of squashes, which are a credit to American agriculture. If SMITH draws money from the nation for manufacturing iron, I insist that my brother, the cobbler (who needs the money badly), receive a corresponding amount for manufacturing shoes. We don't know much about political economy down our way; but we know enough to say that if, out of the purse we make up for him each year, Uncle SAM pays any body a dollar for carrying on an honest business, he ought to pay it to every one who carries on an honest business, and if you are not prepared, Mr. BROWN or WILLIAMS (as the case may be), to vote for the fund for my onions, potatoes, and squashes, and my brother's highlows, I guess, as soon as the reconstruction question is settled properly, I shall vote the other ticket."

Masses move slowly, and it is hard to say how much time may elapse before people generally take notice of the matter. The existing régime may go on until the contraction of the currency brings "hard times" to every door. As matters stand now, by dint of losing money by the million a week, Government keeps up a fictitious prosperity which enables people to pay the exorbitant taxes, and nobody complains. But when the grind the mills of the gods they grind exceeding fine, and the day will come that the men who vote to tax the people exorbitantly for the benefit of this or that manufacturing establishment will have to look to it for their reward.

THE MINORITY REPORT.

THE Report of the minority of the Reconstruction Committee of Congress is a feeble amplification of Mr. LINCOLN'S Proclamation of opinion that, "as soon as the seceding States respectively made known their readiness to resume their former political relations with the Federal Government under the Constitution," they were to be admitted into Congress without deliberation or conditions. The minority Report asserts that certain citizens in certain States rebelled, that their rebellion has been suppressed, that the States as such were not involved, and at the moment of defeat regained every slight they ever had. The Report not only denies the authority of Congress to provide for the common safety by any conditions whatever, but it demolishes the validity of the President's action. "The power to establish or modify a State Government," says the Report, "belongs exclusively to the people of the State." And unable to find even the necessary condemnation of the President implied in the proposition, the Report meets the dilemma by saying in effect, granting that the President has usurped power, the loyal community has not acquiesced in the usurpation, and that is enough!

The one good effect of this wearisome Report, as of the unanimity of Governors and LEGislatures and the Copperhead speeches in Congress and elsewhere, is to show to the people that the President and Congress, however they differ in measures, fully accord upon the leading principle in the matter of reconstruction, and that the principle is, regard for the public safety. They differ as to what the public safety requires, but they both act from the necessity of the case. Thus when Mr. RAYMOND again falls into the old fallacy of asking what constitutional authority Congress is for imposing conditions upon representation, he is met by the simple truth that there is precisely the same constitutional authority for imposing conditions upon representation that there is for the Presidential appointment of Governors, and the Presidential designation of voters. For the doctrine of ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS and the minority Report is either true or false. Either the National Government was powerless except for collecting revenue and holding district courts within every rebel State, when the insurgents surrendered, or it had exactly as much power as in its judgment was necessary to secure peace and confirm the Union.

The latter being the plain common-sense of the situation, is the doctrine of the loyal American people. It is in vain to split hairs upon the question of the exact extent of the Government States. It remains a pernicious abstraction. There is something amusing in the preposterous gravity with which Mr. STEPHENS and his friends in Congress inform the faithful people of this country, who freed the slaves in order to undermine the rebellion, that the rebel States having confessed to succeed and now by "continuous right" return to a larger share in the Government than they had before. Does Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON seriously suppose that the people who had faith enough and sense enough to suppress such a rebellion really mean that those who rebelled shall have gained political power by its defeat equal to those who remained faithful and were victorious?

It is this issue of common-sense and not one of Constitutional hair-splitting which will go to the country in the coming elections. Nor is it a question whether loyal Representatives from any State shall be admitted, but whether any State lately in rebellion shall be represented until it has given reasonable and honorable guarantees of fidelity to the Union.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE AMENDMENT.

THE President has expressed his disapproval of the new Constitutional Amendment. It is to be regretted that he has done so, for his disapproval will not be and is not asked. It is unfortunate, also, that he should suggest the doubt whether the action of Congress is in accordance with the sentiment of the people, and whether the present State Legislatures truly represent that sentiment. The truth is, that the Union Conventions of Maine, Ohio, and Indiana, which have spoken with such force, and Governor MORTON, of Indiana, has opened the Union campaign in that State. The feeling of the dominant party in every Northern State is unmistakable. Their words and resolutions ring out in the true patriotic tone. They approve most heartily the proposed Amendment, and sustain the general policy of Congress.

Besides, the words of the Constitution are very plain. "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States shall call a Convention for proposing amendments, which in either case shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress." Here is nothing requiring the approval of the President nor the election of new Legislatures. The only case in our history of the Presidential signature to a constitutional amendment was that of the Emancipation Proclamation which President LINCOLN returned, saying that he thought he had no right to sign it, but as Congress had submitted it he would not refuse. But the Senate voted that it had been sent through inadvertence, and directed that the House should not be notified that the signature of the President had been affixed. The Supreme Court of the United States considered the point too clear for argument, and the Senate in 1863, by a vote of 23 to 7, resolved that an amendment should not be presented for the Presidential signature. The proposition of amendment is something with which the Executive power has no concern whatever.

Familiar with this uniform practice as he must be, it is curious that the President should apparently think it an irregularity in Congress that it has submitted the Amendment to him. Nor can we see that there is any purpose whatever in the Message, except to reiterate the President's conviction that until Senators and Representatives have been admitted from the unrepresented States no Amendment ought to be proposed by Congress. That is his well-known opinion, in which he differs from the great body of his fellow-men in the country. But having amply stated it upon many occasions we had hoped that he would abide, without further debate, by the reference of the dispute between himself and Congress to "the sovereign people of the nation."

As it is desirable that all possible delays should be avoided, and as there is no doubt whatever that the Legislatures of the States faithfully represent the sentiment of the people, we hope that at the earliest moment the vote may be conveyed to pass upon the Amendment. And if Tennessee shall be the first to approve it, we shall hail it as a happy omen of the national sanction.

THE EXCISE LAW.

THE object of laws is public order, not private morality. The temperance laws, or those which undertake directly to regulate individual dress and food and drink, are properly considered unjust invasions of personal rights, and may be opposed upon the soundest principles. It is, therefore, a very adroit political trick to represent a distasteful law as sumptuary. The intention is to create a prejudice founded upon a proper feeling. The trick is of the same kind as that which sought to defeat anti-slavery laws as irreligious, upon the ground that the Divine law sanctioned slavery.

It is a favorite resource of the opponents of all regulation of the liquor traffic to oppose it on the sumptuary ground. To regulate manselling, we are informed, is a Puritan device. It is a measure of swivelling, hypocritical, strait-laced fanaticism, which pretends to be very pious and better than its neighbors; of canters who raise their eyes to heaven and thank God they are not as the publicans, while they stick their noses into other people's business, and try to establish brotherly love by statute. An effort to promote public order by regulating this traffic, we are told, is a mere mask of the meddlesome and stern old policy which was announced in a godly nasal twang by crop-haired Pilgrim conventicles. And so the impression is conclusive argument with weeds. Every man, it is claimed, has a natural and inalienable right of getting drunk. If he breaks the law, in consequence, he may be held to the penalty. But it is idle, cry the finely-indignant politicians, to think you can make men better by law. It is a stupid and natural folly of the youth who assumes to monopolize all the virtues and talents.

This tom-tom is lustily beaten, and not without effect. Why, cries an orator, in a noble burst of eloquence and humor, why should this man ponder try to bite off his own nose? Nature repels the foul endeavor. That nose may be pug or aquiline; it may be a chiseled Grecian member or a purple bottle; but why—will an intelligent, sovereign people please tell me?—why should he struggle to nibble it away? The intelligent people is not in contemptible pity for the Quixotic fool, and wonders that people should try to do what in the nature of things can not be done. But when some spectator happens to turn to see the frantic efforts of which he has been so thrillingly told, he discovers that, instead of trying to bite off his nose, the deluded individual is merely tranquilly combing his hair.

It is in this way that the recent Excise Law is denounced for doing what it does not even pretend to do. It is providing for public order, and it is denounced as a missionary enterprise. Society is of opinion that gunpowder is as dangerous a commodity that its storage and sale must be regulated by law. It is idle to say that any man has the right to make gunpowder and sell it, and that society has nothing to do with it. Society has the right of defending its order and safety, and must judge when they are threatened. It therefore justly claims to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors in the interest of public order. It does so not to fill the churches, but to relieve the prisons, for whose support it is taxed. It does not say that men shall not get drunk; but it does say that the traffic in a dangerous commodity shall be regulated. It does not legislate against liquor-selling as a crime, but against dram-shops as a nuisance. Under the new Excise Law more than five thousand shops have been licensed for the sale of liquor in New York and Brooklyn. Does this look like an attempt to make men virtuous by statute? Under the late law—for the principle of the present act is not new—the majority of the men whose business it was straight to the heaviest taxation of the community evaded the law requiring them to pay for a license. Under the new law they have paid more than a million of dollars toward the excise expenses.

The Excise Law, without abolishing the traffic, regulates it more stringently and produces a handsome revenue. To decry it as a Puritan blue law is merely to appeal to an ignorant prejudice. It is not in barbarous and demoralized communities, but in those which are intelligent and enlightened and progressive, that laws are passed to prevent the sudden prohibiting the carrying of deadly weapons and the storage and sale of gunpowder. It would be said to show a gross of bad rum is not a weapon as dangerous to society as a revolver in the pocket or a keg of powder in a store. If society, under certain conditions, chooses to protect itself against these, it may defend itself in the same way against rum.

A CONGRESSIONAL DANGER.

Now that the French occupation of Mexico is about ending quietly, we sincerely hope that the House Committee on Foreign Affairs does not intend to attack the Presidential attitude in a report upon the Monroe doctrine. But a late remark of Mr. BANKS, the Chairman of the Committee, is very suspicious. He says that a bill for the passage of the French troops from Mexico would have his support, and he vaguely foretold a Report which would treat the question in a very lofty vein.

We trust, however, that the majority of Congress will remember that neither the Ecclesiast Bobadil vein is favorable to statesmanship, nor to Columbian upon the Mexican or any other question. Mr. SEWARD has neither threatened nor cajoled in his correspondence upon Mexican affairs. He has said, as he says that a France to understand plainly that the people of the United States looked very jealously upon all European interference with affairs upon this continent, and could recognize no change of government in Mexico which was not the plain and uncoerced expression of the popular will. If, however, as is alleged, he permitted the French to make purchases here and prohibited the Mexicans, he did very wrong, and misrepresented the will which he had no right to set aside. But this is a matter which is not verified, and is intrinsically utterly improbable.

The prolonged and bitter native opposition to the new Mexican empire is the vital failure of the rebellion in this country, under cover of which LOUIS NAPOLEON undertook the Mexican expedition, the French army and the expedition would have the essential weakness of our system. The scoffer is discomfited upon that point. Now, he says, you will see the old story of a victorious Republic. It will make itself a nuisance to its neighbors. Shall we prove him a true prophet? Are we indeed unable to be as dignified in power as in reverses? Shall the ludicrous spectacle of the swift mellowing of enormous armies into peaceful citizens be tarnished by the swaggering rhetoric of our political leaders?

A great nation can dispense with rhodomontade. The speech of Mr. BANKS some time ago upon our part in the European situation was what sagacious school-boys call "squirt." It certainly made no man prouder of his country, and it made other people laugh at us. The calamity would be if the same sentiment is remembered more than their heroism. Let us be satisfied to rival their deeds, not their words. There is no living man who believes that the French intend to remain in Mexico, or that we should tolerate the establishment of monarchy by foreign force upon our borders in despite of our declared policy. If they announce that it is another matter. What then are we to gain by a resounding Report from the committee on Foreign Affairs? Our dignity and power are not to be increased by quibbling our present attitude of resolute expectation; and our good name and self-respect must suffer by grandiloquence. We are now so strong and vigilant, and the world is so well apprised of our vigilance and strength, that we can spare our superlatives.

HOW SHALL WE EXERCISE?

It is claimed by some at the present time that gymnastic exercise, so called, is altogether the best mode, because it brings into action all the muscles of the body; and the invention of teachers is taxed to the utmost to bring into use the greatest possible variety of attitude and motions. Too much is made of this part. The truth is that, for the purposes of health, say exercise that puts into action the body generally, as walking, running, active sports, etc., will answer equally well. Ordinary experience testifies this. Besides, if gymnastic exercises are exclusively relied upon, as they are in some cases, when the occasion for pursuing them has gone by there is apt to be a general neglect of exercise. The young lady who has been faithfully drilled in calisthenics at school, on going home will not follow them up alone, nor get up little companies for the purpose, even if some of her companions at school live in her neighborhood. A gymnastic teacher once told the writer that he knew many of their acquaintances all agog about a system of exercises; but after he left, as we predicted, the exercises were given up, and the appliances which they had procured—the poles, clubs, etc.—became a part of the lumber of garrets, and there they have remained ever since.

In making exercise a part of education (and such it should be) no narrow and exclusive views of it will answer. Not only does must be taken, and gymnastic exercises must constitute a subordinate part of the physical training. This is quite contrary to the view ordinarily taken by those who at the present day make much of this training in education. The general principle on this subject is this: exercise must be so managed that a train fire it will be engendered, so that it will be continued of choice when school days are past. For this purpose there should be variety, and in this variety common exercises and sports should be prominent, especially that most common of all exercises, walking. The great excellence of this is that it can be made to connect physical with intellectual education. The walks of people are not scientific walks. This, however, can not be effected until a radical change be made in the general plan of education. As it is now, pupils are taught merely by language and mathematics, while the broad field of nature is ignored in the school-room. Accordingly a walk out into this field is a walk of ignorance. There is no exhilaration in it. It is a task—lightened, it is true, somewhat by conversation, and by occasional stone throwing, etc., on the whole dull and monotonous; and the zone walks day after day become tiresome. But if, in connection with exercises, is a vast museum, and one who has learned these interpretations need never have a dull walk. Material for most interesting observation can be found every where. To one who has learned to use his eyes, as HUGH MILLER says, "the commonest things of the roadside become even stones and weeds, and the most familiar animals."

The very prevalent idea that all education is to be obtained either from a book or a preposterous idea. The observation and study of nature should form a prominent part of education, and much of this can be done along the line of travel, and by the way—thus abrogating the unnatural divorce of physical from mental training.

That school-keeper produce its best effect upon the system it should have some degree of exhilaration connected with it. For this reason common sports are more beneficial than mere labor. And it is to be regretted that in this country these sports are very much confined to the young, being considered inconsistent with the gravity and dignity of even the middle-aged of either sex. In England, in the common people, they are followed up to old age. We meet every now and then with reference to this in notices and remarks of prominent men. Recently, in a memorial address to the memory of the most distinguished of English surgeons, we found a reference to his being one of a club to which some other eminent men belonged, called the Athletæ, and though one of the busiest of men, as the amount of labor which he performed as a practitioner and an author shows, he was known to be most with the club and engage in feats of activity, such as leaping, fencing, boxing, etc., maintaining thus his vigor even to the last, by that which was a long one. Among females in England archery is a common sport, and we recollect reading an account of some trial of skill there, in which some very old lady took the palm.

We rejoice in the general use by both sexes of all ages of skating, so fashionable of late years in this country. A great change this, for in the days of our youth the people of the States would have fastened the obnoxious term romp or girl-boy upon any school-girl. The change should go further, and take in sports of a more active nature for all sexes of the year. Without specifying all of the exercises proper for girls, we would say that for various reasons they should learn to swim as well as to skate.

Riding horseback is a capital exercise, and children become fond of equestrianing. It is especially to to one who in his boyhood was accustomed to this use of one of the noblest of animals.

But, after all, the most useful mode of exercise, the staple exercise as we may call it, for the great mass of those who are getting an education, is walking. We can not recommend it too much. Boys, alone or with others, and can be made, as we have said, the medium of connection between physical and intellectual education.

LITERARY.

"A Narrative of Andersonville" by AMBROSE SPENCER, of Americus, Georgia, is just published by the Appletons. The title of the book shows that it is drawn from the evidence upon the trial of HENRY WIRZ, but that evidence is confirmed by the personal observation of the author, who, during the war, lived within nine miles of the prison pen at Andersonville. The story is as sad as any that History records, and it is one that ought not to be forgotten, and which can never be so truly told as now. "It may be asked by the succeptible reader," says the author, "if the foregoing delineations have been given merely to excite superfluous horror? if this coulsed statement of what has been verified under oath is not intended to keep alive the bitterness which occasioned the miseries described? The answer is, are the outrages committed upon defenceless prisoners of war, and the sufferings endured by the obscure soldiers of the Union, to be passed over as mere incidents of the rebellion? Are the nauseating details of their captivity, misery, and death beneath the dignity of narration?"

MR. SPENCER—whose sturdy fidelity to the Union was conspicuous through the war, who maintained in the very heart of the rebellion the inflexible loyalty to which the South must owe its future guidance, and who was a sympathizing witness of the sorrows which he records, as well as a close observer of the spirit of the population—writes with intense and sober feeling. But he does not stray from the proved facts. He makes no effort to excite individual obloquy beyond the terrible record. It is a chapter of history which should be of the truest service in illustrating the spirit of the rebellion, and showing the necessity of a real and not a delusive knowledge of the condition and sentiment of the South—a necessity as vital for the late insurgent section as it is for us.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

June 19:

In the Senate, a bill to grant lands in aid of the construction of a railroad from Dubuque to the Missouri River, in Oregon, was taken up and passed.—The Army Appropriation Bill was next considered, and after some discussion was passed.—The House resolution of thanks was appreciated overwhelmingly, and a joint resolution for the support of the Federal Union was passed. Resolutions for the appointment of a Committee to investigate the affairs of the Freedmen's Bureau, and for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the expediency of repealing the Tenure of Office Act, were offered.—The Senate then went into executive session, and after the consideration of the Secretary of the Navy's report on the Alaska purchase, the Treaty was ratified.—The House passed, 104 to 37,

In the House, the vote by which the bill to establish a Department of Agriculture was passed on the 14th instant was reconsidered, and the bill was passed; yeas 80, nays 66.—A minority report from the Reconstruction Committee was presented.

June 20:

In the Senate, the recommendation of the Finance Committee to fix the tax on cotton at two cents a pound was agreed to.

In the House, the bill to increase the pensions of widows and orphans was passed. The bill to extend the provisions of the pension laws to prompt marshals, deputy provost marshals, and enrolling officers who have been killed or wounded in the discharge of their duties. The second section increases the pensions of widows of deceased soldiers and sailors, having children, at the rate of four dollars per month for each child under the age of sixteen.

June 21:

In the Senate, a joint resolution was passed giving fifteen hundred dollars to Mrs. Abbie Green for her services in assisting one hundred and nine Union prisoners to escape from Libby Prison.

In the House, a resolution was adopted to consider the expediency of the repeal of the salt tax to the reduction to mileage, so as to make the payment of mileage more equal and more in accordance with the actual cost of travel to and from the national capital at the present time.—The Salt Bill was passed, 72 to 61.

June 23:

In the Senate, that section of the Tax bill granting to Railroad Companies the right to add to their charges an account of the tax, was restored.

In the House, a resolution was received from the President in reference to the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, relating to which it had been communicated by the Secretary of State to the Governors of various States on the 18th of June, but which was a ministerial act, and not to be considered as involving the action of the President in the premises.—The Army Appropriation Bill was taken up and passed.

June 25:

In the Senate, a joint resolution authorizing the hiring of buildings for the temporary accommodation of the Department of State, was passed; also, a joint resolution to provide for the publication of an official history of the rebellion.

June 26:

The Tax bill was next taken up. Mr. Henderson offered an amendment striking out the tax on checks, which was rejected, yeas 10, nays 24. An amendment to add a tax to the free list was adopted. The bill was read a third time, and passed.

NEWS ITEMS.

DR. HARRIS'S tables show that during the week ending on June 23 there were 434 deaths in this city, and 54 in Brooklyn.

The Boston Journal says that the statue of Hon. Edward Everett has been completed in clay at Mr. Ball's studio. It will be ready for dedication in May.

The Governor of the State of Tennessee, has issued a proclamation, calling the Legislature of the State to meet at Nashville on August 14, for the purpose of ratifying the amendment to the Constitution of the United States just proposed by Congress.

We have intelligence, by late arrivals from Europe, of the death of the late Professor Henry Rogers, formerly State Geologist, which took place at his residence, near Glasgow, on the 29th of May.

The Memphis Avalanche says affairs have reached such a pass in Texas that the people unless relief is given by the people of the country will be afraid to come to the city for fear of being murdered. The Avalanche says every farmer's foal is stalking over the country, hand in hand with robbery, arson, and every other crime in the calendar.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ACCORDING to our latest foreign advices, hostilities had not as yet recommenced, but had been brought one step nearer by the severance of diplomatic relations between Austria and Italy, as well as by the landing of Garibaldi in Italy. The Austrians had completely evacuated Holstein, and retired into Bohemia, followed by the Prussian troops.

In regard to Garibaldi's campaign the Vienna correspondent of the London Times describes the frontier between Tyrol, and a maritime expedition up the Adriatic is contemplated on the same side of the sea as Dalmatia, it is certain that on the coast of Istria or Dalmatia, it will be a war of fortresses. Monfalcone, the Austrian Turkish Fortress, among those the only support the Italians might rely on, and Garibaldi's battle-field and head-quarters will be either there or in the mountains. At all events it is difficult to tell to a general insurrection of the Venetians, unless in the commencement of the reaction, could be made subservient to the main bead. It would be necessary for Garibaldi to keep his troops in a condition to descend from the mountains and march between Trieste and the main position of the Austrians, in order to cut off the retreat to Venice. Along all that line, and down upon it from the Alps, the Austrians have their forces drawn up, from Carnic Alps, the Fluvo, the Tagliamento, fasts of irregular warfare, and the Italians will have to fight their way down and cutting by landing now at one point now at another. Garibaldi will be able to do this, and he will run along the shore, all unsupported because Venetians, and consequently become Venetians, and by reaching the mountains of Venetia, he will be able to draw the forces of the Archduke from which spring the Rivers and others of those Crossings, the maritime war of the Carnicott della Stelvio and in concert with those of the Austrians as they met with on the same battle-fields in the Austrian and unfortunate Venetians.

The Princess Mary was married at Cambridge, London, on the 13th inst., to Prince Frederick Adolphe Alexander Prince von Teck, of Bohemia, lately an officer in the Austrian service.

SECOND ANNUAL REVIEW OF THE NEW YORK YACHT CLUB, JUNE 19, 1866.

THE YACHT REVIEW.

THE annual review of the New York Yacht Club, which we illustrate on this page, took place June 19. It was understood that this exhibition of the sailing qualities of the yachts and the exchange of courtesies accompanying it should take place in the Lower Bay, and a number of the yachts, among them the Henrietta, Maria, and Mara, went down on Monday, lying overnight at anchorage in the Horse-shoe. On Tuesday morning the yacht Magic hove in sight, and presently the steamboat River Queen bore down with the melancholy tidings that the review was to be held in the Inner Bay, as it was concluded by the ladies, or for the ladies, that the weather was too rough outside.

This alteration of the programme was, for the ladies at least, a wise one, as it certainly was quite too turbulent outside for the enjoyment of any thing less matured than a salt of several years' standing. The threatening character of the early morning had evidently deterred many ladies from being present, as there were but few in the yachts or on board the steamers compared with other years, but those few appeared to highly enjoy the entertainment provided for them. Inshore, on the Staten Island side, were the steamers C. W. Thomas, Belle, and the River Queen; also the steamboats Octavia and Wave, with a like precious freight; and the yachts Rambler, Phantom, Fleetwing, Widgeon, Magic, Halcyon, Fanny, Ida, Zolaska, Zip, Lily, Ella, and many others not carrying signal-flags or other distinguishing mark of any kind.

Several hours were passed in the most agreeable manner by the yachtmen conveying their lady guests from yacht to yacht. Music, of course, was provided on many of the yachts, the Henrietta being especially blessed in this particular. Guns were fired in a highly boisterous manner on a great many occasions, and colors were dipped and changed in a most mysterious fashion to one whose signal-reading is limited to MARRYAT. Then there was a luxurious repast worthy of DELMONICO. The courtesies of the day lasted several hours, the affair concluding with some maneuvring by the yachts.

This review, or rather inspection, is the second that has taken place under the auspices of the Club, and had there been a more full attendance of yachts, and but for the delay arising from the necessary change of locality, would have been unexceptionable in all respects. The New York Club is the oldest and unquestionably the best on this side the Atlantic, and comprises some yachts that would put to the blush the best of the famous squadrons of England.

The River Queen, from whose deck our sketch was taken, was President LINCOLN'S favorite vessel. It belongs to ALFRED VAN SANTVOORD, of Albany.—The name of the River Queen has become historic by the fact that in her cabin the celebrated conference was held off Fortress Monroe between President LINCOLN and Secretary SEWARD on the part of the United States; and Messrs. STEPHENS, HOUSTON, and CAMPBELL in behalf of the so-called Southern Confederacy, which ended in smoke.

NITRO-GLYCERINE VS. GUNPOWDER.

ON Saturday afternoon, June 16, a series of important experiments were made by Colonel SCHAEFFER, at Washington, showing the relative explosive force of nitro-glycerine and gunpowder. We give an illustration of these experiments on the next page.

There were some five hundred gentlemen present, among whom were many officers of the army and navy. Several water torpedoes were exploded, the powder scarcely making any spray, and the nitro-glycerine raised the water over one hundred feet high. Several musket barrels were charged with the two substances, and the nitro-glycerine in each case tore the iron into fragments. Mines were similarly constructed in the earth, and on iron plates, and with these the superior power of the other compound was forcibly shown. A wrought iron shaft twelve inches in diameter, with an orifice one inch in diameter, was torn in pieces. A similar result took place with a cast iron shaft, and an experiment with powder similarly applied failed to injure the iron. Earth mines were tried, and the crater produced with powder did not exceed four feet in diameter, while the nitro-glycerine tore up the earth about twelve feet across the crater.

Colonel SHAFFNER illustrated how the San Francisco explosion occurred, by saturating saw-dust with the glycerine, and many very interesting experiments proved the extraordinary power of nitro-glycerine, and how easily it can be handled and employed without incurring the danger common to gunpowder. The Government aided Colonel SHAFFNER to make the experiments with the view of promoting science.

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XXIV.—(Continued.)

An hour passes away before, Robby having told the whole story so far as he knows it, any tranquillity is restored. Filled with the most painful apprehensions, Mrs. Sorel, nevertheless, endeavors to reassure herself, as well as her companions, by all manner of hopeful conjectures. Mr. Arthur may have merely alighted somewhere, leaving his horse standing, and it may have left him; or, he may have been thrown, though not seriously hurt. But she herself and Alice too, hovering about her mother's couch pale, cold, and silent, can not but recall the singular manner in which Mr. Arthur parted from them that morning. All through their deep grief they have both felt vague apprehensions, even painful anxieties, on his behalf. Not on political grounds, for, as they both well know, there are no men so safe just now as Union men, even if Mr. Arthur's course had not been so quiet and without positive offense, as, in spite of his thoroughly known loyalty to the Union, to leave him without one embittered enemy in the world.

But Mrs. Sorel, and Alice also, can not help, even in that anxious hour, remarking the silence and, if possible, deadlier pallor into which Mrs. Bowles has fallen.

"Blind, blind, blind," she says it more to herself than to Dr. Warner, now with her, Mrs. Sorel and Alice having gone for the moment out of the room. "You know it all, Dr. Warner, perhaps have known it for months, and for me, her own mother, never to have more than feared it."

"Feared it, Madam?" says Dr. Warner, with some indignation. "As to knowing it, there are few besides yourself but know Mr. Arthur was attached to your daughter, has been devotedly attached, I dare say for years. A good many of us have fancied it exceedingly likely his affection was reciprocated."

"He never whispered such a thing. Alice never even hinted any thing of it to me," Mrs. Bowles says, feebly, and in a bewildered manner.

"Because he knew the aversion for him you, and her brother too, might have, Madam," remarks Dr. Warner, warmly. "He did not even know she herself might regard him, being, as he knew she knew him to be, a thoroughgoing Union man. He was too honorable, Madam, to endeavor to win her affections against your wishes—too proud to desire, even, to intrude where he was not heartily welcome. Had things continued as they were, in my opinion, though most devotedly attached to Alice, he never would have taken a step as long as the world lasted."

"Thus so many terrible blows should fall upon me at once," moans the invalid, feebly lifting her hand to her forehead.

"You are in a weak state of health, Madam," interrupts her physician, with a good deal of firmness for him, but professional and as with a patient, "and we ought not to converse at all. Only I must say this. For all we know, Mr. Arthur is, at this moment, lying dead, either thrown from his horse or by the hand of an assassin. God forbid! But, if he lives, there is no man living I would so well be pleased to see Miss, if she were old enough, the wife of. A gentleman of spotless character, of good talents, of sincere piety—one who has proved himself, during all these years of madness, true as steel, through great and unceasing pressure, to what he knew was right; not a partisan in it either, calm, mild—I declare, Madam," says Dr. Warner, with more spirit than he ever dared exhibit to his wife, "I am astonished at you." And he rubs his bald head with the palm of his left hand impatiently. But Mrs. Bowles only lies with her eyes closed, pallid, silent.

"There is one thing, perhaps, I ought not to mention," says Dr. Warner, after a very long pause, and much rubbing of his brow. "Under these peculiar circumstances, however, and it is of a nature which will make it sacred with you. Mr. Ferguson might not like it—might be very angry with me," continues he, with a very plain and frightened recollection of the character of that person; "but I know the secret is safe with you. You will pardon me, Mrs. Bowles, I speak only this once, do it to relieve your mind. You are not as rich—pardon me—Miss Alice will not inherit—oh, forgive me—" in great confusion.

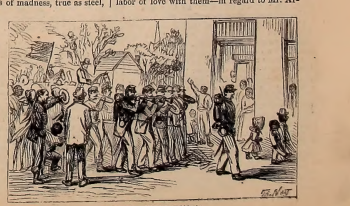
"You are not intending to remind me of our poverty." Feeble as she is, not more than barely able to speak the words, the pale sufferer shashes Dr. Warner greatly by the silent dignity of her eyes fastened with surprise on his.

"You are right, pardon me. As my wife says, I always am doing something I ought not," remarks the culprit, feeling himself a huge culprit to the extremities of his disarranged neckerchief in every button-hole lacking its button, and with his head sunk into its shoe-buckle droop. "I only meant to say that Mr. Ferguson has placed a sum of money, a very large sum indeed, he has no child or relative, you observe—nothing else on earth to do with it," the Doctor adds with a deprecatory gesture, and by way of apology for Mr. Ferguson, "out of interest in Mr. Arthur's name. He intends the papers as a wedding gift to him on his marriage. Besides, he has made a will—"

"Dr. Warner!" Nothing but that, with its accompanying look, but it cuts the physician to the bone. There is long silence, during which he looks at his watch and administers a soothing powder, rubbing his head with vexation, but having nothing more to add.

"I am bewildered, exhausted, can not sleep as you all would have me do," murmurs Mrs. Bowles at last; "but I am still in my right mind. And I never can consent that my daughter should marry, though he had every other quality under heaven, an—an Abolitionist. That Alice should have an affection for one kills me."

No more than that; but oh the tone in which it is said! Mrs. Bowles closes her eyes and lies as pale and cold as marble, as much beyond Dr. Warner's reach as if she were in Heaven.



He feels it, gives over rubbing his forehead, and steps quietly out of the room, as a wrecked mariner might crawl ashore out of the waves, the storm-beaten condition of the man altogether indescribable.

He finds Alice reclining on the sofa of the next room, which is the parlor, Mrs. Sorel sitting on a low stool at her head. Alice has been, is weeping, and at a glance Dr. Warner sees that these two, at least, are in fullest sympathy with each other.

Yes, he thinks Mrs. Bowles will sleep, perhaps, if left undisturbed. Nothing from Robby yet? For Robby has gone back to send the servants out in every direction to inquire—a labor of love with them—in regard to Mr. Arthur. Robby has not reened, has not had time as yet.

THE LOVERS.

"HOME, SWEET HOME!"

"A dozen of us will be off as soon as it is day," Dr. Warner remarks, and proceeds to prove that there is not the least possibility of any harm having befallen their friend. "Heaven has pressing need of just such a man in the now times before us, Mrs. Sorel," is the somewhat inconclusive argument, among others, which he urges, amidst much warm eulogium of Mr. Arthur. "His has been a living, powerful contrast to that man Barker, a sort of peaceful antidote to his virulent poison in Somerville for years now."

"There is no man living to whom I would as proudly and gladly give our Ria as a wife," the Doctor adds for Alice's especial benefit, drooping his head the instant after in self-reproach for having spoken the words.

Meanwhile Alice has stolen once or twice into her mother's room, and pronounces her to be resting fairly. She has just persuaded Mrs. Sorel to go to her room and lie down, when a step is heard upon the front portico and a bell follows at the door. With stealthy step, lest he should disturb the invalid, yet with beating heart, Dr. Warner hastens to the door. In the deepest anxiety Alice and Mrs. Sorel hear him greeted in a voice they do not recognize. There is a low but muffled conversation upon the porch. Then Dr. Warner introduces no less a person than Mr. Bob Withers into the room, says that gentleman will explain, and, with a self gone, gone in such hurry as to forget his hat, and then, still more wonderful, his saddlebags, after each of which he has to return.

"You will forgive my intrusion, ladies, though I believe it is not yet nine o'clock," says Mr. Withers, declining a chair. "Thanks, no, I can stay but a moment. The fact is, I called at the Doctor's house and was told he was here. By-the-by, I should have told him to return the way of his own house. I fear his lady is in strong hysterics. The instant I told her Mr. Arthur was shot—I beg pardon, Mrs. Withers, in dismay: for Mrs. Sorel. passing one arm around Alice, herself totters as she stands, while Alice rallies all her soul to her aid and composes herself by desperate struggle.

"By George!" The exclamation bursts entirely of itself from Mr Withers's lips. "He isn't killed, you know, on that account. I have been shot myself twice. I say you know, as I heard the circumstances, in connection, I am sorry to say, with cards. There is hardly a man in all my acquaintance—in a way—not, of course—but has been shot at some time during his life, badly cut at least. But it is a wonder in this case. Peel to Wright, whispering in the ear of the two, evidently aimed at a cotton button on the left side; button shattered, by George's account, not to shreds, but to pieces. Ball has lodged, undoubtedly, in the breast. Bullet, you know—"

Alice can now look steadily at their visitor She has often seen him before, knows the general character as a good-natured but dissipated man, generally esteemed, somewhat, in spite of his wild courses. Mr. Withers has a frank, honest face, a little too highly colored, but he glows before Alice now, beautiful as Apollo—Bacchus rather.

"In one moment, if you please, Mr. Withers," she says, and glides quietly into her mother's room. Is detained there for several minutes. "I hope my mother was sleeping. She is not, but I found her awake. She begs that you will please come into her room, she is anxious to hear."

Excessively awkward does Mr. Withers feel as he takes a seat on the sick chamber. He is startled at the appearance of Mrs. Bowles, whom he has not seen before for a long time. reminds him of his mother, of persons made by him to just such a pale invalid in just such a darkened chamber; promises made with passionate weeping, but, alas! how poor keep. Mrs. Sorel has told him in a whisper of the death of Rutledge Bowles. Very quiet is Mr. Withers in his manner, having vague ideas, in addition to all else, that those present have deeper interest in Mr. Arthur than he imagined when he first came

"You see, ladies," he says, "I was returning about noon to-day from Colonel Juggins's—been out to key-note for my boy—and my carriage. About a mile this side of Mr. Wright's I saw some one lying in the road—Mr. Arthur. He was waving his hand to me to make me so fast as I could see him. 'For Heaven's sake make haste, Mr. Withers!' he said, 'haste, haste!' I supposed he was anxious to get to a doctor, and placed him, as fast as I could, in the ambulance.

"Now drive for Mr. Wright's as hard as you can,' he says, 'never mind me. I am in great loss of blood, but I can see a physician afterward.' So, Mr. Withers, fast, fast!' he kept saying, which was unnecessary, for my boy knew 'young they always go when I am behind them, very fast indeed. I don't perfectly understand the thing," remarks Mr. Withers, pausing for a while, "but I will tell it all to you as it happened. As my mother always said we must say one word how he was wounded, you this: 'The instant we got to Mr. Wright's house,' he said, 'Mr. Withers, throw the ambulance with me, run in and tell Mr. Wright as he loves his daughter to come out instantly, instantly! and see me one moment. You will find Dr. Peel there; don't mind him, any thing he says or does. You are a kindhearted man, Mr. Withers, and a brave man, do as I tell you as you ever loved mother or sister,' he said; 'excuse my repeating it."

"Well, but what the mischief?" I began. 'I can explain all all,' he says, 'one word, only not. Only do as I say, and that quick, for God's sake.'

"'But you may be in, by George! dying need of a doctor,' I began. 'On! on!' he only said; 'it's ten thousand times more important for me to get there in time than for me to live!'

"By that time we were at Wright's gate. There was a carriage before it. I began to suspect the thing. I dashed in. 'Peel, Peel, yes! There in the parlor they were! They must have gone in but that moment. Dr. Peel was a tremendous fine looking man, broadwash on the floor, the most splendid looking bride-ground Ever saw in broadcloth, ruffled shirt, gold chains, white satin vest, kid gloves, perfumes—in a word, the most magnificent as an emperor, my life, big and magnificent as an emperor, handsomest fellow I ever came up with. By him was his bride, Miss Anne Wright, in a traveling dress. You know her, that pale little but pretty as the Apollo Belvedere, with a perfect figure, and beautiful as a lily. Parson Barker had just begun when I dashed in. There was a tremendous fuss and flurry. 'Stop!' said Mr. Withers, with excitement; "it was all in a minute; I saw the couple standing there so beautiful and happy. Peel turn positively blue, knocked Parson Barker flat over in my hurry. I do not know how I managed it, but I had Mr. Wright out at the carriage door again and saw something as rapidly and earnestly as a man could. Then he came rushing back past me and struck me a blow as if a devil. I never saw such a face as that before," remarked the speaker, with a shudder, "I never want to see it again. Mr. Arthur beckoned me to get in. I did so.

"Now for a doctor as soon as we can. Mr. Withers, if you please,' he said, 'as soon as possible. I couldn't help it—he would have—God help him—what comes of it!' something like it, and fainted dead away. I got it in them boys I rather think, left him just getting out of his swoon on his bed at your house, Mrs. Sorel, came on for Mr. Wright, and that," said Mr. Withers, passing his hand through his hair, "is all I know about it."

Without a word, Alice brought Mrs. Sorel her bonnet and shawl, and aided her to put them on, though with trembling hands. "I will take good care of Mamma," she says, with a color in her face, a light in her eye, a tone in her voice such as sheds a new light upon Mr. Withers's mind.

First, indulging, as he eyes her, in a shrill whistle, strictly internal and inaudible, he remarks to himself, "Well, I'll be darned! what business a preacher has with as pretty, by George! as splendid a girl as that. However, Arthur's a trump if he is a parson!" A little discontented, though.

"I am sure Mr. Withers will be kind enough to drive you home," says Alice, with heartfelt eyes upon Mr. Withers.

"Oh, certainly, with pleasure. Ambulance standing over at Mr. Warner's gate," replies Mr. Withers, promptly. But he lingers, with his hand upon the back of the chair upon which he has been seated. "Miss Alice, I know nothing, you observe—I hope you will pardon my attending to such a matter. The fact is," says Mr. Withers in a desperate hurry, "there's no human being ever hears about this matter from my lips. You ladies, I am sure, have the delicate to it to see that. Mr. Arthur has fixed it so the very bride, poor, poor thing! will never know the truth of his father's manager-ship. Mind, ladies, Mr Arthur has never whispered a syllable to me, by George! he has acted with the coolness to which I am not, by George, heir! But I am satisfied, putting every thing together, perfectly satisfied that man Peel, Dr. Peel he was called, by George! I—excuse me, it is almost impossible to believe it—was after all, a—" The word sticks in Mr. Withers's throat. "I am sure that your lips and mine will be killed by Wright, as sure as I am standing here. But I am satisfied, by George I—excuse me—I am sure that Peel was the thing that can explain it at all. Peel was a negro, a mulatto, I feel certain of it. Or was, I should say. If he is a brave man he acknowledges the mistaken. At your service now, Madam." And Mr. Withers starts for the door, stands hesitating there a moment, and then disappears.

"I hope you will be certain to excuse me, ladies, for mentioning such a matter before you —by far the most horrible thing in the whole line, by George! my life. No other human beings besides yourselves will ever have a whisper of it from me. Poor Arthur!" Mr. Withers, with a furtive glance at Alice, "I thought there were those here to whom all I did know about Mr. Arthur was interesting. I am sorry I don't pretend to be certain, that about Peel not positively, you know. Feel morally satisfied myself. Wrong all things to suppose that Mr. Arthur, take to swear it, by George! Ah, excuse me, Good evening!"

"When he come rushin' out ob de back door," the very black Parson Orange, a sleek, rotund, remarkably smooth-spoken and utterly unprincipled negro man, by the way, and the very moment, to Colonel Juggins's dein, in the latter's ear, "I tink he was gone, was gone to turn white, he was so pale! Dreamt it?—and Orange can only express the degree thereof by an attempt at the words used by him in public prayer, and only suitable thereto. "Oh, yes, I had your Massa's blood-mare ready; it was my dream to do it, as I told you. Just as it was in my dream—berry mare, berry spot, berry man rushin' out widout his hat, berry lips blue as I sees 'em in my dream. Dreamt it? Dreamt it all my vitions again, will you?—heh, heh, heh!" nodding his wise head over the memory of it with wonder on wonder.

"Well, what den?" Jem breaks in upon Orange's ruminations.

"I'll belick in dreams from dis day out; always did. Oh, little more! 'Is dat you, Orange?' says he. 'All right'—jumps on dat mare and is gone. Jest like in a dream. Humph! I don't know but it all was a dream. If only your Massa can look at it in dat light 'bout his blood-mare," adds Orange, with a grin at his duller confederate. "Now see how much brighter I am dan you'd be den, Jem. You would a hurried off. Dat's my gain. Sot down flat on de ground; took off one shoe, and broke de string." With another grin.

"What did you do, Jem, with respect.

"Listen, nigger: fore you could count one hundred, Mr. Wright he come tearing out after him, de white hest on bell in his eyes, revolver cocked in his hands. Come upon me, hayperdee! Seein my shoe. 'Which way?' dat was all he said. 'Which way?' Man all dressed up, Massa? I asked. 'Which way?' dat is all he said, in a tremendous rage, finger on de trigger, all de debbils in hell in his face. Dat way, Massa, dat way, I says, in a hurry, pintin' somewhere, any where, quick. 'Tell Ark to follow me on Roan,' he says, and he is gone—exactly as in de dream!"

"An' you?" asks Jem, eagerly.

"Yes, Sar, de darker an' de faster he trabbel on dat road de better. Yes; I went on de place an told Jack. 'Massa hasn't time to come in de house? Jack told me 'bout it while he was saddlin' Roan. Peel was on de floor to be married—actly to be married, nigger, to Miss Anne. Yah! Almonare drove up to de door; man jumped out, run in, carried de father out to it like a child, an instant he do it. Peel took out de back-door, knockin' oder de niggers crowded dere to see de ceremony; didn't obey stop for him. Massa, he run up quick as he shut himself up; got to prayin' up dar, Jack said."

"Miss Anne?" asks Jem, with intensest interest.

"Jack say, when her father was hurried out one door, she run out on de udder, de stood frightened out ob her wits. Sudden' her father came rushin' back, wild.' Then she rushes for him, all in her white and trabbelin dress, to hold him in her arms. Jack say she kept holdin' him, I know it, ya, I know it; he didn't hide it; he told Jack he was a brave man. It was my fault; he wanted me to let him off if I would. I loved him, ya, don't kill him, don't kill him! I wouldn't have him die like a snake, shrieking an' cryin—her pa sayin' nothin', only curses in' sayin' to get away. 'If you kill him kill me,' she say, 'kill me, I'm a Union girl, a brave man; I hate de Soul; I hate de Confederacy; kill me too, me too, I love the Yankees, I hate de Secession.' I tell you it was all her pa could do to break from her, she wrapped herself all 'round him so.

"Her he broke away at last, leavin' her dar on de floor in her bonnet an' things in a dead faint, poor darlin'. Rover away like de wind, Sar. They all lobbed her mightily, dem niggers, they was all cryin' over her, said it would kill her sho'. I 'member," added Orange, reflectively, "one day 'bout two weeks before, she was at a prayer-meeting we had over at your Massa's, Jem, you remember, 'adds Orange, with a tender reflection, "she was for certain de sweetest an' beautifulest work of God I ebber see. 'Tis mighty hard."

But time flies very fast, even though it accomplishes the greatest events as it flies. In the compass of about two hours Mr. Arthur is recovering, the Confederacy, more like, now it has come and gone, some awful vision of inspired prophet than a reality, Mr. Bob Withers, with the aid of its armies and in the capture of its Lucifer, expired from the face of the earth, only a terrible memory to be recalled forever. It is a pleasant June evening, and Mrs. Sorel and Alice are seated in Mr. Arthur's room. He is able to sit up on the sofa, though pale from loss of blood, but rapidly recovering. Her great affliction has left its traces upon Mrs. Sorel, if it were only in the sadness which has softened into a deeper, purer quiet the lines of her mouth, the light of her eyes. And Alice, seated by her mother's side, as they had been during long married, is serene of countenance, even though its paleness is heightened by the deep mourning which she has clothed—double mourning—for at once brother and mother.

"Yes," Mrs. Sorel is saying, while Alice is silently busy with her needle-work, "Alice is indeed the hand of a Father in it. That Mr Withers should have been able to say all that to Mr. Arthur, that so providential a chance as I had feared, before, Mr. Arthur entertained sentiments—was one of a class whom I have been trained by my husband to regard with horror unspeakable,' she said to me when I went back to her next day. 'I have given over endeavoring to understand Providence. I am content to leave it all in the hands of Him who doeth all things well. I withdraw now my objection in regard to Mr. Arthur. Rutledge Bowles is gone. I once regarded Mr. Arthur as the best friend I had on earth, even when cold and quiet while I was feverish; but we will speak no more about it,' she said, and kept repeating—you remember, Alice?—even to the end, 'He doeth all things well, doeth all things well.' You ought to love Alice very dearly, Mr. Arthur,' Mrs. Sorel added, gravely: 'that was what was the truest lady I ever knew in all my life."

"God knows that I do that only too well," Mr. Arthur adds, as gravely, looking with fondest affection at Alice; "and," as she lifts her loving eyes to his, "I have loved her from the first moment I saw her with an ever-increasing affection. I will not speak of that, because no words can at all express it. My gratitude to God for giving me back at once my country and you, Alice, is unspeakable. And, of all the world, it is Brother Barker shall marry us! If I had been in his case I might have been probably would have been—worse than he. We have both endured, during long and terrible years, what we are fitted for the better world upon which we are entering together—a new world, Alice, with new duties, new sufferings, perhaps—who knows? But we are preparing upon it together. I ask no more, love, than that you will consecrate to me, then, their hands lie upon the arm of the easy-chair, touched in one. But at this moment Robby comes in, one brown soberly as he can, yet in greatest excitement.

"Mr. Brooks, oh, Mr. Brooks!" he exclaims, and holds up a warning hand.—"Listen! Listen!"

Sure enough. The distant music of a military band. Very faint, yet they can hear it as they sit with suspended breath. Stronger now and louder. What is the air? Wait. Still nearer. And the faster takes the other hand in his, one down already. Clearer. Their eyes meet inquiringly. Still nearer the music sounds —music loud, clear, sweet exceedingly. Robby and his sister have turned, are looking the other way, attentive only in that direction, and the lips, too, of the lovers meet. For the tune is that sung of old in the Land Hall Columbia. Nor the Star-Spangled Banner. Nor yet Yankee Doodle. It is—to these two of all tunes on earth!—Home, Sweet Home.

THE IMPENDING EUROPEAN WAR.

We give on pages 424 and 425 a very accurate and comprehensive Map of Middle Europe, which is valuable not only as including the entire arena of the European conflict, now fairly entered upon, but as showing the whole the latest results of European engineers.

We purpose, in a few paragraphs, to give here a general survey of this all-important conflict which, whatever be its results, must materially change the dynastic relations of the great continental Powers of Europe. It will be necessary, in the first place, to allude briefly to which in 1815 made a disposition of the map of Europe that has been the basis of all Continental diplomacy in Europe for half a century. This treaty was based on the downfall of the Bonaparte dynasty, and on the fundamental principles was the perpetual expulsion of that dynasty from the throne of France. Since then Belgium, Portugal, and Sweden. Coming also immediately after the wide-spread shattering of old landmarks consequent upon French conquests, the arrangements of victories amounted almost to a reconstruction. This reconstruction was based almost exclusively on dynastic considerations, the rights of the nations and the tendencies of what are now called "nationalities" being scarcely thought of. Every where were nations fragmented and distributed under foreign sovereignties. England's gain, indeed, was fully equaled by her loss in the new plan. She kept Malta, which was taken from the French, one got rid of, and to satisfy royal prejudices she also preserved the kingdom of Hanover, now about to cease. At the same time Austria was given to Austria, and Sardinia was confirmed to Piedmont; while the duchies of Tuscany, Parma, Modena, and Lucania were recognized as shams independent sovereignties, governed by collateral branches of the Austrian House. Austria built further obtained possession of the Tyrol, Illyria, and Dalmatia. Prussia's gains were enormous, and, unlike those of the Austrians, were accessions of real power. With half of Saxony, nearly all Westphalia, Swedish Pomerania, and almost all the Lower Rhine Provinces, she started afresh as a rival of Austria far more formidable than before. In the North of Europe, Russia received Finland from Sweden; as a consequence of which Sweden received Norway, which was taken from Denmark; and Denmark, who was not represented at the congress, got nothing in return. As to Poland, the three great partitioners made some fresh restriction of boundaries. The innumerable petty German States which had existed before the French Revolution, and which had been what diplomatists call mediatized, or, as plain people call it, absorbed at the setting up of the Bonapartist Confederation of the Rhine—these all remained swallowed up by their powerful neighbors. Holland, having ceded her German possessions, was consoled with the Belgic provinces, and became a kingdom; and Switzerland remained much as before.

The changes which have been made in the map of Europe since 1815 have been mostly in the second and other circles. The wars that have taken place have been distant from the centre. The wars in Turkey, Italy, and Denmark have left the great central region undisturbed. The chief theatre of the great European conflicts and conquests, and changes of boundaries, and reconstruction of dynasties, of the Thirty Years' War, of the Seven Years' War, of the wars of NAPOLEON, has now had fifty years' exemption from the pressure of hostile armies, and fifty years of advancement in all that constitutes the prosperity of nations and the happiness of the people.

THE IMMEDIATE OCCASIONS OF THE PRESENT CONFLICT.

Middle Europe is decorated with two opposite peninsulas. The northernmost of these is Jutland, reaching into the North Sea; the southern is Italy, extending into the Mediterranean. The actual trouble in Europe has to do immediately with these; more remotely, however, with the dozen of separated nationalities, which, replacing the old phantom of a balance of power, is the ruling idea of nineteenth-century diplomacy. Politically, as the ancient custom went, the duchies of Schleswig, Holstein, and Lauenburg belonged to Denmark; nationality, they belonged to Germany. Politically, Venetia belonged to Austria; nationally, it cohered with Italy. And to adjust these geographical, political, and tribal considerations, Europe has been perturbed for the last twenty years, and must at last go to war to settle them.

Schleswig and Holstein have for some hundreds of years been subject, almost invariably, to the crown of Denmark, though preserving to a large ether and as to the Danes a certain independence. The treaty of Kiel, 1814, gave the two provinces territorially to Denmark, but left them members of the Germanic confederation.

A new monarch, FREDERICK VIII., coming to the Danish throne early in 1848, found the two duchies in open revolt. The German empire had just been set up, and the people of the duchies resolved to be free. The cause had, in fact, a double. It lasted, with varying fortunes, until 1850, when, the Danish armies becoming decidedly triumphant, Prussia and Austria intervened with large bodies of troops. The revolt was subdued, and in 1851 the Great Powers met at London and fixed for ever the destinies of the duchies; and it was determined, May 8, 1852, that upon the demise of the actual owner of the Danish crown the latter should pass to CHRISTIAN, Duke of Glücksburg, and the duchies remain, as before, members of the Danish monarchy.

The demise of the Danish crown occurred in 1863; the claims of the Duke of Augustenburg were revived; a fresh conference of the Great Powers was called, for Austria and Prussia, acting in behalf of the German Confederation, had overrun the duchies with their troops, and King CHRISTIAN was on hand to secure the inheritance. The conference produced no fruit. The Danes were driven into the upper peninsula; the duchies were liberated, and constituting the claims of the Diet, the two powers took possession of the duchies, and proceeded to dispose of them. Austria held out her rights in Lauenburg indefinable as they were, to Prussia, but agreed to govern the larger duchies in common with the associate power. Quarrels necessarily resulted. Prussia wanted to monopolize Kiel, an important port on the Baltic coast. Austria was indisposed to this; and then, taking advantage of the extreme unpopularity of the Berlin Government in the duchies, it sought to secure a valuable influence in Northern Germany by concessions and indulgences to the emancipated communities.

This state of conflict lasted until the summer of 1865, when, as the only alternative of war, a treaty was concluded at Gastein (August 15) by which, within neither Power gave up its eventual claims to the entire plunder, Prussia was left to dominate over Schleswig, while Austria was suffered to work its sweet will with Holstein. Austria, having tried to get back a slice of Silesia in exchange for Holstein, and been snubbed, was even disposed to consult the people of that duchy on their own affairs, and when a refugee journalist or two took advantage of Holstein hospitality to denounce the tyranny of Prussia just over the border, Austria would not surrender the offenders, or silence or punish them. So Prussia continued to menace the Austrians, until the latter some three months ago saw the necessity of strengthening their northern frontier, which called for corresponding activity on the part of Berlin, and so with mutual mistrusts and useless parleyings the contending powers have urged on their armaments; and on a last resort, short of the ultimate re-sort of all, Austria has called over the destinies of the duchies to the Federal Diet, and summoned the Estates of Holstein to advises which the Court of Berlin, embodied in the resolute BISMARCK, chooses to denounce as the equivalent of a declaration of war.

THE REAL CAUSE OF THE WAR.

But the Schleswig-Holstein question and the Italian question are but the proximate occasions, and not the real cause of this War. The real issue is to be found in the rivalry between Austria and Prussia for supremacy in the Germanic Confederation—or rather, for the supremacy over a united Germany.

The secondary states of Germany must very shortly sink into the embraces of either Prussia or Austria; and this vast ..ooty is the stake for which the Hapsburgs and Hohenzollerns are gaming. Prussia is powerful, but unpopular; Austria is extremely popular with the reigning houses, but weak in finance, and also weak in its diversity of subject races and in its Italian relations. At the present time the indications are that in the approaching conflict it is Austria that will enlist the Diet and its minor members in its favor; and that while Hanover and Saxony will affect neutrality, and submit, if need be, to be fought over, Wurtemberg and Bavaria will take the field by the side of Austria.

THE GERMAN BATTLE-FIELD.

This strife for the imperial crown of Germany must have a theatre distinctly traced by the necessities of the case. Each combatant must strike, if possible, mortally; it his blow must therefore be at the heart; and he will be the victor whose blow first faces. Already we hear of an Austrian corps recalled from Holstein; there they would be beyond the chances of danger, or subject to recall. It is along the frontier of Silesia and Saxony, under the shadow of the Giant Mountains" which fern the northern boundary of Bohemia, and within such a day's ride by rail of Dresden, that Field Marshal BENEDEK has massed as much of the Austrian army as is to do the German campaign; in other words, the high road to Berlin is the objective point of Austrian energy. To repel this movement, and to make good an advance upon Vienna, is the business that brings the Prussian infantry with their needle guns face to face with the Austrian.

If the Austrians make good their entrance into Saxony, and over the fertile hills and valleys of that happy kingdom, if they attain and pass the strong positions, fortified and held by Prussia on the Saxon frontier, the march to Berlin will be a parade. The barrier removed, they will have before the lists where the possibility of an Austrian occupation of Prussia is to be determined; and it is within the bounds of possibility that they may a second time decide the fate of the Brandenburgs.

STRENGTH OF THE COMBATANTS.

The subjoined figures exhibit as clearly as figures usually do the apparent strength of the leading parties to this German quarrel:

	Area. Sq. Miles.	Popula-tion.	Army. Men.	Navy. Tons.	Debt.
Austria	258,511	37,000,000	800,000	69	$1,260,000,000
Prussia	108,333	19,594,332	350,000	50	None.

The great majority of the Prussian population are Germans, the total number of persons of non-German nationalities being only two millions and a half. Less than one-fourth of the Austrian population is German, as will be seen from the following:

Germans	8,300,000
Bohemians, Moravians, and Slovacks	5,000,000
Poles	4,500,000
Russians	3,800,000
Hungarians	4,000,000
Croats	1,800,000
Servians	1,400,000
Bulgarians	800,000
Magyars	6,000,000
Italians (inclusive of Ladins and Friauli)	3,000,000
Eastern Slavonians	1,700,000
Members of other races	1,400,000

THE SITUATION IN ITALY.

But Austria has to contend not only against Prussia, but against Italy also. Her acre of agony under Austrian rule, the Italians, encouraged by the BONAPARTE on the throne of France, arose in 1859, and with gallant gallantry drove the last long-deserted task of expelling the hated "Tedeschi" from the peninsula. Before the task was completed the Bonaparte, who had promised to liberate Italy from the Alps to the Adriatic, paused at the Mincio, and made at Villafranca a peace with the enemy.

To acquire Venetia has been the single idea of the Italians from July, 1859, to this moment. To sell it, to exchange it for other territory, to part with a foot of it on any terms but of the sternest necessity, Austria has incorrigibly refused; and its redemption has only been possible through wars and treaties. The Schleswig-Holstein war offered the Italian King an opportunity he could not decline. Minister BISMARCK has now failed to stimulate the hesitating ambition of King VICTOR; the Court of Vienna asserts, and events justify the belief, that a recent treaty with Prussia and Italy to assume the offensive simultaneously. Such has been the intense feeling of the Italians on the Venetian question that the paralyzing embarrassments of politics thus long put the popularity of their king in peril; and to disband his enormous standing army without a blow would be to encounter the risk of a popular outbreak.

Austria has assigned some three hundred and fifty thousand men, commanded by the Archduke ALBERT, to the defence of Venetia. The Italians have about an equal number of regular troops constituting them, commanded by General DELLA MARMORA, with the veteran generals CIALDINI and DURANDO as subordinates. But the most effective part of the peninsular army is the volunteer force, headed by GARIBALDI, numbering already one hundred thousand of the Italian youth, drawn from every province in the kingdom, and largely reinforced by refugees from Venetia.

The provinces for the freedom of which the war is to be waged lies in the northeastern angle of Italy. It is bounded westerly by the River Mincio and the Lago di Garda, northerly by the Alps, southerly by the Po, while its eastern limit is defined by the Adriatic and the Austrian territories of Trieste and Dalmatia.

To defend this outlying bit of empire Austria has established on the only approachable land side a quadrangle of fortifications, supported by a movement to forbid access. They are the great fortresses of Mantua, Peschiera, Legnano, and Verona, Mantua, on the centre of the Mincio, Peschiera, from which may be flooded in periods of danger, and it is flooded at present; Peschiera, at the foot of the Lago di Garda, commanding the Austrian frontier, and forming the northern extremity of a chain of defenses which render the Mincio from Mantua to the Lake practically impassable; Verona, with its fortified camp, and Legnano, in the rear of Peschiera and Mantua, forming the supports of the others, and intimately connected with the German frontier, and the ultimate base of Austrian defense, by the Venetian system of railroads, now used exclusively by government. The armies of the Po are those of Italian advance by the way of the Romagna. To assault Venetia the fleet of the "gentleman King" may approach Venice, or threaten Pola and Trieste; the regular army of DELLA MARMORA may attack the defenses of the Mincio, from which NAPOLEON III. recoiled; and the volunteers, swarming across the Lakes, or—by keeping with the intrepid tactics of GARIBALDI—turning its northern extremity—may appear on the Austrian flank.

The kingdom of Italy has an area of 98,781 English square miles, with a population, according to the last census, taken in the spring of 1864, of 21,761,325 souls. It has a seafaring population of 158,692 individuals, nearly all of whom are liable to the maritime conscription. The military organization of the kingdom is based on conscription, and the standing army consists of more than 200,000 men on a peace footing, and more than 400,000 on a war establishment. The navy of the kingdom consisted in 1865 of 98 steamers of 20,760 horsepower with 2160 guns, and 17 sailing vessels with 272 guns; altogether, 115 men-of-war with 2,949 guns. Italy has a public debt of nearly eight hundred millions of dollars.

ATTITUDE OF FRANCE.

The position taken by France in connection with the war is thus announced by the Emperor in a letter to M. DOUYER DE LHUYA, in which his Majesty, after detailing the efforts made in common with England and Russia to prevent an armed conflict, says:

"Had the Conference assembled my Government would have declared that France repudiated all idea of territorial aggrandizement so long as the European equilibrium should be undisturbed. France could only think of an extension of her frontiers in the event of the map of Europe being altered to the profit of a great Power, and of the bordering provinces expressing by a formal and free vote their desire for annexation. In the absence of these circumstances the French Government prefers to any territorial acquisition a good understanding with its neighbors, respect for their rights, and their independence and their nationality. We should have desired for the Germanic Confederation a position more worthy of its importance; for Prussia, better geographical boundaries; for Austria, the maintenance of her great position in Europe after the cession of Venetia. But all is exchange for territorial compensation. The Conference has failed. Will France be let to draw the sword? The French Government does not think it. Whatever may be the result of the war which may break out, no question affecting us will be resolved without the assent of France. Besides, therefore, we will continue to observe an attentive neutrality, confident in her right and calm in her strength."

The Diplomatic and European situation has been compiled from various sources. The best paper which has been published in this country on the subject appeared in the New York Evening Post for June 23. From this paper we have made extended extracts, using mainly the writer's own words without quotation.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

VERY EXPENSIVE BREACHES—Breaches of promise.

A Scotchman being asked to say what he thought "real music," answered, "Real music! hoot man, gin ye wad hear real music, listen to the bag-pipes!"

At a medical examination a young aspirant for a physician's diploma was asked, "When does mortification ensue?" "When you propose and are rejected," was the reply that gave him the coveted diploma.

A compass is said to have thirty-two points. The compass of some men's minds has no point at all.

"What branch of education do you have chiefly in your school?" was BISMARCK'S last query. "A birch branch, Sir," the master has used almost a whole tree."

A GOOD EXCUSE FOR DRINKING.—A lady made her husband a present of a silver cup with an angel at the bottom; and when she filled it for him he used to drink it to the bottom, and she asked him why he drank every time. "Because, duckey," he said, "I long to see that dear little angel." Upon which she had the angel taken out, and a devil engraved at the bottom; and he drank it up at one draught, and again asked him the reason. "Why," replied he, "because I won't have the old devil a drop."

Tom Kirkham used to tell of a friend of his dropping in about dinner-time on an old lady who invited him to draw up to the table. There was a small piece of the pot-roast for dinner. Her friend, who had been hunting, and so being hungry, was doing ample justice to the repast, when the old lady, with a view of getting more sort of meat in this place, "Yes, Madam," said he, "and fish too," as he drew from between his lips a bone he imagined was the back-bone of a veal horse or anchor. "Good heavens!" exclaimed the astonished woman, "if there ain't our dreadful comb that Billy had two weeks ago!"

A lady was told the other day, by a traveling physician, that every lady who had a small mouth was provided with a husband by Government. "Oh! is that it?" said the lady, smiling her mouth as little as she could. The gentleman asked, "What if she had a large mouth she was provided with two husbands." "My gracious!" exclaimed the lady, at the same time throwing her mouth open to the fullest extent. The gentleman became much alarmed, made his escape, and has not been heard of since.

A surgical journal speaks of a man who lived five years with a ball in his head. Job Squirm says he can beat that—he has had twice as long with nothing but balls in their heads.

THREE VISIONS OF ONE HEAD.

She wore a wreath of roses
The night that first we met;
Her lovely face was smiling
Beneath her curls of jet.
Her curls of jetty brightness
Were charmingly in tune
With the color on her features,
For the hue was Nature's own.
I saw her but a moment,
Yet methinks I see her now,
With the hair that Nature gave her
And above her snowy brow.

A head of Paris fashion,
When next we met, she wore
The expression of her features
Was sharper than before.
And studying by her side was one
Who seemed to give her pain,
As he rubbed the reddening field on
Which should have held a brain.
I saw her but a moment,
Yet methinks I see her now,
With the barber's nasty liquid
Smeared on her snowy brow.

And once again I met her—
No radiant locks were there;
An unwelcome wig she wore
Instead of lovely hair,
Her visage in silent solitude,
Because the locks as gone!
The barber's potion has destroyed
Her virgin bloom.
I saw her but a moment,
Yet I vow to see her now,
With the ruby proofs of fifty years
Upon her snowy brow.

"Sir, your account has been standing for two years, and I must have it settled immediately." To which the customer replied, "Sir, nothing is easily to settle by standing; I regret that my account is an exception. If it has been standing too long, suppose you lift it on a while."

Short visits are the best, as the fly said when he alighted on a hot stove.

An old lady who recently visited Gentle, New York, was asked on her return if the canal passed through that village? She paused a while and answered, "I guess not; I didn't see it; and if it did it must have gone through in the night when I was asleep."

WANTED—A feather from the dovetail of a carpenter.

The late Dr. Seymour was asked if he considered tight lacing bad for consumption? "Not at all; it is what it is for." was the cool and chilly reply.

The man who made a shoe for the foot of a mountain is now engaged on a last for the head of a discourse—after which he will manufacture a plume for Gen. Intelligence.

Jenkins thus describes the hangings of a New York belle: "She wore an exquisite hyphothisin on her head, while her brain was composed of transparent fol-de-rol, and her petticoat of crumbandumb, flounced with Brussels three-ply, of A No. 1."

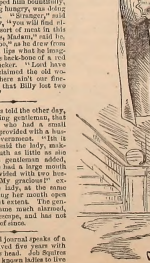
A jovial doctor on being asked, "How do you treat the cholera?" replied, "Treat it with unmitigated contempt."

AFRAID HE COULDN'T KEEP HIM.—The following advertisement appears in a Massachusetts paper:

"NOTICE.—The subscriber hereby forbids any person to marrying Rosalinda Frost, she having promised to marry me. JOHN GRAY."

Why is blindman's-buff like sympathy?—Because it is a fellow feeling for a fellow-creature.

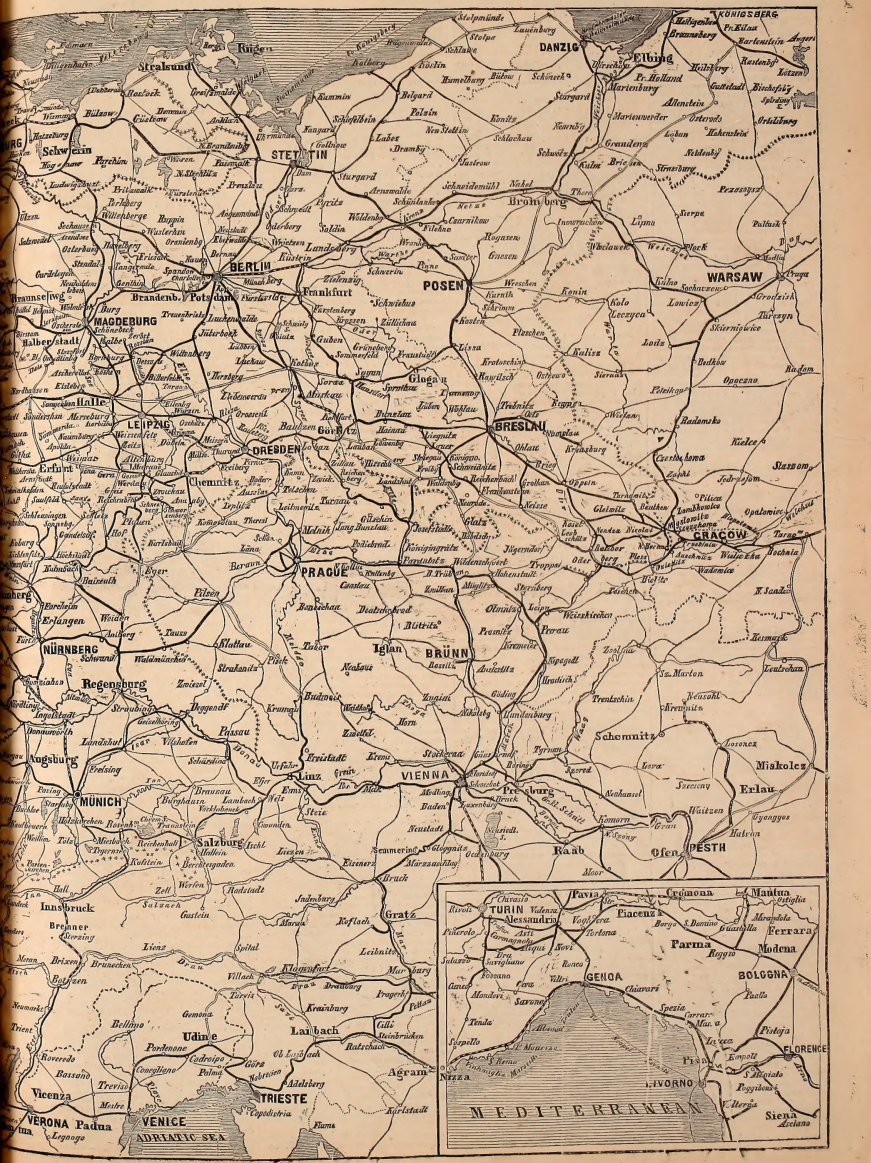
MR. WHIGGINS expressed her disappointment the other day on taking up the paper that "Time" asked them a girl's single living person dead that I know? It seems to me there ain't no more in this 'ere paper."



MEN who fight duels generally have two seconds to live after they are dead.

TO KILL AFFAIRS.—Hit your uncle's wife on the head with a hammer.

Some people are never contented. After having all their limbs broken, their heads smashed, and their brains knocked out in a railway accident, they will actually go to law, and try to get further damages.



A recipe for instantly removing suspicious hair: Undertake to kiss a spunky woman against her will.

Why is a prudent man like a pin?—Because his head prevents him from going too far.

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS ANNA WARNER,
Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER VII.

Now if there had been any unconcerned spectator in the old work-shop that afternoon, he would have seen that so much sunshine was not without its shadow; and of all places in the world it lay on the gentle face of little Prim. Quite unnoticed, however; for Clover and Lily were too full of their own joy, and Sam too busy and interested in examining the new tools, to give heed to much else, and Prim's delight had been so very evident at first, that afterward it might well be taken for granted. No eyes were brighter than hers when the great package was first brought in, none watched more eagerly to see the wrappings taken off one by one. But when Clover and Lily had untied all their tools, and Sam was hard at work upon the third little package, Prim's face began to wear a look that was more anxious than glad. With great intentness she followed every motion of Sam's fingers, as he unfolded her small tools; just glancing at hon and rake and spade with a look that said, plainly, "That is not it," passing them by in a search for something else. And when, at last, the little trowel and fork appeared, Prim gave them all one more glance and turned away. Slowly she stooped down and picked up the stiff brown wrapping papers, laying them one by one together in another place, and then looked down at the bare floor at her feet, where clearly there was nothing more. But nobody saw it all; and Prim stood quite still, struggling with something she called her little heart, almost beyond control; and when Lily said, "Let's go and show mamma," Prim hurriedly gathered up her tools and followed the others into the house. Mr. Orr was seated on the way Prim's little hand made a swift dash at her eyes, all that Clover and Lily knew about it was that Prim had dropped her trowel. But Mrs. May saw the whole thing in a moment; saw the slight quiver of the child's lips as she came in, and the shining of her eyelashes that were not to fall, and the listless droop of the hands that held the new tools. It was well for Prim that the other two were in full flow of their own glad exclamations; and she drew back behind them, and thought herself quite hid.

"Just look! mamma," cried Lily; "did you ever see any thing so perfect? See, mamma, that's a hoe."

"Yes, I know so much as that," said Mrs. May. "And this is a spade."

"This is a spade," repeated Lily; "splendid, isn't it? Just feel how light it is! Why, Sam says one could dig all day with such a spade."

"Only a little while, Miss Lily," said Sam, doubtful raising of her eyebrows, as her unwonted fingers took hold of the spade (the first one they had ever touched). "It looks like a very fine spade, indeed; and I dare say you will find it quite equal to any grandmother's needles."

"And, mamma, do you see these beautiful weeding forks?" said Clover. "Sam says they're so good for obstinate weeds."

"Papa needn't have got 'em for that," said Lily, twirling round on both toes. "There'll never be any weeds in my garden, obstinate or complisable."

"What a charming garden!" said Mr. May, admiringly. "Pray is that word one of Jack's importations?"

"No, mamma—Robin's."

"I think I would let Robin keep it, if I were you," said her mother. "But where are Prim's tools?"

"Here, mamma," answered a sober little voice off in the distance.

"Oh yes, you should see them, mamma," said Clover; "they're so very pretty, so small and delicate. I think Prim's tools are almost the prettiest of all. Come and show them to mamma, dear—I didn't mean to get before you so. Prim was so delighted, mamma!"

But there was no delight on the child's face as she came forward, and her mother's ear even caught a long-drawn breath that was very near being a sob; and it was with almost an air of weary relief that Prim piled the tools on her mother's lap and stood with her hands.

"Yes, this is a dear little spade," said Mrs. May as she examined them. "I do believe I could dig with this very well."

A watery little smile gleamed out on Prim's face for a minute, but she said not a word.

"Well, are these all the tools papa got for you?" said Mrs. May. Are these enough? They seem very few to me."

"Oh yes, mamma!" said Clover.

"More than enough, I think," said Lily. "I don't see what we're to do with the spades myself. Sam is to dig the ground for us."

"But we want to learn how," said Clover.

No wor'd from Prim, but only a tight clasp of the two little hands together.

"Then I may tell papa that you are satisfied?" said Mrs. May.

"Perfectly! perfectly!" said Lily, with another twirl. "We're just as happy as it's possible to be."

"A glad more than satisfied, mamma," said Clover, softly. "Please tell papa so."

Still little Primrose said nothing, except with that calm yet breathless gaze.

"Now run off and hangup your tools in the tool house," said Mrs. May. "Prim is tired—she must stay here and rest with me a while, and then we will come out together."

"Mamma," said Lily, gathering up her tools, and dropping first the hoe and then the weeding-fork—"oh dear! mamma, what was that about your grandmother's needles?"

"Our great-grandmother's needles," corrected Clover.

"It's all the same thing," said Lily.

"But it does not sound respectful to speak as if we had nothing to do with her," said Clover.

"I'm sure I never had much," said Lily, "seeing she died about a hundred years before I was born. Well, mamma?"

"When I was a little girl," said Mrs. May, "I used to get into a great deal of trouble over my sewing. I never could take small stitches, and I never could finish my seam, and so on. It is not at all an uncommon case."

"Yes, I know," said Lily, hastily. "Well, mamma?"

"And when I sat sighing over my work, my grandmother used to say to me: 'Dear, what is the matter?' And I, in the deepest trouble, would answer: 'I can't sew it right, I know!' Then my grandmother would say, cheerfully, 'Oh, I must lend you one of my famous needles, that will bring it all right.' So the good old lady would open her work-table and take out her needle-book of crimson and blue brocade—but old and faded then—and bring from its shining case a needle that was not just the proper size, she would hand it to me, saying: 'There, love, there is one of my famous needles. Now if you will put it in just right, and take it out just right, it will do every bit of the rest of the work itself.'"

"Mamma!" exclaimed Lily, quite indignantly, while Clover laughed, "I don't want my spade to be like that, I'm sure. Come, Clover, let's go hang up our tools." And away they went, leaving Prim rose in her mother's lap.

"Mamma," said little Primrose, after a minute's silence, "did the needles really do as she said?"

"I think they did, when I fulfilled the conditions," said Mrs. May, smiling. "That is, I was quite satisfied with your new tools, dear? Shall I tell papa so?"

A little hesitation, then Primrose answered, slowly:

"They're beautiful, mamma."

"And are you perfectly satisfied?" said her mother. "Papa will be sure to ask me."

"I think," said Prim, with a tone of dismay, "I think, mamma, I'm quite satisfied—that is, you did not seem quite so much pleased as Clover and Lily. If any one of the tools is not just right, you have it can be changed."

"They're beautiful, mamma!" said Prim, looking distressed.

"Then you have not quite all that you want?" said her mother. "Is that it?"

"It's so ungrateful!" said poor Primrose, her lips trembling.

"What is it, love?" said her mother. "Oh yes, I must know. Is there something else you would like to have?"

"Mamma, it's dreadful," said Primrose. "Papa is so good, and took so much trouble."

"Then there is something else?"

Prim nodded her little head despairingly.

"What is it?" said her mother, smiling. "Not a spy, I suppose?"

"Oh no, mamma. Please don't mind," said Primrose. "I think I shall get over it."

"What then?" said her mother.

"Mamma—it was only—my little watering-pot," said Primrose. "Only, it's so ungrateful!"

"Not a bit," said her mother, gayly; "is that all the matter? Now listen, and learn how safe it is to tell me every thing. When I was a little girl, many a sway again, after he had brought home the tools, he stepped back and said to me: 'The watering-pots are not come, after all!' And I said it for your sake. I forgot to speak to the children about it. But they can drive over to Hicory Corner some day, and choose for themselves. There are any quantity there, at the tinman's."

"Mamma," said little Primrose, a while after, as she and her mother sat alone, Prim's head resting in hand along the walk to the tool-house; "don't you think papa is almost the very best person in the whole world?"

Which "almost," be it known, was put in by Primrose only to keep a place for her mother on the same platform of absolute perfection.

SUMMER BOARDING.

I HAD been spending the winter with my cousin Alice Evans, and of course had heard, every month or two, that invariable suggestion of city people: "Where shall we go for the summer?" And this suggestion, it seemed to me, would come at the oddest and most unsuggestive times; when the thermometer stood below zero, for instance, and "the wind was howling in turret and tree."

To one who lived in a country town, like myself, this desire "to get away from the dust, and the heat," was Uncle Ralph expressed it, was inexplicable. I liked the bricks and mortar, the warm, brilliant rooms, the crowds, the shops, and the parties; and summer, to me, had always been a "waiting time" to this delightful season.

"I can't see, Alice," I said, "what is to such a hurry to leave a convenient house like this for some little poky country bedroom!" I ejaculated out of my amazement, and was quite relieved to see by the great mirror in Alice's luxurious room, thinking all the time of the twelve inches of glass that were over my dressing-table at Shell Beach last summer.

Alice was in the little dressing-closet, putting her pretty face through a thousand contortions. And she managed to sputter out in answer, between the dashes of water:

"That's because you—were—l-b-born—to the country. And"—splash, splash, "people—never appreciate their inheritance. I was born to—to—city-life; and I want a change—ju-ju-just as you did when you came here."

And here a final splash and a gasp, and my cousin emerged from the dressing-room bowling her face with an energy that left it as rosy as a milkmaid's.

"You want a change, Al? Well, I don't think much of your change. I can't half a mind to go down at with Shell Beach with your mosquitoes, and fleas, and little tucked-up rooms as it is here."

"Sara, you're a goose! Do you think we are going to stay all summer in those brick walls because they have, as the papers say, 'all the modern conveniences?'"

I laughed.

"But you needn't hurry off from them certainly as you did last summer, before the leaves had come. I'm sure it isn't a very pleasant change, to shiver in lodgings through those early June days."

Alice turned upon me a bright mass of yellow hair which she was getting up à la pompadour.

"Sara, what a practical idiot you are! Do you suppose that the change I look for is simply of things—the bedroom and what they contain, or don't contain? Haven't you a fourteen-karat particle of sentiment left in you, enough to know that it is the change in faces—the people, and not the place for the things? Don't you like Emerson says about every new person being an event to him? That's my case exactly. Every new person is, or I expect will be"—and here she laughed archly—"an event to me. But I get tired waiting for such an event as a new person in town. I've seen the same men, of the same kind of men, for the last four winters here. They don't vary a hair. Just two types, English and French. Mutton-chop whiskers and the imperial mustache. Goodness, Sara, they are ringing the bell for the third time for us! Do put that hair up straight. And with that third bell still ringing we went down to breakfast. Uncle Ralph nodded at us over his coffee-cup. "I guess you envied yourselves, girls," said Aunt Mary, looking up in her careless, kind way.

"So would you, mamma, if you had been kept awake for hours by mosquitoes as I was. Scrape, scrape, scrape. He was at it half the night I do believe."

"Who is he, pray?" asked Uncle Ralph.

"I don't know, I'm sure. It's somebody in the next house—somebody who plays every night regularly. I have a shrewd way at by itself. And then the tunes, or the attempts at tunes! That everlasting 'Annie Laurie.' 'Ma-ax—welion's lament,' and the awful end Alice in each comic imitation of the usual rendering, or murdering, that we all laughed. And before the laugh was over Alice said, suddenly:

"Papa, Sara wonders we don't stay here all summer. She thinks our 'modern improvements' more than enough to compensate for country air, and all that sort of thing."

"Indeed!" said Uncle Ralph, gravely.

"Oh yes, Say! I know the ins and outs of this young woman," Uncle Ralph returned, in his jovial way. "I dare say she has had the gaslight gossip."

Then he finished his third or fourth cup of coffee —Alice used to declare there was no end to the cups of coffee Uncle Ralph drank—and deliberately drawing his napkin across his lips, leaned back with one of his great comfortable sighs, and said:

"Well, girls, I believe I have found just the place for the summer."

Alice became at once in a state of the greatest excitement.

"Where in the world is it, papa?"

"Sherman told me of it—Dick Sherman. He says it's the prettiest place he knows."

"Papa, are you quite the same?" cried Alice, exasperated at his cool delay.

"Oh! Mount Heron—up there by the Wilder's place, you remember."

"To be sure I remember. And haven't I begged and entreated to be taken there at least a dozen times, and always been told that it was too far off. And now, when Mr. Sherman gives it a puff for the first time, you think it is of enough importance to mention. If it had been Mrs. Sherman now, you wouldn't have given it a moment's thought. Papa, you are a dear old mud!"

And Alice gave him a hearty smack, looking at him with delighted eyes all the time.

So it was very soon settled all about Mount Heron. And it was settled, too, that instead of my returning to Eskville I should keep on with them to the mountains. I liked this very much, for I knew somebody at Mount Heron too; and I knew that there was something better to be had there than little poky rooms, and that never a mosquito or a flea dared to show themselves in that region.

"You horrid, practical thing!" cried Alice, as I remarked this to her. "I'm always thinking of rooms and creature-comforts. Pity you couldn't take some of these 'modern conveniences' with you that you prate about, for you see my mind is exalted to one anticipation. The new person who is to be an event to me." She laughed gayly as she said this, and continued the moment: "But seriously, Sara, I do think a great deal of this change in society. One really meets very little variety here. It's all very well to 'know' and when a new person comes, why they seem all of the same species, and all like the individual people, somebody out of 'our set;' and one is sure to meet them at a summer resort."

And one must have lots of pretty things for this meeting, Alice," I returned, quietly, but with a sly look at the yards of muslin and cambric and tissue which lay upon the bed ready to be unscrupulously into becoming peignoirs and dinner-dresses.

Alice made one of her odd little grimaces at me, and went on with her packing—a voluminous undertaken which we filled out the next day. Mercy, what loads of things we bought! What jackets and pokey and shapeless hats! "so-sides." I wonder if all city girls buy just such things, and so many of them, for these summer resorts? I asked Alice the question, and she opened her eyes at my ignorance.

"Just such things? Yes, and ten times as many. Why Liv very economical, Sara," she answered.

I have no reason to doubt her assertion, but to my country ideas it did seem, as black Martha said, "An awful heap of things."

This was in April, and the days drew on apace when we should leave the much-abused brick-and-mortar, and start for Mount Heron. Lovely days they were of sunshine and soft airs, when we could let our windows stand open for hours. This was very delightful, and we should have enjoyed it vastly if it hadn't been for one thing. That neighbor of ours who had early in the season confined his virtuosity practice to late evening, now, perhaps into more musical humor by the coming of the spring, was "at it," to use Alice's exasperated expression, "mornings, noon, and night."

Well, it did seem as if we never laid down for a nap after a tiresome shopping, or attempted any thing where we wanted our senses quiet, but what that bow would set to scraping. And whatever else he played he always wound up with "Annie Laurie." One day when he came at it for the fifth lay me down and die," Alice grated her teeth and cried out, savagely. "I will, I wish to goodness in would!" But he didn't. He kept on, and scraped, and throve, as that industriously handled bow could have witnessed. And we lived and bore it, more or less, with bad, reference with abuse and ridicule.

This is the fun of living in the city in blocks, Miss Sara," Alice flung out at me more than once. "Last night it was a baby, as soon as I got to sleep widows opera in April my ears were saluted a dozen times a day by the most terrific screams you ever heard. What could I do? The torture-thing kept rising until I was nearly suffocated, and up would go my window, and, presto! up would go that baby's voice. When I saw the family moving in the fall I congratulated myself. And here, in this place, there is no place of that baby—is this man with his horrid fiddle!

I began to see that there were two sides to a question, and that Alice's city experiences might not have an offset in this close proximity of quarters, especially when it was warm enough to open one's windows. Alice was given to these sudden nervousnesses; and by the first of June we had left the fiddle behind us, and were making our way to the great hills and valleys and about Mount Heron.

"Now, Sara, isn't this nice?" asked Alice, as she looked about our room. Yes, it was very nice. "And you will be glad you came now, can you?" No, I acknowledged that I couldn't.

It was very nice indeed, and we prepared to enjoy ourselves to the full. And it was a great deal of enjoyment at Mount Heron. There was plenty to do, plenty to see, and, it seemed, no end to the new people we were continually coming across. It was not until the beginning of July that the place was really filled with guests. And it was about this time that Alice began to enjoy herself more thoroughly. A little of a coquette was my pretty cousin, and a little self-indulgent and epicurean. Quilities which at least led to much ease, and, unless that "destiny that shapes our ends, rough hew them how we will," had a different ordering of some great special sufferings for her. A bunch of roses more and more every day as I watched her. She was gay and brilliant and fascinating, and a little fast in her acknowledging money. I was not sure, and though I knew she had, as she said, a taste for "individual people," "somebody out of our set," yet somehow it always required that the gentleman and rode and croqueted with just the two types she had designated as belonging to the men with the mutton-chop whiskers and the imperial mustache—the fashionable young fellows, in short, whom she professed to be tired of. One day I chaffed her about this, somewhat unmercifully I confess; asking her, satirically, if this was the way in which she carried out her line of action, etc. She laughed, colored a little, and then answered, with a good deal more spirit than the occasion appeared to warrant:

"Sara, you should always speak so generously to the letter of one's words. I do like individual people just as much as ever, but I don't think it is necessary for a lady to look about for the whole other people in society in every particular by any means. You remember how that dandy, Carford, astonished us all by his wholesale abuse of us in the war? And further back, Miss Sara, just think of those young heroes at Balaklava. They were dandies too, Sir Lucy, and others, and yet their dandyism at home, they turned out to be very individual people, I think."

"Alice," said I best forward and scrutinized that pink face under the round hat—"Alice, I believe, after all, that one of these dandies is turning out an event to you; and you're ashamed to say so! Mount Heron to find him when you had 'en by the dozen at home."

"He isn't a dandy—no such a thing; he only dresses like other people; and I hate that'ridiculous affected reformatory artistic style, or whatever you call it, which some men assume to try to show themselves superior. I don't think it is an evidence of sense or wisdom. I believe in conformity in such matters, and I don't see why I should not permit person won't stop to fight fashion; they'll have something better to do!"

This completely out of breath Alice stopped. But she had ron her tilt right into the enemy's camp and betrayed herself fairly.

"Who is he?" I said, so the great event has arrived! Who is he? where is he?"

My cousin by this time had recovered herself sufficiently to see how useless it was for her to attempt denial; and so with a half-laugh, and a half-frown, and a very high color, she said:

"Now, Sara, you can't be much wiser more of it than is necessary, for I am not by any means engaged for any thing as yet."

She ceased speaking so suddenly that I looked up from the fern-leaves I was painting for the reason, and found her bowing to a gentleman with the most enchanting smile, and with a little lest look in her eyes which apprised me at once that the "event" was passing. I lent further forward to the entire destruction of one of my ferns and my white muslin sleeve, and looked down, to see a tall young gentleman with mutton-chop whiskers, and the usual faultless tout ensemble of "our set." Alice did not stop to finish her explanation to me after this, but with a little nervousness and a good deal of self-possession, she began to introduce me to Mr. Carford.

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER VII.

Now if there had been any unconcerned spectator in the old work-shop that afternoon, he would have seen that so much sunshine was not without its shadow; and of all places in the world it lay on the gentle face of little Prim. Quite unnoticed, however; for Clover and Lily were too full of their own joy, and Sam too busy and interested in examining the new tools, to give heed to much else, and Prim's delight had been so very evident at first, that afterward it might well be taken for granted. No eyes were brighter than hers when the great package was first brought in, none watched more eagerly to see the wrappings taken off one by one. But when Clover and Lily had untied all their tools, and Sam was hard at work upon the third little package, Prim's face began to wear a look that was more anxious than glad. With great intentness she followed every motion of Sam's fingers, as he unfolded her small tools; just glancing at hon and rake and spade with a look that said, plainly, "That is not it," passing them by in a search for something else. And when, at last, the little trowel and fork appeared, Prim gave them all one more glance and turned away. Slowly she stooped down and picked up the stiff brown wrapping papers, laying them one by one together in another place, and then looked down at the bare floor at her feet, where clearly there was nothing more. But nobody saw it all; and Prim stood quite still, struggling with something she called her little heart, almost beyond control; and when Lily said, "Let's go and show mamma," Prim hurriedly gathered up her tools and followed the others into the house. Mr. Orr was seated on the way Prim's little hand made a swift dash at her eyes, all that Clover and Lily knew about it was that Prim had dropped her trowel. But Mrs. May saw the whole thing in a moment; saw the slight quiver of the child's lips as she came in, and the shining of her eyelashes that were not to fall, and the listless droop of the hands that held the new tools. It was well for Prim that the other two were in full flow of their own glad exclamations; and she drew back behind them, and thought herself quite hid.

"Just look! mamma," cried Lily; "did you ever see any thing so perfect? See, mamma, that's a hoe."

"Yes, I know so much as that," said Mrs. May. "And this is a spade."

"This is a spade," repeated Lily; "splendid, isn't it? Just feel how light it is! Why, Sam says one could dig all day with such a spade."

"Only a little while, Miss Lily," said Sam, doubtful raising of her eyebrows, as her unwonted fingers took hold of the spade (the first one they had ever touched). "It looks like a very fine spade, indeed; and I dare say you will find it quite equal to any grandmother's needles."

"And, mamma, do you see these beautiful weeding forks?" said Clover. "Sam says they're so good for obstinate weeds."

"Papa needn't have got 'em for that," said Lily, twirling round on both toes. "There'll never be any weeds in my garden, obstinate or complisable."

"What a charming garden!" said Mr. May, admiringly. "Pray is that word one of Jack's importations?"

"No, mamma—Robin's."

"I think I would let Robin keep it, if I were you," said her mother. "But where are Prim's tools?"

"Here, mamma," answered a sober little voice off in the distance.

"Oh yes, you should see them, mamma," said Clover; "they're so very pretty, so small and delicate. I think Prim's tools are almost the prettiest of all. Come and show them to mamma, dear—I didn't mean to get before you so. Prim was so delighted, mamma!"

But there was no delight on the child's face as she came forward, and her mother's ear even caught a long-drawn breath that was very near being a sob; and it was with almost an air of weary relief that Prim piled the tools on her mother's lap and stood with her hands.

"Yes, this is a dear little spade," said Mrs. May as she examined them. "I do believe I could dig with this very well."

A watery little smile gleamed out on Prim's face for a minute, but she said not a word.

"Well, are these all the tools papa got for you?" said Mrs. May. Are these enough? They seem very few to me."

"Oh yes, mamma!" said Clover.

"More than enough, I think," said Lily. "I don't see what we're to do with the spades myself. Sam is to dig the ground for us."

"But we want to learn how," said Clover.

No wor'd from Primrose, but only a tight clasp of the two little hands together.

"Then I may tell papa that you are satisfied?" said Mrs. May.

"Perfectly! perfectly!" said Lily, with another twirl. "We're just as happy as it's possible to be."

"A glad more than satisfied, mamma," said Clover, softly. "Please tell papa so."

Still little Primrose said nothing, except with that calm yet breathless gaze.

"Now run off and hangup your tools in the tool house," said Mrs. May. "Prim is tired—she must stay here and rest with me a while, and then we will come out together."

"Mamma," said Lily, gathering up her tools, and dropping first the hoe and then the weeding-fork—"oh dear! mamma, what was that about your grandmother's needles?"

"Our great-grandmother's needles," corrected Clover.

"It's all the same thing," said Lily.

"But it does not sound respectful to speak as if we had nothing to do with her," said Clover.

"I'm sure I never had much," said Lily, "seeing she died about a hundred years before I was born. Well, mamma?"

"When I was a little girl," said Mrs. May, "I used to get into a great deal of trouble over my sewing. I never could take small stitches, and I never could finish my seam, and so on. It is not at all an uncommon case."

"Yes, I know," said Lily, hastily. "Well, mamma?"

"And when I sat sighing over my work, my grandmother used to say to me: 'Dear, what is the matter?' And I, in the deepest trouble, would answer: 'I can't sew it right, I know!' Then my grandmother would say, cheerfully, 'Oh, I must lend you one of my famous needles, that will bring it all right.' So the good old lady would open her work-table and take out her needle-book of crimson and blue brocade—but old and faded then—and bring from its shining case a needle that was not just the proper size, she would hand it to me, saying: 'There, love, there is one of my famous needles. Now if you will put it in just right, and take it out just right, it will do every bit of the rest of the work itself.'"

"Mamma!" exclaimed Lily, quite indignantly, while Clover laughed, "I don't want my spade to be like that, I'm sure. Come, Clover, let's go hang up our tools." And away they went, leaving Prim rose in her mother's lap.

"Mamma," said little Primrose, after a minute's silence, "did the needles really do as she said?"

"I think they did, when I fulfilled the conditions," said Mrs. May, smiling. "That is, I was quite satisfied with your new tools, dear? Shall I tell papa so?"

A little hesitation, then Primrose answered, slowly:

"They're beautiful, mamma."

"And are you perfectly satisfied?" said her mother. "Papa will be sure to ask me."

"I think," said Prim, with a tone of dismay, "I think, mamma, I'm quite satisfied—that is, you did not seem quite so much pleased as Clover and Lily. If any one of the tools is not just right, you have it can be changed."

"They're beautiful, mamma!" said Prim, looking distressed.

"Then you have not quite all that you want?" said her mother. "Is that it?"

"It's so ungrateful!" said poor Primrose, her lips trembling.

"What is it, love?" said her mother. "Oh yes, I must know. Is there something else you would like to have?"

"Mamma, it's dreadful," said Primrose. "Papa is so good, and took so much trouble."

"Then there is something else?"

Prim nodded her little head despairingly.

"What is it?" said her mother, smiling. "Not a spy, I suppose?"

"Oh no, mamma. Please don't mind," said Primrose. "I think I shall get over it."

"What then?" said her mother.

"Mamma," said little Primrose, a while after, as she and her mother sat alone, Prim's head resting in hand along the walk to the tool-house; "don't you think papa is almost the very best person in the whole world?"

Which "almost," be it known, was put in by Primrose only to keep a place for her mother on the same platform of absolute perfection.

She laughed gayly as she said this, and continued the moment: "But seriously, Sara, I do think a great deal of this change in society. One really meets very little variety here. It's all very well to 'know' and when a new person comes, why they seem all of the same species, and all like the individual people, somebody out of 'our set;' and one is sure to meet them at a summer resort."

And one must have lots of pretty things for this meeting, Alice," I returned, quietly, but with a sly look at the yards of muslin and cambric and tissue which lay upon the bed ready to be unscrupulously into becoming peignoirs and dinner-dresses.

Alice made one of her odd little grimaces at me, and went on with her packing—a voluminous undertaken which we filled out the next day. Mercy, what loads of things we bought! What jackets and pokey and shapeless hats! "so-sides." I wonder if all city girls buy just such things, and so many of them, for these summer resorts? I asked Alice the question, and she opened her eyes at my ignorance.

"Just such things? Yes, and ten times as many. Why Liv very economical, Sara," she answered.

I have no reason to doubt her assertion, but to my country ideas it did seem, as black Martha said, "An awful heap of things."

This was in April, and the days drew on apace when we should leave the much-abused brick-and-mortar, and start for Mount Heron. Lovely days they were of sunshine and soft airs, when we could let our windows stand open for hours. This was very delightful, and we should have enjoyed it vastly if it hadn't been for one thing. That neighbor of ours who had early in the season confined his virtuosity practice to late evening, now, perhaps into more musical humor by the coming of the spring, was "at it," to use Alice's exasperated expression, "mornings, noon, and night."

Well, it did seem as if we never laid down for a nap after a tiresome shopping, or attempted any thing where we wanted our senses quiet, but what that bow would set to scraping. And whatever else he played he always wound up with "Annie Laurie." One day when he came at it for the fifth lay me down and die," Alice grated her teeth and cried out, savagely. "I will, I wish to goodness in would!" But he didn't. He kept on, and scraped, and throve, as that industriously handled bow could have witnessed. And we lived and bore it, more or less, with bad, reference with abuse and ridicule.

This is the fun of living in the city in blocks, Miss Sara," Alice flung out at me more than once. "Last night it was a baby, as soon as I got to sleep widows opera in April my ears were saluted a dozen times a day by the most terrific screams you ever heard. What could I do? The torture-thing kept rising until I was nearly suffocated, and up would go my window, and, presto! up would go that baby's voice. When I saw the family moving in the fall I congratulated myself. And here, in this place, there is no place of that baby—is this man with his horrid fiddle!

I began to see that there were two sides to a question, and that Alice's city experiences might not have an offset in this close proximity of quarters, especially when it was warm enough to open one's windows. Alice was given to these sudden nervousnesses; and by the first of June we had left the fiddle behind us, and were making our way to the great hills and valleys and about Mount Heron.

"Now, Sara, isn't this nice?" asked Alice, as she looked about our room. Yes, it was very nice. "And you will be glad you came now, can you?" No, I acknowledged that I couldn't.

It was very nice indeed, and we prepared to enjoy ourselves to the full. And it was a great deal of enjoyment at Mount Heron. There was plenty to do, plenty to see, and, it seemed, no end to the new people we were continually coming across. It was not until the beginning of July that the place was really filled with guests. And it was about this time that Alice began to enjoy herself more thoroughly. A little of a coquette was my pretty cousin, and a little self-indulgent and epicurean. Quilities which at least led to much ease, and, unless that "destiny that shapes our ends, rough hew them how we will," had a different ordering of some great special sufferings for her. A bunch of roses more and more every day as I watched her. She was gay and brilliant and fascinating, and a little fast in her acknowledging money. I was not sure, and though I knew she had, as she said, a taste for "individual people," "somebody out of our set," yet somehow it always required that the gentleman and rode and croqueted with just the two types she had designated as belonging to the men with the mutton-chop whiskers and the imperial mustache—the fashionable young fellows, in short, whom she professed to be tired of. One day I chaffed her about this, somewhat unmercifully I confess; asking her, satirically, if this was the way in which she carried out her line of action, etc. She laughed, colored a little, and then answered, with a good deal more spirit than the occasion appeared to warrant:

"Sara, you should always speak so generously to the letter of one's words. I do like individual people just as much as ever, but I don't think it is necessary for a lady to look about for the whole other people in society in every particular by any means. You remember how that dandy, Carford, astonished us all by his wholesale abuse of us in the war? And further back, Miss Sara, just think of those young heroes at Balaklava. They were dandies too, Sir Lucy, and others, and yet their dandyism at home, they turned out to be very individual people, I think."

"Alice," said I best forward and scrutinized that pink face under the round hat—"Alice, I believe, after all, that one of these dandies is turning out an event to you; and you're ashamed to say so! Mount Heron to find him when you had 'en by the dozen at home."

"He isn't a dandy—no such a thing; he only dresses like other people; and I hate that'ridiculous affected reformatory artistic style, or whatever you call it, which some men assume to try to show themselves superior. I don't think it is an evidence of sense or wisdom. I believe in conformity in such matters, and I don't see why I should not permit person won't stop to fight fashion; they'll have something better to do!"

This completely out of breath Alice stopped. But she had ron her tilt right into the enemy's camp and betrayed herself fairly.

"Who is he?" I said, so the great event has arrived! Who is he? where is he?"

My cousin by this time had recovered herself sufficiently to see how useless it was for her to attempt denial; and so with a half-laugh, and a half-frown, and a very high color, she said:

"Now, Sara, you can't be much wiser more of it than is necessary, for I am not by any means engaged for any thing as yet."

She ceased speaking so suddenly that I looked up from the fern-leaves I was painting for the reason, and found her bowing to a gentleman with the most enchanting smile, and with a little lest look in her eyes which apprised me at once that the "event" was passing. I lent further forward to the entire destruction of one of my ferns and my white muslin sleeve, and looked down, to see a tall young gentleman with mutton-chop whiskers, and the usual faultless tout ensemble of "our set." Alice did not stop to finish her explanation to me after this, but with a little nervousness and a good deal of self-possession, she began to introduce me to Mr. Carford.

was strolling up a hill-path with the new "event." I returned to my forms laughing inwardly, and wondering how it would end. Was Alice, this little, gay, coquettish Alice, with her free ideas and her theories, really touched at last, and by the very type of man whom she had always affected to hold despised? It looked very like it I had to confess. That evening there was a "hop" in the hall, and as I stood talking to one of the young Wareham's Alice came up from a waltz with the identical gentleman.

"This is Mr. Alney, Sara; my cousin Miss Chester, Mr. Alney."

I received a very pleasant smile from the very handsome man, who turned between those moderate chop whiskers, and then the usual commonplaces were gone through with about the weather, and the room being rather full, until another waltz struck up, and another aspirant came flying across the floor to keep his engagement with Alice; and so it happened that I was left alone with Mr. Alney, for by this time young Wareham had disappeared. Again the very pleasant smile from the handsome mouth, and,

"Will you waltz, Miss Chester?"

"No, I didn't care to," and I told him so. "But pray, Mr. Alney, don't let me keep you here. There's Katy Wareham now who will be delighted to dance, I dare say; let me introduce you. See that pretty young girl in blue across there," and saying this I had already started forward a step or two toward Katy, expecting my companion to follow. But he stood still with his outstretched hand laid on my sleeve and the words:

"Stay a moment, Miss Chester. I can do something besides dance; and if you have no objection I won't know Miss Wareham just yet."

There was a queer, quizzical look in his face, a glimmer of fun in his eyes as he said this which made me strongly suspect that he had a suspicion of my possible estimate of him.

Well, we staid there and talked. It wasn't a very remarkable conversation. We neither of us said any thing very wonderful; yet at the end of it I knew that Mr. Alney was neither wanting in sense nor dullness. Perhaps, after all, he might turn out to be one of those strongly individual persons whom Alice affected so much. It was pretty evident that she fancied he was now. As I thought this I looked at the immaculate neck-tie, the carefully-arranged hair, and faultless detail of elegant attire, which, with faultless by half, for exactly so much I should like you better, or at least believe in your possibilities more," was the conclusion of my thought, "if you were not quite so much of a dandy."

But my thoughts were of very little consequence in this matter, and as we were just two people who were concerned here, and these two seemed to be perfectly well suited with the development of things, I was not annoyed. Therefore, when one evening Alice came up and acquainted me with the fact of her engagement to Mr. Richard Alney, I offered my congratulations in the gentlest way I could, but I couldn't quite conceal the amusement I felt at the recollection of her words about the mutton-chop-whisker-and-cut-coat "at." But then, as Alice said, I did stick so persistently to the letter of one's words.

"I know what you mean, Sara!" she exclaimed, half laughing herself as I told her I was glad that her great "event" had come to her at last. "I know you think I have come all the way to Mount Heron to find what I might have found in any drawing-room in New York—a superfine dandy. But you are mistaken. Richard is nothing of the kind, though he does wear his hair parted in the middle sometimes."

"Oh, does he?" I answered. "Well, I didn't notice that, my dear, and I'm sure I don't see why he shouldn't; but nothing to me; but you know your great hobby has always been—"

"Yes, I know, Sara, but Dick is better than my hobby." And with this confession we both of us became silent, and presently lost ourselves in sleep, which was certainly the best thing we could do, as it was almost midnight.

I was dreaming a very old dream the next morning, where I seemed to be in our old room in town trying to hush the sound of that baby's screaming, which Alice had told me about; and in the midst of my fruitless efforts I woke up to hear—no, not "that baby," but, as you live, that baby's father. There it went, I knew it could be no other, scrape, scrape, scrape—on "Ma-as-welton's banks." I could have thought that Alice, but I wouldn't. I scolded for Alice. Presently I heard that regular respiration suspend, then a little start, and then:

"Oh, he's certainly followed you here! I know he has. I know it's you. Say, for don't you remember, the day we left, that red-haired, red-whiskered young gentleman who came down the steps of the next house, and how he stared at you? He never once looked at me."

Again back scrubbed out, and again and again she reverted to the subject, calling him, in gleeful retributive malice, "my event," and looking about with his various eyes at the breakfast-table for the red-haired stranger.

I expected when Mr. Alney came in that she would tell him the story, but Mr. Alney was too sacred yet to be funny with; for I have noticed that your gay, mischief-loving girls are invariably the most reverent in the early days of their engagements. No, she didn't tell Mr. Alney yet; her mind was too full of other things when that handsome face appeared; and I am not sure but she could have forgotten the fiddler altogether during those days if he hadn't kept himself so much by Ma-as-welton's banks every morning.

The house we were in was built in what is called a hollow square, the room was at the further end of a long hall; that of our fiddling friend was in the next angle—just around the corner, as it were, but of course entirely separated by the thickness of the halls. Situated thus, you see, though our windows were close neighbors, we entered from different ways and never encountered each other. I did think it was rather strange we never saw a face at the window; but then gentlemen are very little in their rooms at a watering-place, and this one, I knew quite well, kept very early hours, for wasn't that industrious bow scraping away some mornings by five o'clock? And every one of these mornings Alice would wake up with a grumble and the most unflattering mimicry. Then would follow the usual chaffing about my mysterious adorer.

"I wish I'd never seen his face, Sara; you'll only hear him, I'm afraid," she said to me at one time. But we did see him sooner than she expected. It was not very late, the close of the afternoon, when all three—Alice and Mr. Alney and myself—were sitting out on the terrace. By this time Alice had come out of her reserve enough to know, and then discuss, the things pertaining to this earth, and so it happened that she began quizzing about my "adventurer-at-law" another day. We two of this kind pricked up Mr. Alney's ears.

"Eh? What is that? Has Miss Sara a mysterious admirer?" he asked.

"Indeed she has, Richard; and he serenades her every morning with 'Annie Laurie' on the violin. You ought to hear it. And what is more, he has followed us away up here from New York, where for two months before our leaving he went on in the same monotonous way next door to us. Think of his being next window to us now. Isn't it romantic?"

"Next window to you? Where is your window, pray?"

"Why, at the southeast corner, where the multberry-tree are; and our fiddler's is just here," drawing out a little diagram on the letter she held for inflation. "Do you see?" pointing her pencil at the two windows.

"Yes, I see." And Mr. Alney's look of amusement suddenly became one of interest.

Alice, glancing up at him, exclaimed, "Richard, you know who it is, I am perfectly sure. Oh, tell us, tell us!"

"Wait a minute, Alice. What is the number of your house in town?"

"570."

"And the street?"

"Why, I told you the other day it was on Seventh Street."

"Bless my soul! No! I thought you said—I must have his words were lost in an uncontrollable burst of laughter.

"Richard, for pity's sake what is it—who is it?" exclaimed Alice.

"What is it? Who is it?" burst through the laughing tones. "It is just this—your neighbor is—and I—and here another great laugh broke down the words, and then he suddenly resumed: "Alice, here is a very simple explanation of the mystery. Your fiddler lives at No. 572, exactly. Street. Mine is 572. Your room here is at the southeast corner, by the mulberry-trees. Mine is in the adjoining house."

"Richard! you don't mean to say that—"

"That I am the mysterious stranger who performs 'Annie Laurie' on the violin? I do mean to say just that, my dear Alice."

His eyes twinkled with the fun of the thing. As for me, I couldn't utter a word or laugh, but gave vent to the laughter that assailed me, wherein Mr. Alney joined most heartily, and after a moment Alice herself.

"To think we should have been next-door neighbors, Alice, all this time, and never known it!" he cried, rising from his seat and steadily eyeing themselves again. "And to think I should have serenaded you unwittingly for the last four months! Music's charms, they say, are soothing, Alice! Did it penetrate, Alice? Did your fastidious Germanic taste, your classical 'ear,' get offended by my choice of selections? Did you ever vow anathematizes me; that you wished the fiddler would keep the peace, and have done with his murderous attempts at music?"

Alice colored so violently that all reply was needless. And I never was so thankful for my old deafness. I knew she had sensibility to hear, but I think you'll have to let me have a far corner somewhere, Alley, where I can scrape away a little bit. My cousin Sara will be glad to be said this I could have kissed him. But I didn't!

"In exile?" cried Alice. "Never in camp?"

"To be sent to the rear at the first, which was a better," and lifting a lock of falling hair, he showed a small but deep scar, saying, with rising color and a smile, "I was wounded at Antietam."

"Oh, tell me all about it?" Alice exclaimed.

"There's nothing to tell, Alice. I only received no wound of consequence. I did my duty as a Lieutenant—that was all. You see I wasn't famous any way."

Only did his duty! The manly, simple words touched me strangely, and, looking up, I saw the tears in Alice's eyes. At this I stole away and left them.

Only did his duty! "and wasn't famous any way." To do one's duty. How many noble lives might tell the same story! But they were all heroic—just the same—all possible Bukalava heroes. I thought.

Well, well, well! So this was the end of that fiddling!

We had come all the way from New York to get acquainted with a next-door neighbor!

"Yes think, Alice," I said afterward, "that you came all the way from New York, when there was only a partition between you."

Alice was ready to laugh at any time now, for she was very good and very happy; and her voice sounded here in a tinkle like merry bells. "But isn't he splendid, Say?" she asked me. "And don't you think now he is one of my individual people after all?"

After all, Alice—immaculate neck-ties, varnished boots, primrose kids, and all."

But he earned his title to individuality by something more than this. When the talk of the marriage day drew nearer he brought out a scheme of his which astonished me.

He was holding, and had held some time, an honorable government appointment, but he wished to give this up and go out to a new country. He had a friend in Colorado who had offered him a partnership in his business. It was a life much darker, he knew, than he would leave, but it also seemed to him freer and more manly, for he hated to be a hanger-on of any kind. And then it seemed to him that these new countries were meant for the young men, and were better for them. This was the way he talked, and, after agreeing with him, he speedily put his talk into action.

"Yes; plenty of individuality, Alice," I whispered to her one evening. "But where do you suppose will you put that fiddle when you are in Colorado?"

The bridegroom heard this last question; and bending down to me, he answered: "Sara, I've made it over to Tom Granger; so I dare say you'll hear it when you are at 5/0 —tenth Street, for Tom is going to take my old room at cousin Sara's."

Reader, can you believe it? Tom Granger has actually taken possession of that room; and as I write this he is, I dare say, tearing "Ou" Ma-as-welton's banks as bonnie."

And furthermore, Tom Granger is the identical red-haired fellow who came out from a call that day, stared at me so persistently.

"Mount Carmel, perhaps, they say it will penetrate." I wonder if it will penetrate to Mount Heron this summer; and I wonder if I—? But I think I have wandered enough on this subject. I will think wondering had better be left for time to settle, or till another season of "Summer Boarding."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP

One of the popular Magazines (Philadelphia) for July, in speaking of New York and Philadelphia, says—evidently in anticipation—"Our hot, dusty cities are beginning to look deserted." Not a bit of it. New York, at least, is lively as ever, and, for that matter, is not much the same to be true of Philadelphia! At mid-day, when all the fashionable world is out of town, and actually shivering had better be left for time to settle, or till another season of "Summer Boarding."

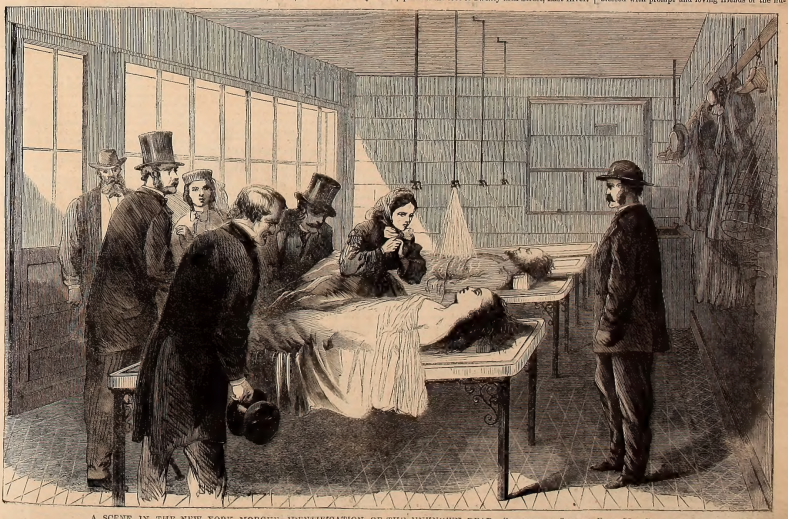
WHY HE CANNOT SLEEP.



NEW YORK CITY DOG POUND, FOOT OF TWENTY-FIFTH STREET, EAST RIVER.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

THE DOG POUND.

In the earlier years of the annual raid on dogs in this city the Pound was located at the foot of Thirty-first Street and the East River, whence it travelled to Twenty-eighth Street, from which classic locality it then departed for Twenty-sixth Street and North River, where, after a short stay of a single month, it removed to Twenty-fourth Street, East River, where it reposed in peace for three years, and then removed to its present stopping-place at the foot of Twenty-fifth Street, East River.

The Dog Law went into operation June 18. From this time for three months woe be to the unmuzzled cur found meandering our streets, unless he be blessed with prompt and loving friends of the human species. After seizure the dogs are confined in a rough shed, where they are tied up in such close proximity that they have ample opportunity and abundant leisure for intestine conflicts. The dogs are confined twenty-four hours each, and until four o'clock every day, when, unless redeemed, or unless there be some special reason for longer preserving his life, each prisoner must prepare to take his journey to that bourne from which no deacon ever returns.

The city has appropriated five thousand dollars for the purpose of disposing of this surplus dog population. This sum, or the greater part of it, is distributed to boys and men who make a regular business of finding dogs and taking them to the Pound. Half a dollar each is paid for the delivery of each dog. In "unsound, puppy, which, or hound, or cur of low degree," his price is precisely fifty cents.

The dogs are destroyed by drowning. There is provided a large water-tight square canteen, about eight feet high, ten feet long, and six feet wide. This is furnished with a cover made of open slats, and which is capable of being bolted firmly down. The contrivance will contain from sixty to eighty dogs, without their being so crowded as to die comfortably. The victims are thrown into the cistern and the cover fastened down; then, by means of a hose, water is turned on until the tank is full, and kept there until emphatically "the dog is dead."

When the Pound establishment first opens its "canine" there is, for a few days, a great rush. So many as three hundred dogs having been taken in during the first two days. It is then an exciting time for the boys. Rumor has it that on the first day of the operation of the law an enterprising young gentleman, of eleven years or thereabouts, residing in Jay Street, had eighteen dogs secured in his cellar, ready for the earliest market. When the canine harvest is thoroughly reaped in New York the boys not unfrequently go to sister cities, where the crop has not been so well gleaned. It is by no means unusual to have dogs brought from Jersey or from Brooklyn. Of course, if this is known, the dogs are not purchased; but the trick is seldom discovered save by the confession of the culprit himself, who is particularly careful to keep his mouth shut till he has made his bargain and got his money.

THE MORGUE.

We give on page 429 an illustration of a scene in the room for the identification of the unknown dead, in the Morgue, or dead-house, which has been established by the commissioners of Public Charities and Correction, in conjunction with the Bellevue Hospital Buildings at the foot of Twenty-sixth Street, East River, on the Bellevue Hospital grounds. This institution takes its name from a similar one in Paris which has existed for many years.

The use of the Morgue is not limited, as is generally supposed, to the remains of persons unknown. Sometimes, when the name and residence of the deceased are in the possession of the authorities, the body is nevertheless taken to the Morgue—it may be from considerations of the public health; it may be from motives of economy on the part of the landlord to receive the body; or, it may be from consideration for the family not prepared for such a trial as these; and, finally, it may be from errors in the address of the deceased. At the Morgue, also, are deposited the bodies of new-born children, found in the sewers or elsewhere.

The Morgue supplies a want long felt in this city, and will undoubtedly be the means of preventing many unknown bodies to anxious friends or relatives. Heretofore, for want of such accommodation, bodies of persons unknown have sometimes been hurried off to Potter's Field. When once consigned to the burial trenches of that place their recovery next to impossible.

It is astonishing how many die in this city of whom absolutely nothing is known; and it is a disgrace to the metropolis that until now no adequate provision has been made for their identification.

The coroners under whose charge such cases first come have exerted themselves to remedy the evil. Application was made by them to the State Legislature and to the Board of Supervisors for the means of advertising such persons, but without effect. Then it was not until a short time since that Councilman GEORGE H. MACKAY took the matter in hand, and procured an appropriation for that purpose. Since last time (April 16), thirty-five unknown bodies have been advertised.

The Morgue is a large square apartment, well lighted from two sides. It has stone walls, and the floor, which is laid with tile, is made somewhat concave for drainage level. On one side are arranged four show-tables, about three by six feet in size; from each table is an India-rubber tube, terminating in a vase, through which the Croton water constantly passes, and is distributed over the table. Behind the tables, on the wall, are two sets of shelves. The bodies are here exposed to view, and by the arrangement spoken of are kept constantly showered with the water. The books are furnished to hang the clothes of the deceased persons upon. A glass partition shuts off the tables from the rest of the apartment, and prevents any odor that may arise from the bodies escaping. Connected with the Morgue are offices for the coroners, and a room for autopsies under their direction. There is also on the same floor an autopsy-room for the use of the hospital. The whole arrangement is admirable, and carried out strongly with the miserable close, confined, dirty rooms before used for the same purpose.

THE DOCTOR.

A PHYSICIAN, who was well known in St. Petersburg for his eminent skill and extensive practice, was summoned one winter day by a servant to attend the wealthy Prince "Soundso," who had just arrived from Moscow, and was stopping at the first hotel in the city, No. 6.

The Doctor, who knew the Prince by reputation, instantly responded to the call, and in a few moments mounted the well-known steps and reached the door of the ante-chamber, where, having rung the bell, he was received by two lackeys in gold-laced livery, who relieved him of his fur cloak. Another servant now came forward, and, politely saluting him, requested him to be seated while he announced his visit to the Prince. He then left the room on tiptoe. A long time elapsed, until finally the Doctor became impatient and went to the door, where he listened for a moment, but hearing no sound he waited as far as the ante-room, from which, however, the servants had disappeared. Still his suspicion was not aroused. He ascended to the upper apartments, which he found brilliantly lighted but unoccupied. He came at last to a back-door, which stood wide open, and discovered his steps with a heart filled with a sad presentiment. His costly fur was nowhere to be seen. He rang the bell violently and shouted with all his might, which soon brought up the terrified host, who declared that he knew nothing more than that the apartments had been engaged only for the moment by three gentlemen. He lent his own cloak to the Doctor, who, being a philosopher, went home quite satisfied with the good luck in having retained his purse and watch.

BETWEEN THE SHOWERS.

Down it came—the summer shower—
Bursting from the nimbus cloud;
Spending its impetuous power
On the great tree, proud and proud.
And the great tree murmur'd loud
As it caught the summer shower—
Torvil it to a drizzling sweet.
When the cloud, its passion spent,
Broke and drifted, pale and rent,
Like a king reft of his might,
Shone the tree. O heart of mine!
Pass through passion's frequent stress
With a like divine endurance!

Down it came—the summer shower—
Rushing through the sobbing air;
Beating on the lily-flower,
Till she trembled in despair
For her blossom, white and fair.
But in silence bent the flower,
Yielding perfume all the hour,
Till the sunbeams came and shed
A new glory on her head,
On her robes, more dazzling white,
And her crown more golden bright.
Thus—my heart!—is patience tried,
Thus is sorrow purified.

Down it came—the summer rain—
Dashing through the darken'd sky,
On the green and tender grain,
Which receiv'd it with a sigh,
Quiver'd in each blade, and nigh
Bow'd unto the earth with grief.
But a whisper from the sun
Raised its head, and so it stood,
Swelling into bounteous food;
And ere yet the rain was over
Glist'ning gladder than before.
Thus—my heart!—shall sorrow distress
But increase thy fruitfulness.

A GREAT TUSCAN HOUSE.

SEVERAL times during the summer of last year I went down by rail from Florence about thirty-five miles to visit some friends who were living in a fine old villa on a portion of the Lucca plain, which lies up for their accommodation. The pleasure derived from these visits was of so rare a quality, and the memory of the scenes and of such pure hospitality, is so extraordinary in its character, that I deem both worthy of a passing word of description. The house is remarkable for the fact that it is the best existing for its antiquity, its imposing architecture, and the proud vicissitudes of its history. The region in which it stands, in the northern parts of the ancient Duchy of Lucca, is one of the most gardenlike in its rich cultivation, as well as charming on account of the variety of its picturesque beauty, of any in all Italy. The plain which stretches quite to the sea-coast, near which the ancient mart of Pisa stood, and upon which the modern city of Leghorn stands, is screened on the north by the bold ridges of the Apennine Chain, which, running toward the west, here unite with the Maritime Alps. In a picturesque valley, between two spurs of this wall of mountains, lies the quiet little town of Pescia. It has many traces of antiquity; but like many Tuscan towns, is tidy and in good repair. It is the abode of contentment, and in which the stranger is sure to find a welcome whose heart sorrow has broken, let him come here. If there is a soul which the world has wronged, or which has wronged itself by staining itself with crime, that would escape from the frowns of the society which it had offended, and devote itself to repentance and to prayer, let it find its home among the mountains, it will find the repose for which it sighs. If two beings whom love has united would enjoy their mutual affection in the most profound gaze of the world, here is the spot of all others upon which Nature has bestowed congenial charms.

Before the railroad was built between Florence with Lucca was built, not many travelers ever passed through the region which I am describing. Now and then only a stray foreigner, in the luxurious traveling carriage bowled along those fine roads, journeying from the maritime cities toward the Tuscan capital. On one side of the road, as one rests upon broad, fertile levels, crowded with fig, mulberry, and olive trees, and grape-vines loaded with juicy fruits sweeping in graceful festoons from one dwarf maple to another. In the opposite direction the vision is reduced with a view of the mountains, half hid under the purple and silver brume of an Italian atmosphere.

In this region, and but a few miles from the now favorite resort of Monte Catini, the visitor will observe across the country a pile of gray medieval buildings, with an aspect as imposing as to awaken a curiosity to learn something of its name and history. It is "Bella Vista," one of the mansions of the Buondelmonti and Feroni families, which, united by marriage several centuries ago, were among the richest and most powerful of the Florentine nobility. The house has the castellated solidity of warlike times. It is an irregular parallelogram of three lofty stories, stretching several hundred feet in extreme length, with a depth of well toward a hundred feet. Square towers, which extend at the angles by octagonal towers, with summits carried considerably above the level of the general roof. From the entrance-door a projecting terrace of stone is continued quite around the building, forming a walk of nearly a mile in extent. There are more than a hundred windows in the house covered with heavy bars of iron. The porches are massive and lofty, and the whole presents a harmonious whole with the grand scale of the interior of the house to which they conduct.

The mansion has hardly been inhabited for forty years. The family which built it has long been in decay; indeed one branch, the Buondelmonti, long since became extinct. There are more than a hundred windows in the house covered with heavy bars of iron. The porches are massive and lofty, and the whole presents a harmonious whole with the grand scale of the interior of the house to which they conduct.

The mansion has hardly been inhabited for forty years. The family which built it has long been in decay; indeed one branch, the Buondelmonti, long since became extinct. There are more than a hundred windows in the house covered with heavy bars of iron. The porches are massive and lofty, and the whole presents a harmonious whole with the grand scale of the interior of the house to which they conduct.

An American gentleman and lady from our metropolitan city, who had been married in Florence, have found it pleasant to pass several years in Tuscany. One of the nobles of the ancient palaces of Florence has let his residence, and several summers have been passed at the superb old villa of Bella Vista. It is a retired retreat peculiarly for which a poet-hermit might sigh, and a baronial house of such grand historic memories that the most fevered son of fame might covet it as the home of his ambitious hopes.

My American friends had seen the house in their excursions in that part of Tuscany, and, with the feelings which belong to the sumptuous life of our nation, were determined to live in it. An arrangement was made, and their furniture was put into a sufficient number of rooms to accommodate the family, a few guests, and the domestics of a first-class city establishment. The house contains more than sixty great chambers, or stanzoni, as the Italians call them. The walls of most of these, though for so long a time uninhabited, are still firm and unbroken. The massive partitions, and the floors of masonry, are as well-preserved as if but a single generation, instead of several centuries, had passed since they were constructed. The frescoes on the ceilings and walls of many of the rooms are scarcely injured by the ravages of time. The Buondelmonti family arms, whether carved or painted, still ornament the walls. The great hall in the centre of the house rises to the height of the roof, and the lofty doors open upon the principal porch on one side, and upon an elevated terrace on the other. The dimensions of the room are so great that it could be placed a first-class Fifth Avenue house, that type of modern splendor and modern magnificence. Into this hall open the suits of apartments on each of the wings open. With the great outer doors thrown wide in summer, the cool breezes from the mountains and the sea, and the gentle odors of the cultivated plains on the other, refresh the inhabitants of the villa. This great central chamber, also, is taken at mid-day, unexposed to the heats of the sun's glare. Besides the great staircase of ceremony in the hall, there are others at the four corners, leading from the foundation to the summit of the house. If there were a hundred guests in the house, they could, if they chose, be in remote silent chambers, near the roof, or hide to read or dream upon a balcony, on the shady side of one of the towers, with a prospect before the eye of thirty miles over the plain.

What a seat of generous hospitality this house has been in the past years! The proudest lords and ladies of Tuscany have lodged in these chambers, danced in the salons, and eaten at tables of luxury spread in the great hall. There are traces on the walls where silken tapestries were hung, and the two state bedchambers with raised platforms in each, in which were placed richly elaborated decorated with carved and gilded ornaments. There is the spacious vaulted kitchen in which twenty fires blazed—four of them always. But once more, they are kindled at the bidding of those come from that mysterious Western World to which the Tuscans gave the name.

The lady and gentleman whose guest I was were for three summers the sole tenants of this patrician house. Except the inhabitants of the city establishment, none others slept beneath the roof when no visitors were at the villa. As I wandered through the great chambers, or lingered on the grand staircase, I thought of the time when that noble roof had given shelter to scores of guests. The hall and salons, the chambers, in the proudest time of its history, had partaken of the hospitality of the munificent Buondelmonti. All the culture and social refinement of the land found a home from time to time their representations there. The gay laugh of the young I could easily fancy still ringing in the tapestried corridors, in the long gallery, and the vast hall; and it seemed as if the walls might still, in gentle whispers, repeat the words which the fair had uttered long ago.

But the gay crowd was gone, and with it the equipages and the brilliant train of attendants, and all the pomp and circumstance of wealth and luxury and pride. The great stables in which a hundred horses were fed are empty and neglected. The gardens in which blossomed flowers of all hues, whose odors filled the mansion, are a scene of picturesque decay. The terraces are crumbling, the balustrades are broken, the steps have lost their original angle, and the marble coping of the basins in which fountains played has no longer its harmonious lines. The visitor may sit down upon the base of an overthrown column, with arm resting upon a fragment of what was once a graceful statue, and muse upon the changes which time and circumstance have wrought. "A feeling of sweet pootic sadness steals through the mind, and a new impression is received of the vanity of human affairs and the perishableness of earthly things." How vain now seems the pursuit of wealth, or power, or fame! Into how narrow a span are rounded the enjoyments of human life! Spectator of such a scene, new lessons of wisdom are learned; and it matters not the first time a profounder conviction enters the mind that the only imperishable realities are bid in that mysterious future of which we can now only vaguely dream.

Toward nightfall it was the habit of my friends of the castle to make excursions on the broad roads or paths into the region surrounding this ancient patrician domain. Sometimes we went on foot through the shadowed, flowering, perfumed woods; sometimes we drove along the public, but always quiet and well-kept, highway. The drive would be extended ten or twelve miles from the villa, but rarely so far that its imposing medieval towers were not still within sight. It was the hour when the hands of the wayfarers past, and the toilers on the land evening was settling down upon all nature. A delicious even-tide coolness rested upon the plain, and the shadows of the neighboring mountains grew new hues to the landscape. Whichever way the eye wandered it was regaled with the bright and ever-varying tints which in these regions immediately precede and follow the day's decline. The spires of the churches in the villages, the ridges of the mountains, and the slant light streaming across the fertile plains gave to the leaves of the olive-trees a softer tone of silver, and to the mulberry a deeper hue of gold.

One afternoon we drove five miles to the convent, perched upon a shelf of rock overlooking the pleasant town of Pescia. The convent simply consists of more than thirty brothers of the order of San Domenico. The edifice is a structure of the Middle Ages, built with the same massive solidity which makes most of the great religious houses of Italy enemies of time for centuries to come. It is a sanctuary and a fortress—a secure retreat from the temptations of the world, as well as a shelter from its warlike and violent persecutions. In its best days three hundred monks were lodged in this convent of Pescia. The vaulted corridors leading to long lines of cells or small chambers; the interior cloisters overlooking court, garden, or turf-covered nook; and the exterior loggie, from which far-extended views across the Tuscan plain were had, all go to make up this holy mansion in which conscientious ago hundreds of stern devotees passed their ascetic life, and where they poured forth their pious hymns and prayers, but now almost silent and deserted.

The Abbot of the monastery, who was appointed of our intended visit, came out to welcome us at the principal entrance of the mansion. After conducting us through the lofty and spacious halls we were led to a loggie, from which the monks enjoy their finest prospects over broad plains stretching toward the sea. We were presented to some of the brothers, who received us not only with less reserve than we expected from their rigid order, but with open hearts and with generous hospitality. A cool and looks full of a genial and even gay expression. They showed us such works of art in fresco as decorate the walls of their ancient home. We inspected their store of relics—the cherished treasures of all such religious establishments—with what reverence we could. Then the table was laid, and ushered through the long galleries, climbed to highest terrace, and descended to deepest vault, they had been prepared. We needed refreshment. We were glad after our small fatigues to rest at last in the refectory. There a repast of wine, dried meats and fruits had been spread, of which we were invited to partake. The wine was a product of plantations belonging to the convent, and its color a lively pink tint, was unlike any I had before seen. We found its flavor as genial as its hue, and its inspiration so subtle that I suggested that the next visit, and the day's enjoyments were over. Pleased with the tranquility of this pious retirement and the beauty of the region we traversed, the transient acquaintance of my earlier life were for a moment revived, and I asked the monks if I might come and pass a summer under the shelter of their ancient roof. The inquiry was accepted as made with sincerity, and the response was what I was already prepared to expect. The monks would welcome to become in our house for such a period as may suit your pleasure, convenience, or caprice; sharing the society, and the frugal fare of our community, or be served by one of us in your own cell. I thanked the brothers for this expression of their respect and confidence, assuring them that I did not doubt that the time would come when my poetic whim would lead me back to their peaceful hermitage. Several of the brothers kindly gave us down the mountain to the pic nic road, where we took leave, receiving the blessing of the good Abbot, and expressing to the brothers our grateful acknowledgements for their kindness. We drove back to the villa as the evening shadows fell. That night I dreamed of cloisters, and cowl, and a monkish brotherhood.

Thus was life to me in that old house a new experience. A few calm summer or autumn days passed there as one of the members of the family. But bright days of a prolonged sojourn in this classic land. The pleasures of the imagination are the most refined of all our enjoyments. Recollection of romantic visions inspired by breathing the atmosphere of the villa; of walks and drives through the charming region in which it stands—of tranquil evenings of sympathetic converse under the ancient porticoes, with the musical splash of the cool fountains in the air, and glimpses of the gigantic dilapidated statues which line the avenue before the eye, will long remain among the most agreeable memories of my Italian life.

Be on the Alert—Danger is at Hand!
This has been a sickly season. The medical faculty perplexy evil in the future. They think pestilence is on the wing for America. Suppose this to be true, what is the best defense against it? REDOUBLED NERVOUS VIGOR. This is the only protection against PANIC as well as against the PRINCIPLE OF INFECTION. Why not put those vital powers in active progress as a safe preventive? There IS one; a tonic, nervine, and alterative, competent to shield the system against the subtle elements of disease, whether they float hither on the wind or distant lands, or on the vapor from our own soil, or are incorporated with the untoward fluids. This GREAT PREVENTIVE, of which choice is to duplicate among the compounds either of the Old World or the New, is

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS.

Remember that it is a specific for all the complaints which lay the system open to visitations of deadly epidemics. If you are dyspeptic, it rouses the vigor of your digestive powers, gives you appetite, and restores your cheerfulness. If you are nervous, it invigorates every fibre of your nervous system, from the base of the brain, where it lays the foundation of the spinal column. If you are bilious, it disciplines your unruly liver, and brings the action of that organ into harmony with the laws of health. It is, in short, an invigorant and alterative so powerful that Nature, with Hostetter's Bitters for her ally, may bid defiance alike to native malaria and foreign infection. If this energy we hear of, this disease which is desolating Europe, is really bound hitherward, it behooves the prudent to put on their armor, to clothe themselves with invulnerability as far as human means will permit, by preparing the system for resistance with this pure vegetable antidote.

[From the Rev. J. W. Poland's Autobiography.]

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.
It was early in the spring of 1855 that the Compound was originated. A member of my family was attacked with an irritation of the throat, attended with a disagreeable cough, which had for some months previous brought on a consumption, having for its basis the testie bark of white pine, which he compounded as he best knew how, and in the case of the child and lungs. To test the value of it in diseases alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the Medicine that I had been planning, and gave it to teaspoonful doses. The result was unexpectedly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering for some months with a bad cough, accompanied by a sudden cold, and had raised mucus streaked with blood. She soon found relief, and said no more. She took about one ounce of it, and got well. In November, 1858, I first advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.
At a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled.—Boston Journal.
This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the test of eleven years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known. It cures sore throat, coughs, diphtheria, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally. It is a remedy for diabetes, bleeding from the kidneys and bladder, pain in the side and groin; and for dyspepsia will be found valuable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicine generally.

"A PRACTICAL JOKE."

THE engraving which we give on this page is based on a story of OLIVER CROMWELL, which is thus quaintly told in OLDMIXON'S "History of England:"

"One of his (Oliver Cromwell's) domestick chaplains, Mr. JOHNNY White, a sprightly man and a top Wit of his Court, was so ambitious as to make his addresses to Lady Frances, the Protector's youngest daughter. The young Lady did not discourage him; and this Piece of innocent Galantry in so religious a Court, cou'd not be carry'd on without spies. Oliver was told of it, and he was much concern'd at it, obliging the Person who told him to be on the Watch; and if he cou'd give him any substantial Proof, he should be well rewarded, and White severely punish'd. The spy followed the matter so close that he hunted Jerry White, as he was generally term'd, to the Lady's Chamber, and ran immediately to the Protector with this News. Oliver, in a rage, hastened thither himself, and going in hastily found Jerry on his Knees kissing the Lady's Hand, or having just kiss'd it. Cromwell, in a Fury, ask'd what was the Meaning of that Posture before his Daughter Frank? White, with a great deal of Presence of Mind, said, 'May it please your Highness, I have a long Time courted that young Gentlewoman there, my Lady's Woman, and cannot prevail; I was, therefore, humbly praying her Ladyship to intercede for me.' The Protector, turning to the young Woman, cry'd, 'What's the meaning of this, Hussey? Why do you refuse the Honour Mr. White wou'd do you? He is my Friend, and I expect you shou'd treat him as such.' My Lady's Woman, who desir'd nothing more, with a very low Courtesy reply'd, 'If Mr. White intends me that Honour, I shall not be against him.' 'Sayst thou so, my Lass,' cry'd Cromwell, 'call Goodwyn, this business shall be done presently, before I go out of the Room.' Mr. White was gone too far to go back. The Parson came. Jerry and my Lady's Woman were marry'd in Presence of the Protector, who gave her 500 Pounds for her Portion; and that, with the Money she had saved before, made Mr. White easy in his Circumstances, except in one Thing, which was that he never loved his Wife, nor she him, tho' they lived together near fifty Years afterwards. I knew them both, and heard this Story told when Mrs. White was present, who did not contradict it, but own'd that there was something in it."

PROPOSALS FOR A NEW PARTY.

THE President and part of the Executive Committee of the National Union Club of Washington, in concert with two Democratic Senators, have issued proposals for a new party. They invite the assembly of a Convention in Philadelphia on the 14th of August, to consult upon the state of the Union. In their call these gentlemen state several principles upon which all patriotic men agree, and they omit several which are peculiar to the Union party. The proposals for the new party are plainly hostile to the action of Congress, which was elected by an enormous majority of the Union party, and may fairly be supposed to represent its views more faithfully than Senators HENDRICKS of Indiana and NESMITH of Oregon, who opposed that party last year at the polls, and who oppose its measures in Congress.

The effort to represent this call as virtually an act of the great Union party of the country is simply dishonest. Mr. HENDRICKS and Mr. NESMITH have never assumed to belong to that party. That party, moreover, has its organization and Executive Committee, and its Conventions are legitimately called only by that Committee. The officers of the National Union Club of Washington have exactly as much right to speak for the Democratic party as for the Union party; the fact that they have hitherto acted with the Union party only shows that they now consider themselves to have withdrawn from it, for why, otherwise, should they seek separate and independent action?

It is only against false pretenses that we wish to warn our readers. The gentlemen in question have undoubted right to their opinion upon all subjects, and an equal right to call conventions of those who sympathize with them. If they are alarmed by a prospect of "usurpation" and "centralization of power" by the National Legislature, and are indifferent to the same danger from the Executive, they may be very wise, but we have every certainly a right to hold and express that view. But if we may judge from the resolutions of Union Conventions, from the speeches of successful Union candidates, from the almost unanimous tone of the Union press, and from the impressions of private intercourse with representative Union men, Congressional opposition is not feared by the Union party; and to represent a Convention called under such an apprehension a movement for the readjustment of that party is a gross and dangerous misrepresentation. Such a Convention can be only a bridge by which those Union men who hold with ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS that a State which has been in rebellion has "a continuing right" to resume its relations with the Union without delay or condition, may pass over to the point in which Mr. STEPHENS's principles upon that subject prevail. But can Senator DOOLITTLE, who signs the call, be supposed to speak the sentiment of the Union party in Wisconsin, whose Legislature, controlled by that party, has asked him to resign? Or does Senator DIXON speak for the Union men of Connecticut, who elected General HAWLEY Governor, and whose Legislature made General TERRY Senator, and adopted—first of all the States—the Constitutional Amendment to which all the signers of this call are opposed?

The new party, if it is ever born, can not, of course, stand upon its own legs. It will be at once taken to the breast of the party which opposed the war for the Union, and which denounced Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. JOHNSON as usurpers and tyrants, and it will be carried, helpless, wherever that party chooses. There will not be three parties in the coming Congressional elections; and even if the party of the Washington Club should attempt to put itself to stand as a third, it could be only to the detriment of the Union party, not of the Copperheads. The contest will finally be between those who support the amendment and those who oppose it. Those who oppose it are the late rebels, not the Union men at the South, and our friends the Chicago Copperheads at the North. The members of the Washington Club party must join these, or they must vote with their old allies of the Union party. They may disable the latter, but they can not injure the former, and we should really like to know whether Mr. RANDALL and Senators DIXON and DOOLITTLE sincerely believe that union and liberty, in this country, are safer in the hands of the late rebels and the opponents of the war than in those of the Union party, however unwise some of its measures may have been, and however foolishly some of its Congressional leaders may have spoken.

PRUSSIA, AUSTRIA, AND ITALY.

THE great war now begun in Europe is, with the sole exception of the Italian part of it, as purely a war of political ambition as Europe has ever seen. We do not believe LOUIS NAPOLEON to be the only ambitious and able man in Europe, and therefore we do not hold him to be entirely responsible. But doubtless the meeting of some months ago between BISMARCK and NAPOLEON had a very significant bearing upon the present situation. It had not been kept been ready and willing to make war the peace would not have been broken.

The treaty which settled the Schleswig-Holstein war was signed at Vienna on the 30th October, 1864. Schleswig-Holstein and Lauenburg were ceded by that treaty to the joint protectorate of Prussia and Austria. Within the year following Austria sold to Prussia her rights in Lauenburg for 2,500,000 thalers, and by the Convention of Gastein of August 14, 1865, it was agreed that the joint occupation should cease, Austria taking possession of Holstein and Prussia of Schleswig. Prussia then began to press Austria to yield her rights in Holstein, which Austria refused, and referred the question to the Federal Diet of Germany. This Prussia denounced as a violation of the Convention of Gastein, and sent her staunch troops into Holstein to resume the joint occupation. Thereupon Austria moved in the Federal Diet that the Federal army be put on a war footing, for the purpose of resisting the designs of Prussia. Prussia protested that such a decision would be a dissolution of the German Confederation, and that she would regard all the States that voted for the proposal as her enemies; but the motion was adopted by a vote of nine, including Austria, Saxony, and Bavaria. The Austrian vote represents a population of about 14,000,000, excluding Austria herself, and the Prussian, excluding Prussia, about 8,000,000. Prussia accordingly declared the Germanic Confederation dissolved, and the semi-official papers announce that henceforth the States are formerly represented will be those in the Middle European group of States. On the 15th of June Prussia entered Hanover and Saxony, and the war virtually began.

This is simply a quarrel of precedence between Prussia and Austria, which have always been rival powers in the Confederation, and as Austria has stood upon one defensive in the quarrel, and has offered to refer the difference to the decision of the Diet, her attitude toward Prussia commands the sympathy of all who feel that the Schleswig-Holstein question is not really a casus belli.

But it is not so with Italy. The Congress of Vienna, which was a reactionary conclave of kings, gave VENETIA to Austria. But Venetia is Italian in language, tradition, and sympathy. It has been held only by the Austrian strong hand, and that hand has never been more odious than in its clutch upon Italy. The history of that country since the settlement of 1815 is a story of incessant plots and conspiracies for the liberation of Venetia, and of noble men sacrificed by Austria. The best expression of this undying national feeling of Italy and its perpetual protest against blow off the German yoke is found in various poems of ROBERT BROWNING. Its living impersonation is JOSEPH MAZZINI. Later events have made GARIBALDI its representative and VICTOR EMANUEL its official leader. The fire and the force of Italy are now typified by these two men. To their call all the youth and manhood of the peninsula respond. Under them an immense army is now organized and marshaled. Through their eyes Italy, wholly aroused, sees, and hears, and feels in fervent expectation every inch of her soil freed from the foreigner. A day of such promise modern Italy has not seen. Thoroughly prepared for the struggle, she knows that her hopes and fears are interested in her success, and that all generous hearts in the world wish her well. Austria is an anomalous power, the home of a crushing despotism. From the old tradition of GESLER and TELL to the modern METTERNICH and SILVIO PELLICO she has been the enemy of liberty. She is now entering upon a vital struggle, and the hopes and wishes of constitutional freedom must be against her as they are those of re stupefatto of Victor Gotzkalzi and strikes for Italian independence and unity.

THE TRUE ISSUE.

As the political campaign for the Congressional elections opens it is essential to remember that public interest will be chiefly in the construction of the Union. The proposed tariff will be both vigorously attacked and defended within the lines of the Union party. But the tariff question, however vital to our prosperity when united, is necessarily secondary to that of Union itself. We have no right, therefore, to allow our feelings and convictions upon that subject to influence our action upon one which is more important. To vote for a candidate who is opposed to protection, or who is an absolute free-trader, but who thinks that Congress has no right to prescribe conditions for the restoration of the late rebel States, to their full relations in the Union, is to prefer the lesser question to the greater. It is always possible to revise or repeal a tariff. But the conditions upon which reorganization is to be founded can neither be amended nor abolished.

The vital bond of the Union party is not financial but political. If it is broken by the Tribune for industrial protection, for instance, or with the Evening Post for industrial freedom, are both working together for certain great political results which can be achieved only by their faithful union. If, therefore, in any Union district the friends of the Tribune should say that they would vote only for a candidate who favored protection, and those of the Post that they would vote for a Copperhead rather than a Protectionist, they would give that district to the common enemy, and be responsible for the consequences.

Of course it is the duty of our friends in Congress to make our doctrines of this kind light. They can not more honorably forget that the Union party is neither a free trade nor a protective party. The heartiest Union men differ radically upon the tariff question. Whatever, therefore, by seeking changes in the system, tends to excite feeling and acrimonious debate upon this subject tends to a division or paralysis of the Union party. It makes the rate of duties so materially that they become virtually protective or prohibitive, and to pass the bill by the party vote, is to identify the policy of the Union party with protection, a policy which vast numbers of the party can not and will not support. Such an act is a stupendous political blunder.

But if Congress makes so gross a mistake it need not be repeated by the party itself. Every individual Union man should reflect that such an issue is not now paramount, and while he would naturally prefer a Representative who sympathized with his views upon the subject, he must not forget that it is still better to take a candidate who is wrong upon the tariff than one who is wrong upon reconstruction. Our taxes must be high for many years to come. But we do not mean, because, we say, they are the price of our national unity. Let us then first certainly secure that unity, and then we can proceed to discuss how we may most easily pay the taxes.

PUBLIC LIBRARY.

THAT a proposal of the greatest public benefit should meet the Board of Councilmen of New York without a dissenting vote is a fact so astounding as to be incredible. Yet Councilman W. B. WHITE, of the Sixth District, did introduce a resolution asking for the appointment of a joint committee of the Common Council to inquire into the feasibility of establishing a free circulating library in the city, and it was passed unanimously and went to the Aldermen, where it was referred to one of the standing committees. We sincerely hope that it will report favorably at the next interest moment, and that the committee will discover that the proposition is as feasible as it is capacious.

There are five libraries in the city already. There is the Astor, which is for special consultation at the rooms. There is the Mercantile, which is for a certain class. There is the Society, which is for subscribers. There is the Historical, which is for students. There is also, we believe, the Mechanics', which is special. But there is not yet a circulating library of standard and current literature open free to the whole public; yet it is among the most valuable of all libraries.

With wise energy the Board of Health is cleansing slums and sewers, and universally washing and purifying the city. The Sewerage Board is constructing grand and building that the foul secretions of the great metropolis may be swept away. The Board of Police are patrolling and inspecting and arresting and everywhere enforcing order and law. They are all of them in various ways physical Sanitary Boards, and their good results are incontestible. They tend not only to lengthen life but to lower the taxes, for cleanliness and order are always good economy.

Besides this, the city freely educates its children, and unwisely increases its taxes by doing so. Nothing is so expensive as ignorance and vice. The great anxiety of society is the progress of the various police arrangements to guard and punish those who have not had a fair chance for their minds and bodies. Whatever helps to provide this chance is a sisterly and brotherly act after free schools nothing does this more effectually than a free library. The practical working of such an institution is not a matter of theory but of experience. The Public Library of Boston—a noble collection of miscellaneous literature, including also the choice, scholarly collection of THEODORE PARKER, is immensely and most widely used, and with what good result may be inferred. Thousands and thousands of good books are in constant circulation. When they are worn out they are replaced. There is also a reading-room, in which the current periodicals are to be found. And this great institution is managed without serious expense and with no trouble from riotous visitors.

The argument for a free public library in New York is contained in the suggestion itself. The root of our national safety is public intelligence, and the free school and the free library are among the most palpable and efficient opportunities of public education. A library makes readers, as a railway makes travel. When once MR. WHITE's proposition becomes an act, and the library is established, we shall all wonder that New York existed it so long, and thank the wise Councilman for giving one redeeming grace to our municipal history.

IS OURS A VALID GOVERNMENT?

THOSE who demand that JEFFERSON DAVIS shall be tried, not for the purpose of securing his punishment but of obtaining a solemn decision of the Supreme Court upon the question of secession, do not seem to reflect that such a decision is not final. Another court acting upon another case can reverse it. Besides, there are but two questions upon the subject of secession; one of right, and the other of power. The nation, by a tremendous war, has settled both. Why should the matter be reopened before a bench of Judges?

The question of the right of secession is the question of the existence of the Union and of the Government. Does any body mean seriously to assert that the right of this Government to exist is a question for a court to decide? Is a decision of the Supreme Court the tenure of the Union? Suppose the court should solemnly decree that secession is constitutional. What then? Are we absolutely to submit to perish? Suppose it decides it to be unconstitutional. What then? Do we feel the Government to be any stronger? If it decides one way to-day, it may decide another to-morrow. Why should we fall to pieces by a decision which may be reversed? Why should we cohere subject to a decision of dissolution? In any conceivable view the decision of a court upon a point which the nation has decided by the last resort is superfluous and impertinent.

Let the people of this country, however, once put it into the power of the Supreme Court or of any other tribunal to declare that the Constitution is a contract at all, and the Government will be inevitably overthrown by a judicial decision. The Supreme Court was prostituted to the basest partisan, political purpose in the Dred Scott case. A case of TANEYS extinct? ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS frankly tells us that he and his friends believe in the right of secession. MR. STEPHENS is a conspicuous Democratic leader. Suppose his party comes into power and the Supreme bench changed by deaths and resignations. Would it be very strange if a case were arranged so as to secure a judgment of the court favorable to the claim of State sovereignty?

There could not be more unwise step than to commit the decision of the validity of our national existence to any court. Is it, indeed, an open question? Did we fight only that we might discover whether we had a right to fight? Is GRANT yet to learn whether he was justified in his terrible and triumphant campaigns? Is every proud and sorrowing parent yet to hear whether his boy died in a holy or a wicked war? Yet if DAVIS be tried for treason the question must be argued and judged. He has a plea which no other prisoner whether Government could have—namely, that the organic law allowed him to become an alien, and consequently not liable as a traitor. Nor could this plea be regarded as frivolous, for no student of our political history will deny that the very point which he would urge was purposely left between the Constitution.

The remedy is obvious. It is not in the reversible decision of a court, but it is in the organic law as interpreted by the decision of the people. The Constitution was left purposely obscure by those who could not tell the precise strength of the dogma of State sovereignty. But that dogma has now appealed to the sword and if the fathers declared the children do not. They have routed that dogma and utterly destroyed it in the field. Let them now utterly destroy every witness of it also in the Constitution. Let the organic law declare that no State under any plea whatever shall secede, and it will matter little whether the late rebel States evoke or rebel or secede or annul or declare void their acts of secession, or whether the Supreme Court decides that the Government has or has not a right to exist.

PLANTING FORESTS.

MORE than ninety-five per cent. of all the public domain of the United States is absolutely without trees, and the local demand will soon exhaust the groves of the new States. Yet without trees civilization stops. "Were the pine forests around the great lakes to be swept from the earth to-night, the prairie States would stop in their career or improvement as suddenly as did LOT's wife in her journey toward the mountains." So says MR. HUTCHINSON of Kansas in his valuable and interesting paper read before the Association for the Promotion of Science and Art. He proposes to double the habitable and productive surface of the country by planting its treeless plains.

Mr. DONELLY, Representative in Congress from Minnesota, has brought in a bill to encourage experiments in planting. It provides that 200,000 acres of public lands shall be granted to the Ottawa Indian University of Kansas on condition that they shall, within five years, plant at least 40,000,000 forest trees over an area of not less than 10,000 acres of public lands on the Great Plains. The House Committee on Public Lands have devoted themselves earnestly to the consideration of the practicability of this plan. Judge EDMONDS, Commissioner of the Land Office, makes a long and full report, in which he professes full faith in the success of the experiment. Mr. HITCHCOCK is the business manager of the Ottawa University, and says that the work is already begun upon their grounds. The University has this year planted one bushel of apple-seed, nine bushels of Osage orange seed—enough for 100 miles of hedge—20,000 deciduous trees, 50,000 evergreens, and many other seeds and cuttings. The Osage orange is considered the best tree with which to begin, because it grows very rapidly, is little affected by dry weather, and has a very thick top. Sycamore, elm, soft maple, and black walnut will flourish under its protection, and are, indeed, already growing somewhat 200 miles west of the Mississippi.

It is fully believed that the Great Plains were formerly covered with trees, and would be again except for that pestilent disturber and destroyer man. If he could be banished for a few years from the prairies, says Mr. HITCHCOCK, nature would soon cover them with forests. Man brings fire. He wishes to light his pipe, or boil his pot, or roast his toes, and a continent must be ravaged for his accommodation. He drops a spark or a lighted match into the dry grass, and, presto! the fire is up and away for the Rocky Mountains. But where the trees do not have a chance the spread and growth of trees astonish the old farmers. We wish Mr. HITCHCOCK had mentioned how the plains chanced to be treeless when they were first seen by historic men. Were they fired by prehistoric incendiaries?

The soil of the plains is deep and rich—if the grass annually decayed on the surface, the plains would be' a vast nursery bed richer than any rose garden in Flushing—and it only lacks moisture, which would come with trees. To cut down the trees in a country is do'ry to the springs. Mr. MARSH, from whom Mr. HITCHCOCK quotes, has amply illustrated this fact. We must have forests to regulate the climate and seasons; to improve barren soils; to shelter crops, herds, and fruits; to furnish shades for those devouring birds. Earth loves the shaggy costume of the forest. If only animals, especially of the inventive and fire-bearing kind, like man, could be banished she would every where drape her smooth outline with this soft garb. Indeed, says Mr. MARSH, forests would spontaneously spring up in the deserts of Africa if animals and fire could be excluded.

Moreover, wherever the sweep of prairie fire has been limited, there is a steady increase of timber, and Sangamon County, in Illinois, is said to have more timber growing than thirty years ago. This is an illustration that the plains are not hopeless. The proposition of Mr. DONELLY, so cogently and forcibly supported by Mr. HITCHCOCK, is so promising to civilization that we hope sincerely it will be adopted.

A LETTER FROM A FARMER

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

MR. EDITOR,—Your last week's article on the subject of the Tariff was pretty sound, barring some small ink proctectionists, which were in bad taste. I hold, with those great and good men, THADDEUS STEVENS and HORACE GREELEY, that the Government owes it to the country to protect domestic industry, and nothing is clearer than your proposition that if one kind of industry is entitled to protection all kinds are alike to the same. The large sum of money which has been paid every year by the consumers of wood-screws to the stockholders of the Franklin Wood-Screw Company of Providence, Rhode Island, has been well laid out, whatever you may think, inasmuch as it has firmly established that important manufacture on our soil, and driven foreign wood-screws out of the market. And Congress is bound, by every principle of honor and honesty, to extend to every other producer throughout the land the same reward which it so justly grants to Mr. SIMMONS'S Wood-Screw Company.

The tariff now before Congress proposes to levy an average tax of 82 per ton on foreign iron, and a largely increased duty per pound on foreign woolens. Every true patriot must approve these imposts. As Mr. STEVENS says, the pauper labor of Europe must be driven out of this market.

With coal and iron lying side by side, and food teeming in her own soil, Pennsylvania ought, perhaps, to be able to compete with producers three thousand miles away without protection from Government. But if she is not, and her representative Mr. STEVENS says she is not, and he ought to know, I am for giving her what she asks. I am for American industry first, last, and all the time. So New England with abundant water and steam power, first-class mechanical skill, and markets at her own door, ought to be able, one would fancy, to furnish the people of the United States with cotton goods at a price at which they can be fetched from Europe. But if she is not, and her representatives in Congress protest that she is not, I am for giving her what she asks in the way of protection. I will pay whatever may be required of me both on the iron and on the woolens which I consume, for the sake of maintaining our domestic industries against the pauper labor of Europe.

But there must be no one-sidedness in the bargain. If I pay my money to reward domestic industry in Pennsylvania and New England, the people of those sections must pay their money to reward my industry here. I am a farmer. I grow corn, potatoes, and "garden truck." I have been spending considerable money lately on manure and lime, and on the whole my farm looks well. My "peach-blows" stand thick on the ground, and the buds fill. I shall have several hundred bushels for sale in September, at which time they tell me potatoes will be a drug in the market. Owing to a slight mistake of the seedsman, instead of having a couple of thousand of mush melons to sell, I shall have several barrels of cucumbers, which, if the editors break down, will be in enormous much money. My corn promises well; some, raised from Parvian seed, imported by the Hon. Mr. WILKINSON PLUMB, is already as high as 16 or 17 feet, but without-cobs, so that, unless I can sell the stalks as curiosities, my labor will be unrewarded unless Government will graciously consent to lay a duty of 100 per cent something handsome from my "agriculturist" strawberries. But though the crop has been good, the season has been bad for me, and I better adapted than ours for the growth of these berries, and we have eaten so many of them at home, that I doubt if I have realized the money I paid for the plants which produced them. On the whole, though nature has treated me fairly, and the season has been not unfavorable, I am not sure that my farm will yield me enough to pay the new taxes which are about to be levied on me for the protection of native industry in New England and Pennsylvania, unless Congress should levy countervailing duties on the products of New England and Pennsylvania to reward me for the service I have rendered the country in raising potatoes and "garden truck," Peruvian corn, "agriculturist" berries, etc., etc.

I need not say that the protection I demand must not be by way of a customs duty. I fear no foreign competition. Foreign corn or berries would put a dollar in my pocket. The only way in which I can be "protected" is by a system of heavy internal taxes. I shall gladly commend itself to the judgment of farmers throughout the country. Such a system could be easily adjusted. If we farmers pay 25 per cent. more for our cookstoves and iron pots than we should pay under what HORACE GREELEY so justly calls the "British free-trade system," I shall expect the people to get 25 per cent. should pay a corresponding bounty on the food we raise. A bounty of 10 cents a bushel on corn and potatoes, a cents a quart on strawberries, and 50 cents a hundred on cucumbers would, my wife calculates, about make us square this season; we should lose, of course, on my friend SQUIER'S endless Peruvian corn. But I will not trouble him to make some sacrifices for our country. Without such a bounty we shall be robbed, and, firmly as I am wedded to the sound principles of the protectionists, I can't be expected to rob my family for the sake of theories.

I have written to our District Representative on the subject, and have no doubt that the plan will introduce into Congress a measure that will be satisfactory to us farmers. I do not expect to succeed in getting Congress to adopt method in which the bounties should be paid. But the simplest plan would seem to be a new issue of legal-tender notes or National Bank currency. A hundred millions, a thousand millions of paper-money afloat, and, as Mr. STEVENS and Mr. JOHN SHERMAN very properly observe, there would be no fear of its depreciation. A bounty of 10 cents a bushel on corn would require about $80,000,000, and a corresponding bounty on other products, say, $120,000,000 more; so that $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 a year would answer the purpose. This sum might be raised by a special tax on manufactures.

I am not certain, Mr. Editor, from cogitating you and the nation at large upon the new and grand financial policy into which we are drifting. Blind despotisms in Europe are reducing the taxes on their people to the utmost limit consistent with the maintenance of government; we are increasing our taxes year by year, taxing each separate class for the benefit of every other, and the great public at large for the benefit of each class. Blind despotisms in Europe are either sternly keeping their currency on a par with gold, or, like us, they have in past years got off the track, are striving to regain it; we, on the contrary, are legislating against currency contraction, and providing as elaborately against the improvement of our national credit as those blind despotisms are guarding against the depreciation of theirs. This is the way in which a young and prosperous country demonstrates its superiority to precedent, and its independence of the old-fashioned laws of political economy.

I scorn and contemn the arguments which have been urged in some quarters in favor of a reduction of taxes and a return to hard money. What the country really wants is more protection and more currency. Let every industry be protected even at the expense of all the others; let the issues of irredeemable paper (the most convenient currency in the world, for it never can be returned) be continued as needed and as population increases, until the rate of interest at Chicago and St. Louis falls to three per cent., and a pair of boots costs $25; and then, Sir, we shall indeed begin to realize the blessings of living under a Government administered on the plan of those great statesmen, THADDEUS STEVENS, JOHN SHERMAN, and their compeers.

Respectfully yours, DICK BROWN.

TOWN HILL, STATEN ISLAND, July 4, 1866.

A PERTINENT QUESTION.

MR. EDITOR,—I see that the New York Times ardently supports the call of MESSRS. RANDALL and HENDRICKS for a National Convention. The Hon. HENRY J. RAYMOND is editor of the Times, and he is also Chairman of the Union National Committee. Now does he mean us to understand that the RANDALL and HENDRICKS Convention is a Convention of our party? If so, why doesn't he say so? If not, why doesn't he say so?

If, as the Times says, the time has come for remodeling the party, does the Chairman of the National Committee intend calling in our most constant political enemies to do the job? If he does, why does he not resign? If he does not, why does he not consult with his colleagues, and call the National Union Convention from all the States and Territories—a Convention to which such Southern Unionists as the Governors of MEXICO, of TEXAS, and his friends would be welcome? Or, in the judgment of the Times, are Governor HAMILTON and those who agree with him, and who voted against THADDEUSISM in TEXAS, not sound and trusty Union men?

Is the true way to enlarge and nationalize the Union party to abandon the Southern Unionists or to be absorbed by the Northern Copperheads?

Yours, A LINCOLN VOTER OF '64.

LITERARY.

"Drift: a Sea-shore Idyl, and other Poems," by GEORGE ARNOLD. (Hurd & Houghton & Fields.) In one of the "Misses from an old Manse" HAWTHORNE imagines a letter from a friend who has lost the bread of his life by mercantile insanity, and who writes a letter from London, in 1845, describing grotesquely BYRON, SHELLEY, COLERIDGE, and the other noble poets of their time, as if they were still living. In the same vein he speaks of those who are still living as dead, and says of one of them: "I remember, when a boy, I got from Goldsmith's LONGFELLOW by name, who scattered some delicate verses to the winds, and went to Germany, and published a Book of Sonnets, and became at the University of Gottingen." Here, too, in this unusually beautiful book, are a handful of delicate verses scattered to the winds by a young man who, in no disordered fancy, but in sad fact, died last autumn, and whose friend literary comrade, Mr. WILLIAM WINTER, in a simple and touching sketch, relates the few dates and facts of his life, which have a strangely mournful and even melancholy of the impression that the book produces.

Mr. ARNOLD was born in the city of New York, in 1838, and at the age of three was taken by his parents to the West, and returned with them to the neighborhood of New York in 1840. In 1852 they went to live in a lovely country—soon relinquished the attempt, and thenceforward, until his death, in November, 1865, was a writer for the periodical press. He wrote with little facility prose or verse; squib, satire, or sentiment; living by his pen, and quietly accepting all the conditions of his profession. A hundred lines of his writings was probably the series of M'ARTHUR letters in Vanity Fair, but the best of them were undoubtedly the poems which, after his death, have been edited. They are full of a pensive, delicate sentiment, and a graceful music, which shows how easily and naturally his reveries and his thoughts flowed into rhyme. If the poet were a Bohemian, in the vulgar sense, there is yet no touch of Bohemia in his verses. The playful attempts at cynicism are very transparent. The real thing in them is a pathetic grace, a genuine sadness. Whether the poet were more than the luxury of "dreamful youth" does not appear. There are hints—not, however, in Mr. WINTER'S memoir—that he was a man who, while the young author never recovered. Mr. ARNOLD'S poetry is in no imitative strain. It is not an echo of a familiar voice, but is truly his own, and is sure to awaken a melancholy interest in the poet. We can copy but one little song, written in a sunny mood, which is a good illustration of his rare grace and felicity:

"JUBILATE.

"Gray distance hid each shining sill,
By ruthless breezes borne from me;
And, homeless, farings, fates, and pain,
My ships went forth to sea.

"Where misty breakers rose and fell
I stood and sorrowed hopelessly;
For every wave had tales to tell
Of wrecks far out at sea.

"To-day, a song is on my lips;
Earth seems a Paradise to me;
For God is good, and, lo! my ships
Are coming home from sea."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

June 28:

In the Senate, after several attempts at amendment the Freedman's Bureau bill was passed, and sent back to the House.

In the House, the Pacific Railroad bill was passed—56 to 99.

June 27:

In the Senate, Mr. Morrill called up the bill introduced by Mr. Wade on the 25th day of the session, to grant universal suffrage in the District of Columbia. A memorial was read, remonstrating against the right of suffrage all who voluntarily left the District to go to the rebellion. An amendment to limit the franchise to such persons as can read the Constitution of the United States and write was offered, but was rejected. Final action on the bill was not reached.

In the House, the Senate bill to prevent smuggling was passed.—Mr. Morrill, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported their amendments to the Tax bill, and proceeded to state the important features of the report. The amendments were especially voted on, and as the House refused to concur in several of them, a Committee of Conference was asked for. Among the non-concurred in were the rebate, cigar, income, and Bank tax amendments.

June 28:

In the Senate, Mr. Brown offered a resolution, which was adopted, requesting the Committee on Public Military to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for such appointments in the military establishment as the Post-office, Treasury, and Interior Departments, as will secure competent clerks and proper examinations and a reputable demobilize and promotions as they are regulated in the War and Navy, to the end that the appointments in these Departments may not be used as reservoirs of political power.

In the House, the Missouri contested election case was taken up, Mr. Rollins, of Missouri, in the chair.—The Senate amendments to the House bill to continue in force and amend the act to establish the Freedmen's Bureau were taken up. On motion of Mr. Eliot the amendments were concurred in, and a Committee of Conference was asked.—The House then proceeded to the consideration of the Tariff bill.—Mr. Morrill addressed the House in explanation and support of the bill. He urged a higher duty on the articles reported additional, especially wool.

June 29:

In the Senate, a committee of conference was appointed on the Freedmen's Bureau bill. The points to be considered relate to the disposition of the Sea Island lands. The House forbids the surrender of the lands now held by the Freedmen under General Sherman's order. The bill as passed by the Senate contains provisions under which the Freedmen may purchase the lands now in hands, except such as have been sold for United States taxes.

NEWS ITEMS.

Dispatches from Galveston, Texas, give Mexican news to the 23d of June. Maximilian had been reinstated by the Imperialists, and occupied by the Liberals. Mejia had left for Guatemala, followed by 1,500 of the troops of Maximilian. Seven hundred Liberals occupied Hueuitla, and a force was preparing to attack Tuxpan.

Morton, the Republican candidate, has been elected Governor of Nebraska by 145 majority. The majority in favor of making the Territory a State was 111.

Governor Swann, of Maryland, declines calling an extra session of the Legislature to act upon the Constitutional Amendment.

The "Conservatives" have carried the election in TEXAS, and Throckmorton is elected Governor. The Union men seem to have polled one-third of the vote.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE WAR IN EUROPE.

The German Diet at Frankfort having, on June 14, passed the act for the mobilization of the Federal army, Prussia has declared the Confederation dissolved, and that she regards all the States as voting for the act.

The vote was nine in favor to six against—eight votes, according to Austria, being necessary—the majority a plurality of 18,789,711, and contingents of 177,768 men; while the votes excluding Prussia against the proposal represent a population of 2,054,580, and contingents of 20,000 men.

The members of the Confederation voting for the adoption of Austria are Austria, Saxony, Austria, Bavaria, Hanover, Wurtemberg, the two Hesses, with Liechtenstein, Nassau, Saxe-Altenburg, Saxe-Meiningen, Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, the two Mecklenburgs, Oldenburg, Anhalt, Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, Waldeck, Reuss, Lippe-Detmold, and those voting against it, Prussia, Luxemburg, Saxe-Weimar, Saxe-Meiningen, Brunswick, Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, the two Mecklenburgs, Oldenburg, Anhalt, Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, Waldeck, Reuss, Lippe-Detmold, Schaumburg-Lippe, Hesse-Homburg, Lubeck, Bremen, and Hamburg.

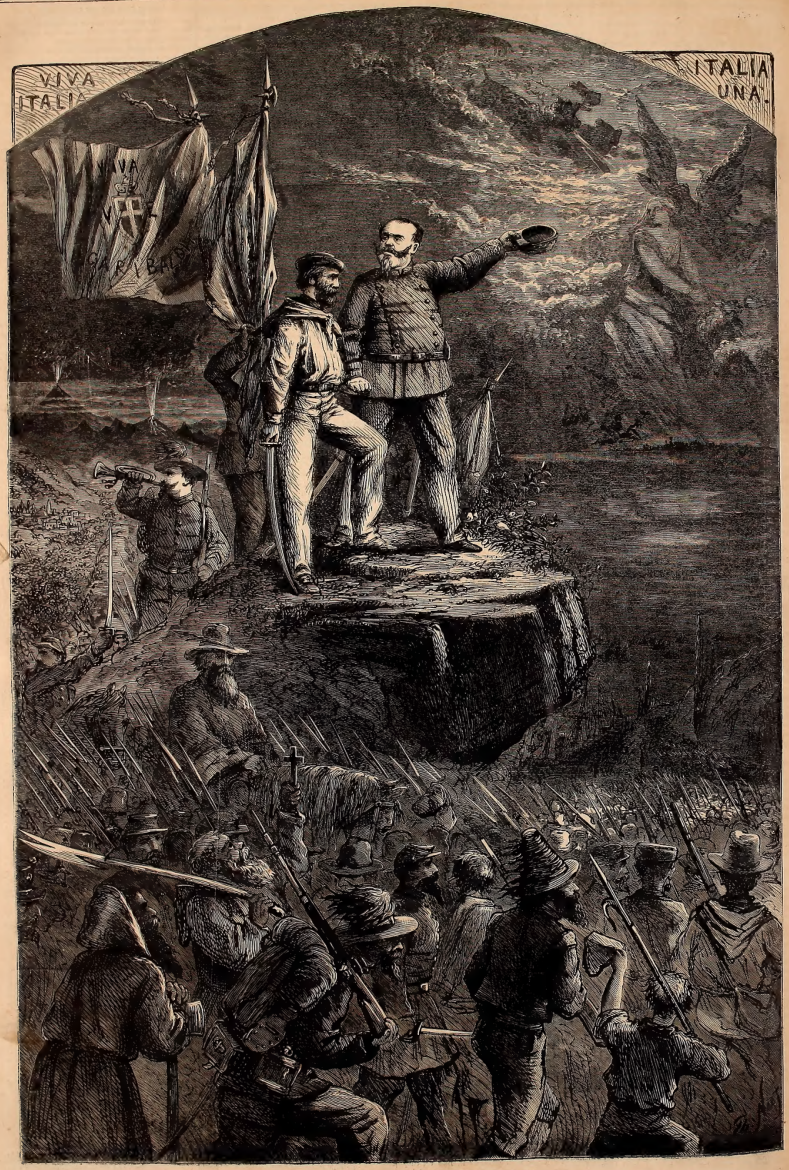
The Prussian Government has diminished the neutrality of Saxony in the conflict, the retention of the Saxon army in a peace footing, and allowing the Crown Prince passage for concealing a German parliament with the view of founding a new Confederation, has been rejected by the Saxon Government. Hanover, Hesse-Cassel, and Nassau rejected the Prussian summons.

The Bremen arrived here on the 3d inst. with a budget of news, which in the most exciting circumstances.

Prussia and Italy each declared war against Austria on June 18. The announcement was received here on the fact that Prussia has been sending gold to Italy, contrary to the Austrian Emperor and the Prussian King have issued royal manifestoes—the former to the Austrian people, the latter to the Prussian army, which breathe much anger.

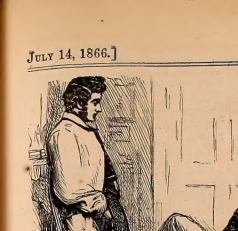
A new Italian Ministry has been organized, with Ricasoli at the head. Victor Emanuel and Garibaldi have met, and, it is said, Garibaldi, the Pope's friend, has resigned.

Turkey has announced that she will interfere in the Danubian Principalities; and France, England, and Russia have protested against it.



Russia has thrown a force on the Austrian frontier, and has given notice that in case of interference by other neutral Powers she also will interfere.

Spain has declared herself to withdraw from the Peiric.



The Atlantic Telegraph Expedition was to start on the 8th of July.

ENGLAND.

By advices from England of June 28 it appears that in consequence of the heavy majority against Gladstone Government Gladstone had put himself in connection with the Queen for dissolution, and Parliament had adjourned until June 29.

THE UPRISING OF ITALY.—[DRAWN BY MR. THOMAS NAST.]

THE QUEEN OF DIAMONDS.

We were inconvenientiy situated, Phil and I. In a situation indeed that would have rendered more susceptible individuals in a state of mind quite unfit to enjoy the Christmas festivities as closely approaching.

Phil had been, I must say, awfully extravagant; and much as I sympathized with him, I could not blame the "gov'nor" for sending him a check for £50, with the information that he might right himself as he could, for that he (the "gov'nor") was sick of paying his bills and setting him going again, and was firmly resolved to wash his hands of the whole "affair."

The "affair," who happened to be seated beside my fire, with a glass of brandy-and-water near him, and a cheroot in his mouth, folded up the check carefully and slipped it in his waistcoat pocket, and then tearing up the paternal letter, quietly relighted his cheroot, and remarked,

"It's shabby of the gov'nor, I must say," he said, with a patience that, compared with my indignant disappointment, was Job-like and beautiful. "But it's no use making a row about it, so there we are where we were before."

"I've seven pay your tailor's bill," I muttered, thinking selfishly to myself, "much less leave you a pound to send on."

"Of course it won't; the gov'nor didn't intend it should. It's a Christmas-box," Phil answered, as friendly as may be like a Turk.

I pointed to a little basket that lay beside my writing-table. "I don't know how full yours is," I said, sternly, "but mine won't hold any more. I've about a dozen by each post from those confounded tradesmen, graduating in insolence."

"So have I, for matter," Phil interrupted Phil. "But I never read them. I never could stand being blackguarded, and that's what dunning's been allowed to rank in a country that prides itself on its freedom and its constitution. Why," continued Phil, warming with his subject, and gesticulating in a manner that lent additional grandeur to his sentiments, "don't we pride ourselves on the sacredness of the domestic hearth? Is not every man's home his castle? And yet, through the medium of this liberal, this enlightened Government, the post is allowed to invade its sanctuary, and pour on the pure white breakfast-cloth a heap of insults sufficient to make the blood boil within one, and spoil one's disposition for the day!"

"There should be some law," added Phil, more quietly, and sinking back meditatively in his chair, "to prevent this intrusion on a man's privacy—some fine or even heavy punishment should be inflicted for transmitting, by such means, insults dishonoring equally to the British tradesman and British gentleman. Blackguarding's forbidden in the streets, why should it be permitted in our homes?

"Never mind the whys and the wherefores," I answered, rather crossly, "the thing is, and there's an end of it. The question is, Phil, what are we to do? Do you know I'm deucedly hard up?"

My friend did not answer for at least twelve whiffs; then he said in his calmest manner:

"You're not of a reflective disposition unfortunately, Jack, or else I should recommend you to light your pipe and leave it to Fate to suggest some idea. With me the case is different. Provide me with a weed and a glass of grog, and if you were to perch me at the top of Mont Blanc, or plunge me in the depths of a coal mine, reflection would claim me as her own."

"I think then, my dear Phil," I replied, with the shadow of a sneer, "it is time you set your reflective powers to work. Fifty pounds won't do you much service, if I am rightly informed as to the extent of your liabilities."

"I am perfectly aware of that, and yet you see I am calm as a marble Jupiter. Such is the force of my self-reliance."

"Come, Phil, what's up!" I exclaimed, in a coaxing tone, for I knew enough of my friend's affairs to value his self-reliance at its proper worth.

Phil raised his glass to his lips, and for a moment there was silence. Then laying it down, he said, energetically, "Jack, I am disgusted with my kind! I feel almost Byronic."

"So do I," I grimly responded.

"There are times," continued Phil, again falling into those gesticulations which he had acquired at the best private theatricals, "when I feel that I could almost—"

"I thought he was going to say 'commit suicide,'" and as I was contemplating entering the Church, I thought it an excellent opportunity to begin preaching; but he only added, after another communication with the glass beside him, "Merry!"

"Good Heavens!" I said, fervently. "At your age, Philip! Why you must be mad; besides, find yourself" would neither salt nor mustard me."

"Then what do you mean? I hate guessing riddles—speak out." I fear I did not speak with my usual amiability, but circumstances were trying, and so was Phil, particularly when he had on the "marble Jupiter" mood.

Instead of answering, my friend took from his pocket a small note written on delicate pink paper, and scented with the delightful odor that had once been sweeter than the rose to my senses, as pervading every article that had the felicity of belonging to Gertrude Thornly, Phil's youngest sister.

This he threw at me in a manner that, had he not been my dearest friend (and Gerty's brother), I should have quarreled with him on the spot.

Smoothing it out, for the wretch had crumpled it up in a way that he certainly would not have done Blanche's embossed notes, I cast my eyes over the dashing calligraphy, and after some difficulty, for I must say Gerty wrote with the same dash she did every thing, I made out the following:

"THORNLY HALL, Dec.

"MY DEAREST PHIL,—What have you been doing, you silly, extravagant boy, to put papa so terribly out of sorts? He has not spoken a civil word to any one since he got your letter; and when I asked him how you were, and what news you gave, he spirted out some very naughty words, which made the Rev. Mr. Blinks, who was dining with us, use his handkerchief vigorously. Now, my dear Phil, you really should not do whatever you have been doing, and I hope you won't again. I and Blanche were talking it over last night, when we were undressing (Blanche always says she's a dog's body when she's undressing, and she thinks it may be that you have been spending too much, which of course one is apt to do when things are so dear, and dress-makers so exorbitant in their prices; and papa should not expect one to buy every thing at one's own to charity sermons too. And Blanche says her papa is so bad, and she only wishes for your sake and her own she was a Queen of Diamonds. By-the-by, that reminds me, the Queen of Diamonds, Miss Howney, is coming to stay with us at Christmas; and so is Captain Johnson, and Clara, and all the Holmeses. I hope you will manage to get away too, as you do make theatricals go off so well. And now good-by.

"Your affectionate sister,

"GERTRUDE THORNLY.

"P.S.—Don't do it any more, for papa is so cross."

I was so interested in the perusal of that note—taking me back as it did in the presence of that being, who, by my mind, was the sweetest woman I had ever met—so engrossed with the pleasant fancy, that I again heard her gay laugh and happy fresh voice, almost indeed felt the flutter of her ribbons, as during those few days of the preceding September—that I continued gazing at the writing, and forgot that my friend was waiting my comments on it.

"Well?" at length he said.

I started.

"Well?" he repeated; "do you understand now my meaning?"

"I must confess that I do not."

Philip's lip curled contemptuously, but he was too lazy to be more violently abusive.

"I suppose you can understand that Blanche Grey is not a Queen of Diamonds, however much her devotion to me, dear angel, may make her wish it."

I did understand that perfectly, knowing that Miss Grey was the daughter of one of the greatest spendthrifts going, who never had a penny to pay cash for any thing; for what all this nonsense about queens and diamonds meant I was still as much in the dark as ever, and I said so frankly.

Phil still looked contemptuous, but he condescended to be more lucid.

"Gerty writes abominably," he said, puffing out his cigar smoke in that imperial manner that Jupiter would probably have rolled out his, had the blessing of tobacco been known on High Olympus; "but she's a sensible girl for all that, and with an eye to business, which she most certainly inherits from the paternal side. She means kindly to hint to me that if I am in difficulties I could not do better than make up to Diana Rowney. She goes rather round about, and brings in Blanche in a way I do not quite like, but she means well, I dare say."

Now, knowing as I did, that Gerty Thornly was the frankest, simplest, heartiest girl in the world, and the bosom friend of Blanche Grey, I felt this translation of her letter to fit in to the suggestion of his own mercenary thoughts malicious in the extreme, and I girded myself up (figuratively of course, for it was after dinner) for a combat in her defense.

But Phil raised himself immediately, and energetically for him. "Don't, for Heaven's sake, don't! I know all you are going to say, and I am in a mood in which it would drive me to distraction. No; let us be sensible, Jack, and talk things over without any romantic sentimentalism."

"That's what I have been wishing you to do for the last hour," I answered, crossly.

Phil waved his pipe in that calm oratorical manner which I know prefaced a rather lengthy speech; so I lay back and made myself comfortable.

"Jack," said Phil, in the way he would have said "Mr. Speaker" in addressing the House of Commons, "Jack, we are in difficulties; I say say difficulties of an intricacy which even passes our powers of solution. Those difficulties, however, all centre in the one point, want of money; and the question is how to supply this want."

"Come, Phil, you're getting prosy," I remarked. "It's a prosy subject. I am not a Gladstone, and finance is a subject I abhor. Why not, therefore, turn it into something more romantic? Now I know Diana Rowney is not to compare with Blanche in a robe de chambre, but in her ball dress, with all her fortune flashing about her, she is perfectly dazzling. Blanche hates to a mere shadow."

"I wish you would explain who this Diana Rowney is, and what you mean about her diamonds," I interrupted a little testily, for, truth to tell, I was beginning to fear that Phil had some prize in view which I could not share.

"Why I thought the girls had told you about her. She is the daughter of some Indian merchant who made a fortune, and came just before he died turned it all into diamonds, which he left to his daughter on the condition that she did not attempt to sell them before she married. He made her take an oath; I believe, at least so she says, and she lives moderately on £60 a year, while she keeps her fortune in her pocket for a husband."

"How much are they worth?" I inquired, with interest; "and what kind of a girl is she?"

"You had better come down to Thornly Hall and judge for yourself."

As he spoke, Phil fixed his eye on me in a manner that I knew had a deep meaning.

"Well," I said, "what?"

"Shall we make a bargain, Jack? We've held to each through a good deal; shall we hold on still? We both want money, we both have a fancy for—well perhaps for a prettier girl than Diana Rowney; suppose we agree to toss up who is to be the sacrifice, and agree that the other shall receive a thousand pounds on the wedding-day."

"Phil, what a horrible, almost immoral idea!" I exclaimed, virtuously.

"Well, I did not say it was agreeable, or particularly moral, did I? All I say is, it is necessary for me to get money somehow, even if I have to do something as bad as marrying an heiress. There!"

And Phil reared up his great person, gave his mustache a savage pull, and prepared to put on his great-coat.

* * * * * *

The result of that conversation was that, on the 21st of December, a couple of tall (and I thought I say it, who should not), good-looking fellows, took first-class tickets by the Great Western down to Bridgewater.

I must also confess that on the previous night, after having passed a dreary hour looking over my entangled accounts, Philip had also contrived to beguile me into that immoral "toss up," which was to decide whether the heiress or the bank accounts were to be mine; and I was in uncommonly good spirits from having won the money. I could still meet Gerty Thornly with a free conscience.

Phil, I must say, bore his fate with a calmness truly philosophical; but I noticed even he avoided the subject of Blanche Grey, and if he ever mentioned love or woman, spoke of them in a Byronic manner quite painful to hear. His feelings, however, must have been rather tried when, on arriving at Bridgewater, we found a whole party from the Hall come to meet us, among whom was Miss Grey, but not the Queen of Diamonds.

They kept up the old style of things at Thornly Hall. There were plenty of servants about table, silver plate, and Christmas festivities; and besides the three daughters with moderate portions, timber that must not be cut, and an eldest son, who, unfortunately for himself, was not Phil. I knew all this; and I was accustomed to the ways of the place, and I went to my room to dress for dinner in a frame of mind perfectly satisfied with my own position, and indeed that of all the world.

Alas for human selfishness! I must confess I was so engrossed with my own pleasant meditations, that I had quite or almost forgotten that Phil was about to be sacrificed; and when he just poked his head into my room, and growled that "he had just had a talk with the gov'nor, who was still savage as a bear, and that he must go in for her," I scarcely remembered who the "her" was. I was a little horrified when I did remember, for I must confess I had found Gerty more charming than ever (I think winter costume, especially that black-plumed hat, became her even more than airy summer millinery), and it made me almost shudder to think how I had tempted Fate.

It is astonishing what a purifying effect female society has on our brutal, male natures. Ten minutes after I had been in the company of the Misses Thornly and Blanche Grey round the blazing fire, while we waited the summons to dinner, gold had become dross in my estimation; those luxuries of bachelor life I had been accustomed to consider necessaries the most insipid vanities that a man could burden himself with dost for, I grew virtuously strong; so much so, that I blushed when I thought of the object of that Christmas visit among those unsuspecting damsels, and resolved in my no best to prevent this evil-doing, even at the cost of my thousand; but even as I determined the door opened, and in came Phil, in his most disrupt toilet, with a lady. Well, she was not handsome, unless an overdoing of every feature she possessed gave her a title to beauty. She had a very high Roman nose, very large black eyes, very, very bushy black eyebrows, very black hair, very large white teeth, and very red lips—lips and teeth which made you shudder and call to mind the old story of Red Ridinghood.

"What large teeth you have, grandmamma!"

"All the better to eat you up, my dear!"

Somehow, whenever she opened her mouth, and

"SHE GUESSED SHE HAD LOST PHIL."

turned her head in the snappish way which seemed peculiar to her, I fancied she was going to say that.

All the ladies made a move as they entered.

"Come and sit near the fire, Diana!" exclaimed Miss Thornly.

"Here's a cozy little corner, Di," said Gerty.

"So there is here," said Edith Holmes. "Come by me, Diana."

The Queen of Diamonds seemed a great favorite even among her own sex—that was comforting. However, Diana Rowney smiled graciously, and the buffet at that moment announcing dinner, she accepted Phil's arm, and we all made a move to the dining-room.

Again I must acknowledge that the charms of my own position made me insensible to the trials of my friend; and it was only when he called to me, in rather a rough voice, to pass something at the dessert, that I observed, in spite of his smiles, Phil was looking any thing but contented.

Phil was a very handsome fellow in his way, and had brass enough to give cash to his soft attentions and sweet speeches, which quite distinguished him. He was handsome, too, and had a peculiarity about the eyes that pleased us men, so it was not to be wondered that the women adored him.

I watched him a little after that call, and I saw that he was going through the regular process with dark Diana, and apparently with success; for the great eyes were glowing like red-hot coals—I can't say stars—and she was laughing and talking, and paying him an attention as flattering as it was expensive.

They grew a little noisy, too, and attracted general attention, approving I could see, from the bottom of the table, but not quite so much so from either Gerty or Blanche Grey. Indeed, the fair face of Miss Grey had looked very much worried ever since she had been at table; and Gerty now and then made wrong answers as a louder peal of laughter than usual came from Phil and Diana's corner.

Still, when Miss Thornly made the move, and the ladies left the room, Phil took his cambric handkerchief and pressed it across his brow with a sigh, as if he had concluded some Herculean labor. He took a good deal of wine too afterwards.

That evening he was very assidious in courting dark Diana, and showed, indeed, a firmness of purpose worthy of a better cause; but whether it was that the sharp fresh air of morning cooled his ardor, or that he found Diana still less inviting with that large Roman nose protruding from under a tiny black hat, I know not; but the next morning his attention fluctuated rather, and when in the morning ride his horse fell back beside Blanche, he seemed to find it difficult to urge him forward again to the assistance of Miss Rowney, who professed to be nervous on horseback; and when we happened to loiter together in the dining-room before luncheon, he shrugged his shoulders most deprecatingly, and whispered, "If she would but come out with them all blazing about her, it would give me courage. Jack."

Three days passed, however, and "the Queen did not come out in the "blaze" poor Phil yearned for, as should the prisoner for sunshine. She wore a diamond brooch occasionally, which attracted our covetous gaze; but, as we both silently observed, that was not sufficiently tempting to make wooing with Diana Rowney in the balance against either Gerty or Blanche.

A philosopher less interested than myself might have found a delightful combination of amusement and instruction in watching Phil's conduct those three days. He would have seen an amusing struggle between the man of the world and the man of nature; the man of wants and the man of taste. In the evening, after imbibing a certain quantity of sherry and port, Phil was Diana's slave, lounging with her in private corners, bending over her while she sang (songs which put your teeth on edge), decking her hair with camellias stolen from his sister's conservatory, and otherwise pursuing the object which brought us down to Thornly; but in the morning, somehow, he could not resist Blanche's attractions; and how, I know not, but we used constantly fall into that same quarter, scrambling through the leafless woods and roads in which we had contrived to pass so many hours of the last long vacation so satisfactorily.

I think the mornings made up to poor Blanche for all the positive desertion in the evenings; and perhaps she believed what I heard Gerty assert on night, under cover of Diana's singing. "Phil was obliged to be attentive, to please you, you know."

How this would have gone on—which lady would have carried the day—I know not, but I was getting rather tired of hearing about my business.

However, Christmas-eve came. There was to be a dance, and we gentlemen had gone through the usual exercise of decking the rooms with holly and such flowers as could be got, and we had done the usual amount of flirtation likewise. I think the day had been trying to Phil on the whole, for I must say even I thought I had never seen Blanche look prettier than she did, now peeping through dark wreaths of laurel, now hanging from a high head over the shiny holly. The opportunities, too, for love-making had been very abundant, and to have to make sweet speeches to Diana, after whispering them to blushing Blanche, must have been martyrdom, more especially when connected with a guilty conscience.

Phil did seem nervous for once in his life, and I remarked that he left the society of the drawing-room much sooner than he needed to do to prepare for the dance; and on leaving myself for the same purpose half an hour afterward I saw the red spark of his cigar sauntering up and down the terrace. Now smoke in solitude proclaimed that Philip Thornly was uneasy in his mind, so I was not surprised, on descending to the hall-room some time afterward, to find that he was still absent, nor to hear from Captain Johnson that he was still smoking away like a Turk in the cold night air.

Meanwhile the room began to fill, the music to play, and the usual routine of the ball to proceed. The scene was pretty enough to please the most fastidious eye, for the decorations were perfect, the lights admirably disposed, and certainly filling on "fair women and brave men" in profusion; but it became dazzling when the door was thrown open, and Diana Rowney appeared in the blaze of all her fortune. Diamonds on her neck, diamonds in her ears, diamonds on her arms! Heavens! how she blazed beneath the lights, and how her great dark eyes shone with triumph as she saw the envious gaze fixed upon her!

Certainly, whether it was the fiend of avarice that put me on the spectacles or not I can not say; but somehow that dark woman, with her glittering jewels, did seem to cast the rest into the shade; even fair Blanche, till then the belle (except for Gerty) of the room, seemed to fade into something dim, and I must say I thought cheerfully of the thousand pounds. Why, those diamonds must be worth an immense sum!

Dark Diana was quite surrounded by an admiring crowd, but she refused all offers until Philip Thornly appeared, and then she accepted his arm and took her place in a quadrille. I did not see whether it was maliciously done or not, but she manœuvred so that for her vis-à-vis she had Blanche Grey.

I had watched narrowly for Phil's entrance, for I would not have lost the effect of the first view of the Queen of Diamonds upon him for the world. I should be able to judge of my chance of the thousand pounds by it.

He bore the dazzling sight, however, with admirable composure; and Diana's eyes must have been more acute than mine if she could detect in their unconcern, surprise, or admiration in the quiet glance with which he approached her and asked her to dance. Indeed, he had her forward a hand's turn and a half, as he led her forward I heard him say, in an indifferent tone, "that he had a headache, and felt hardly up to dancing."

But he did dance—and with the Queen of Diamonds too—to Blanche's grievous anger and astonishment; and he took her out to supper, and plied her with Champagne, and quaffed copiously of the same himself; and then, when they came back again, he only took one quadrille round the room, and retired to the conservatory.

Heavens! how that woman's eyes shone as, leaning heavily on Phil's arm, she passed through the glass door beside which I stood, with my arm round Blanche, taking breath for an instant.

"What are they going to dance for?" Blanche said, quickly; and then she looked up in my face, and whether she saw any thing there ominous I know not, but I felt almost as if she would detect the shrewd guess in me, and murmuring something about being tired, went and dropped quietly on a sofa in the corner.

I think, poor girl, she guessed all about it; and I felt quite wretched as I looked at her, watching them from under the fringed fan that door. She guessed she had lost Phil.

Gerty did too, I think; for suddenly her face lost its gayety, and she went and sat down by Blanche, and wound her arm round her silently, but in a manner very protecting and sympathetic.

I was not sorry when the quadrille came to an end; and I must acknowledge I went to my room feeling almost as guilty as if I had abetted a Gunpowder Plot.

"Come in!" I exclaimed; and the door opened and Phil came in.

"I've done it!" he said, throwing himself on the sofa, and beginning to pull off his necktcloth as if it choked him.

"Done what?"

"Proposed to Diana Rowney: we are to be married in a month."

I was prepared for the news, and so listened silently.

"Of course," continued Phil, "it's trying—very trying; not only for poor Blanche, but for me. Champagne only could have given me courage, I'm sure, and I see I must send an enormous supply to wherever we fix on for the honey-moon. The honey-moon! only fancy a month of spooning on Diana, and from that to emerge into a family man! By Jove! Jack, I don't know now whether I shall have the nerve to get through it."

He took a cigar from my box as he spoke, and began to smoke vigorously.

The position was rather embarrassing, and I really scarcely knew whether to condole with my friend or congratulate him. I took a middle course in the philosophical.

"The diamonds are magnificent, Phil, and I dare say you'll get used to domestic life in time."

"Suppose not," said Phil, with a little blank, perhaps; but Diana! And then, suppose—"

Phil hesitated, and his face grew perplexed.

"Suppose what?"

"Oh, nothing; only a ridiculous idea!" But he got up from the sofa and his candle, with the same expression of countenance and perplexity; and I knew he took himself off so hastily because he was afraid of letting out the reason of it.

He came down the next morning, though, looking very calm and composed; and neither he nor Diana displayed any of the usual embarrassment, when, in a slight pause in conversation, Phil quietly announced at the breakfast-table the happiness with which he contemplated adding so charming a daughter-in-law to his family circle. Certainly Blanche Grey was not there, having gone home with her father the night before; so there was no one to forbid the banns, but Gerty, and she dared only do it by her indignant eyes.

The two went to church together, and otherwise behaved themselves like an engaged couple; and apparently all was going on in a satisfactory manner so long as I was at Thornly to keep my watch on them.

When I went back to London I left Philip still courting away firmly and philosophically, and his last words to me at the station were, "Good-by, Jack; as soon as possible, after the 14th of next month, you shall have a present."

I saw very little of him again till I received the important invitation. He came to my lodgings two or three times, but was always in a desperate hurry; and, beyond a hasty sentence or two that all was going on well, he seemed to avoid reference to what neither of us had much business to be proud of. I gathered from Gerty—who I met at a friend's, to my inexpressible delight—the intelligence that, though Phil was a good deal at the Hall, Miss Rowney did not often come; she was making a round of visits among her Irish friends previous to her marriage, I believe; but she and Phil corresponded regularly. About settlements Gerty did not know much; but she said Phil was quite satisfied, and papa had promised to allow him £300 a year.

I must say I looked forward to the 14th with some anxiety, however. In spite of things looking so rosy and comfortable, I could not quite believe that the marriage would take place. That Diana Rowney would wish to withdraw from it was seemed impossible. But day after day passed, and I heard nothing of the affair being either broken off or delayed. The 13th of February I found myself travcling down to Thornly Hall to fulfill my promise of acting best man to my old friend.

The party I found gathered ready for the wedding was small, but just what it ought to have been; and, apparently, all was going a great deal smoother than the course of true love is properly supposed to do. The bridegroom elect was very handsome, looked quite calm, and not at all triste; the bridesmaids good-tempered, and the papa ditto. We were not quite so merry, perhaps, as at Christmas, but we were very cheerful. The only time when my spirits flagged at all was when I found the bride's great black eyes fixed on me, or when I caught the sound of her "well" lips. Diana did not like me. Whether she suspected any thing or not I do not know; but I felt that when Miss Rowney became Mrs. Philip Thornly, I should be allowed to see very little of her domestic felicity.

I think Phil saw this too, ah! and a few other things; and I suppose that was why he would walk up the terrace for the solitary smoke, so indicative of mental depression. He avoided me still; and it was therefore with some surprise that I found his heavy quick step coming along the corridor toward my door the eve of the wedding.

"I may come in, and have my smoke, Jack, I suppose?" he said, poking his bearded, handsome face into the room.

"Come, old fellow, and I shall be honored by your company. You don't often favor me now," I returned, pulling my own chair toward the fire and pointing to the other opposite.

Phil seated himself and carefully lighted his pipe, and then smoked away in silence for at least ten minutes.

"I feel, Jack," at length he said, looking unutterably wretched, "as if I were come to say the last few words to you previous. I had no idea matrimony required such nerve—as much, ay, more than having a tooth drawn."

"Phil, unfortunately, it's not so soon over," I remarked.

"No, indeed!" with a groan that followed each puff of smoke. "I'm quite miserable."

"Must it be, Phil? have you quite made up your mind? After all a wife's a wife, and one soon spends one's money; and then suppose—"

"Suppose what?" said Phil, with a start that made me jump so I let my moerschaum fall into the fender.

"Thank Heaven it is not broken!"

"Suppose what?" reiterated Phil, inconsiderately enough.

"It's real," I began, pettishly, alluding to my pipe.

"Of course it is, and does not leave one's face so one unless, particularly after all the fuss I made. I don't know much about—poor Blanche—"

"What has she to do with me about?" I interrupted. "Your head is quite turned by Diana's diamonds. I was talking about my pipe."

"Your pipe! well," Phil spoke quite viciously, and I felt so offended that I became solemnly silky for five minutes. At length, however, Phil, with a sigh of relief, brought the subject round, bear it no longer. "Jack," he said, "to tell you the truth, I came to consult you."

I condescended to look more affable. "I am not a philosopher, Phil, but you're welcome to my advice, such as it is," I said, with modest dignity.

"Well, look here."

As he spoke, Philip took from his pocket a tiny morocco case, opened it, and handed it to me. It contained a diamond ring elaborately set.

I must confess I do not understand gems, and, though I tried to examine it with the air of a connoisseur, I am afraid I failed signally.

"Come, Jack, you know you know no more about diamonds than I do. Tell me what to make of it."

This afternoon Diana gave me that ring."

"Very handsome of her, I'm sure."

"Well, I don't know. Philip," and I began talking about the jewels, you see, and though I tried not to appear too much interested, I don't know that I succeeded, for I found Diana's eyes were on me in a awful manner, and then, after making some excuse for keeping the best of the diamonds in her own pocket, she brought me this, and begged me to accept it."

"Well—"

"Well, Jack, I must confess I do feel horribly uneasy. Ever since I have been engaged I have been haunted by an awful suspicion. Suppose, Jack, suppose those diamonds were false!"

He uttered this in a low, awful tone; and then, lying back, puffed away violently.

"It would be horrible," I said: "but the same idea has occurred to me."

"It has! Ah, then, that decides me! To-morrow, Jack, I shall take that ring to a jeweler at Bridgewater. I am not going to marry Diana for nothing."

As he spoke Phil rose up; and in spite of my invitation to remain a little longer, prepared to take himself off, in a mood of desperate resolution, to his own room.

"The—the ceremony doesn't take place till eleven o'clock," he said, as he gently opened the door. "I shall start early, Jack; and if I am not back before you all get to church, meet me at the western door, will you?"

"Oh, you're sure to be back; Bridgewater's not five miles off."

"I shall try, you may be sure. Good-night. And away he went.

I was prepared for some of what came to pass the next day; but not for all.

There we were, all waiting in the church; the clergyman in his surplice, the bride surrounded by her bridesmaids, all waiting for the bridegroom. Phil had not appeared. A quarter of an hour lengthened into half, and still he came not; and then the three-quarters struck, and still he came not.

Mr. Thornly grew nervous, and, as usual, began to use bad language. Gerty turned pale, and the guests began to whisper. Only Diana Rowney sustained perfect composure, sitting in her pew. It was only when the caught sight of Blanche Grey (who had proudly demanded to be present at Phil's wedding) that she looked the least troubled. For Blanche was pale, and looked very anxious to the western door.

The clock had just struck the quarter to twelve when I saw a man on horseback riding quickly toward the church, and I immediately signaled the information to the rest, who thereupon placed themselves in positions to see at the altar.

I never felt so relieved in all my life; but as I stood watching my blood grew chill. That man was not Phil Thornly!

He came up and dismounted, and then gave me a paper. I knew what is contained before I saw the words—and, in truth, he need not have snatched from my hands by Mr. Thornly, I don't know that I should have done more than throw it down and walk off—Phil

"The ring is false. I am off to Paris.—P. T."

Mr. Thornly read out the words in a perfect fury. "What does he mean?—what the deuce does he mean?" he cried.

"I can explain, Sir," said Diana's voice, calmly, while a scornful smile spread itself over her pale face. "Your son has imagined I have deceived him about my diamonds, and he has left me; he declines the alliance."

"But this is scandalous."

"It is a little more than I expected, certainly. However, come, Mr. Thornly, let us return to the Hall; and as my lawyer rate let us indicate my honor, send for a jeweler, if you please."

Diana looked really dignified for once; and I think she was the only one of the party to whom my left the church with any thing like dignity. As for Blanche, she was terribly flushed, and kept repeating over and over, "Surprising," "I should think horrid marriage would never come off"; and then poor Philip was so dreadfully hard-up!" She was the only one, I believe, who felt the slight excuse in Philip's escape at all hazards.

We were soon all assembled in the old Hall, with Diana, still in her bridal robes, unlocking her jewel-casket solemnly, and pompously delivering jewel after jewel into Mr. Thornly's hands to be examined. The silence was great, the excitement equally so, and I myself scarcely dared breathe or to consider Philip and myself as villains or fools when, after careful testing, the jeweler pronounced Diana Rowney to be a Queen of true and excellent Diamonds!

She waited till the man was out of the room, and then, turning her great eyes triumphantly upon us all, she said:

"This is not the first time I have gone through a similar scene. I know now to whom to send Philip Thornly has, for my diamonds; and this is the test I put them to. The ring I gave Philip was false. This, however, has been a mass of diamond cut diamond." And then, without another word, she walked out of the room, and an hour after had left Thornly in the same carriage which was to have borne her away a wife.

I telegraphed the news to Philip—whom, I believe, his friends expected to be spell-bound—and retired myself immediately to my own lodgings.

The Queen of Diamonds had been too much for us; and, to use Philip's words, "there we were where we were before."

Fortunately for him, two of his good aunts died a few months after this, leaving him a handsome legacy; whereupon he returned to England, and, I believe, contemplates Blanche again. Otherwise he would be at this moment repenting, or, as Diana Rowney is "pining," at Boulogne.

GEORGE PEABODY'S BIRTH-PLACE.

WE give on page 444 a sketch of the Birth-place of Mr. GEORGE PEABODY, the distinguished American banker of London, whose munificent scheme to household word in England, on account of his princely benefaction to the London poor.

The house is located in the town of South Danvers, Massachusetts, on the "old Boston road," now Washington Street. The building, although still a one hundred and fifty year old-appears like the dwelling of a thrifty farmer of about twenty-five years ago. It burn of more antiquated appearance standing where the house is located when, and is a prominent object of interest both to the citizens of this thriving town and to strangers. In the immediate rear large old well has been established, in this native place, of a library, to which he contributed $100,000.

As a token of her appreciation of his gift to the poor of London, QUEEN VICTORIA, a short time since, addressed to Mr. PEABODY a letter conveying her special acknowledgment of his charity, and a now sitting for a portrait to be presented to him.

Mr. PEABODY is now in this country. It is said that his residence is so beset by loggers of every description that he has been compelled to refuse admittance to all except such familiar friends as must venture to enter without the formality of ringing the door-bell.

FENIANA.

I.

THE O'Mahony sate in an easy-chair
At the grand Head-Quarters in Union Square,
With rumpled hair
And an air
Of care,
And a gloomy glare
In his eye's fixed stare
As he gazed into vacancy, unaware
Of the luxuries rare
That surrounded him there.
There were mirrors in plenty and some to spare,
And the furniture—none of your common mohair—
Was brocaded and gorgeous beyond compare;
And every where,
From the foot of the stair
To the top of the roof where the flag-staff upbare
The emerald ensign of Erin the fair,
The house had been put in most thorough repair,
And the larder and cellar had each its share
Of edible and potable ware:
Not ill-cooked food to produce nightmare—
Not "cras ordinatur"—
But such sumptuous fare
As might satisfy aldermen feasting a may'r,
Or tempt even the Pope from his fasting and pray'r.
Yet the President's aspect was one of despair,
And his thoughts had wandered away elsewhere;
For the Fenian affair
Was quite "en arriere,"
And every thing "à sort à traverse."
The Senate had met and had sword a swear
His financial functions to overbear,
And to oust himself from that easy-chair.
No wonder, then, that his face should wear
A look the reverse of debonair.

"Be the worth o'me worrud! I vow and declare,"
Said he to himself, "it's remarkably quare,
Not to say unfair,
That thim baggarly blagyards iv Senators dare,
In spoite o' me warnin,' to plot their nefarious schames for the success of our cause to impair
By impeachin' meself. Let the thraitors beware
How they rouse up the Tiger (that's me) from his lair!
Though I'm bothered intoirely how to prepare
An adequate scare
That shall make them forbear
For the future to meddle or interfare
In matthers that don't appertain to their spare.
You'll have to abolished, nor own my vicarious power, and render my station precarious—Stay! May I ne'er
Become glory's hoir
But I'll write to Jim Stephens a letther severe,
Indorsin' meself and their plans layin' bare,
And ask him to extinguish their flare."

So he wrote a note whose contents were:

"Tres chèr
Confrer,—
We're in a wonderful pair—
I agent in loco, you centre in eyre—
And we've laid a snare
For the Saxon corsair;
And we've lighted up Erin as Liberty's phare
(Or will when we've found an embarcadère).
But I give you word that there's no secret faire
To be found in the lot
Of the colleagues I've got
On this side the Atlantic. A malcontent faction,
Whose action
Would drive to distraction
Any less earnest and virtuous patriot—
Is making a great riot,
That's true; but all the fat is in the fire land,
And play the Old Boy with the fortunes of Ireland.
They've recalled all my bonds, they've denied my authority,
And asserted their own senatorial priority,
And boldly assuming a coup d'état,
Have wrung me out short my triumphant career,
And depose me from office, appointing instead
One Roberts as President over my head.
Why wouldn't I use the right? Didn't I earn it, sure?)
Devil a cent
That we've spent
Or lent
But the villains have something to say anent.
To be brief, they've created, in country and city,
schisms,
And given the papers occasion for witticisms.
So, wherever you've leisure,
I'd like, if you'd please, your
Emphatic assurance that I'm quite immaculate,
And that if you don't yield to my sway the whole pack you'll hate.
Hoping that soon your injunction you'll lay on, I Remain yours fraternally,
(Signed) THE O'MAHONY."

* * * * * * *

"Is 'tis quite impressin' to be witnessin'
The crowd that's pressin' in the dirty shtarles,
As howldin' his* the British Lion down,
The Sinators his in and take their saites;
An', bedad! 'twould alarm ye, if it didn't charm ye,
To hear all the army an' the privateers
That Gin'ral Sweeny an' some naval Fenian
Is about convenin', with guns an' spears.

But whin they mintion the Fenian distribution,
Oh! 'tis that you'd thrimble for to hear with grief
Thim Bonarges a-preferrin' charges
Agin O'Mahony, their worlike chief,
An' that grate civilian, D. Doran Killian,
Who controlls each million that the coffers bear
(Sure of every sou he reasved in St. Louis,
If what they say's thrue, he tuk the best o' care).

Abuse of they two their tongues they lay to:
What's more, they say, too, they can bring their proof.
Wid the way they're jeerin' if ye wor in hearin'
Ye'd be silv fearin' that they'd raise the roof.
(Ye see, O'Mahony was after sayin' he Desired in Ireland to create no strife;
While the Roberts faction finds more attraction
In immayjate action on Canayjan soil.)

Want of veracity, with incapacity
And foul rapacity, is the cry they route, and
Their rage is kindled, and they swear they're swindled,
For funds is dwindled to "eleven thousand."
Of O'Mahvy's "whist, oh!" sorra word they'll list to,
Though he puts his fist to a deludherin' tale;
An' they tell poor "Barney" to hould his blarney
Or they'll up an' sind the pair of 'em to jail.

II.

As in your pre-amble you showed yourself lusty,
Acsin let us canter," my Pegasus trusty!
The verse you're averse to I'll, versatile, alter:
Hibernian metre's an unstable halter,
Whose short two-foot tether
Has chafed us together.
To pen you in suchwise might make you "ride rusty,"
Umbrell with the brogue, be your feet fastly back sent:
Our shafts need no traces of Irish broad accent.

The O'Mahony sits in his chair of state;
And he feels that he's now in a desperate strait;
And he pores on his plan as he scratches his pate
In search of a feasible plan
Whereby to renew Paddy's martial excitement,
And show the belief that of late there's a light meant:
For he thinks to himself, "If I can't contrive
The public confidence to revive,
And keep the sale of my bonds alive,
I'll be a ruined man."
He looks very black, for he knows full well how,
And he says to Killian, "What'll we do?
I'm sither fearin', my son, we and you,
That we're like two beets in an Irish stew,
And sorra one o' me seas the way through.
Advise me, if you can."

Then up speaks Treasurer Barney D.,
And he says to his colleague, chief, says he:
"Look here, old fellow,
There's Campo Bello,
A nate little island, convaynient of access,
That nayther to Saxon nor Yankee pays taxes:
A neutral ground for our canvas tints
And sickly crowd with its pitiful expline,
Sign me a commission as Lieutenant-General—
Barrin' some powdhers and muskets, our men are all ready to stay by the war next train,
And display our might on the coast of Maine!"

"Arrah! Barney, you've hit it!" O'Mahny responds,
"'Tis yourself is a jewel, the devil a lie in it!
Maybe 'twould sind up our Fenian bonds;
Any way, honey, there's no harrum thryin it!"

Like the monarch of France, of whose up-hill advance
Our land has told us the story,
Bold Killian sets out on his conquering route,
To add to Odd Ireland's great glory:
But, alas! like that monarch, his retrograde fame,
At Eastport he right about faces,
And leaving in peace Campo Bello's police,
His course to New York he retraces.
For though with all speed he's prepared for the deed,
The British somehow get there sooner;
And the Yankees make prizes of arms and supplies,
Which were sent on by sea in a schooner. *

The astounded Head Centre one morning sees enter
The mansion that's named after Meffit
A turbulent pack, who have begged their way back,
And who, failing their leader to catch,
At first he says nay to their clamor for pay,
But when Walsh shuts the door to and locks it,
And bellicose Gaynor with language of "demayne"
Produces a pistol and cocks it,
And all of them vow that they'll murther him now,
And as "swindler" and "imbecile" flout him,
He wisely retracts 'neath "the logic of facts,"
And hands over what cash is about him.

Tare an' ages! Murther an' oons!
All through the country cities and towns—
There's a growl and a bowl and a mighty uproar.
Never was heard such a tumult before!
The circles about Wall Street run down,
And they curse O'Mahony up and down.
They curse him living, they curse him dead;
They curse him at home, they curse him in bed,
From the sole of his foot to the crown of his head;
They curse him in speech, and, where spoken words fail,
They curse him by telegraph, curse him by mail:
They curse him behind his back, curse to his face;
And when he endeavors to shift the disgrace
To Killian's mismanagement (though 'tis unfair of them),
Doubling their fury, they curse at the pair of 'em.
Donnybrook Fair on a magnified scale
Would be a mere trifle—a spat to a whale—
Compared with the strife that is ev'rywhere rife,
The abuse and recrimination.
Pat Killian calls Kettle O'Mahony black,
And O'Mahony flings a "tu quoque" back,
And the Fenian masses, who've quite a knack
In the art of vituperation,

* From Blaghastiche instant I ra far am
That "sending" and "sent" are the "correct" form for Shrdlu.
Of using it find he's
Where classical authorities spendeer
To smooth acsperitie (the measure that we're in)
If His Muse, like mine, have become hard of fein.

Rave and revile in a furious style;
While to add to the tribulation,
Stephens, the Brotherhood's recognized chief,
To whom the culprits have looked for relief,
Only brings them to further grief
By fresh denunciation:
He says they've been false to "the men in the gap;"
Finds "weakness" and "crime" in the recent mishap,
And lets O'Mahony understand
That the only course worthy of Ireland's approval
Is to put in writing "out of hand"
His own resignation and Killian's removal.

Roberts and Sweeny are blithe and gay
When they hear that their rivals are out of the way;
And they marshal retainers in goodly array
And lift Erin proudly once all hate for the fray:
"To death or to victory! Forward in order!
To frighten the Blue Noses over the border!"

Sing, Muse of Battles! in tones loud and cheery,
The names of valor performed at Fort Erie!
How, led by O'Neill, the great Fenian host
Disperses a sentinel guarding the post;
How the Stars-and-Stripes banner is dragged to the ground;
How the hen-roosts are captured for miles around
Shout, Caldwell! exultant, in honor of Spear,
Thee hero whose soul is impervious to fear,
Who o'er Canada's fields with Hibernia's green
With his gallant army of seventeen!
But let your voices to a whisper sink
When you tell how the Fenians homeward slink.
Let the record be made in invisible ink
Of the bloodless defeat
Of the inglorious retreat
Of the Celts ere the Saxon oppressor they meet
Pass over in silence
That dreadful stampede,
And the peace-making vilence
Of General Meade.
How the Fenians' fierce fury coolly repressed;
How Sweeny, caught napping, is put in arrest;
How the carpet knight, Roberts, who scorns bond or tie,
Is a self-sainted martyr in Ludlow Street jail;
How Stephens is more than suspected, they say,
Of being at "the head centre's" play:
These things, O Muse! are unfitting your last strophe:
Leave to Grand Jurors the final catastrophe.
Pegasus halts at the sound of woe,
And in spite of our urging no further will go.
Be the Irish Republic consigned to the courts,
And its archives preserved in police reports.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

"Curse stalks abroad in the land." Modern sex envy for conventional propriety, under various pretexts of fashion, of a single individual, but a new fashion, if we may so speak, seems to prevail. While families are slaughtered in all parts of Europe, and unopposed horror follows each other in fearfully quick succession. But among all the awful records which have crowded the newspapers, none has sent such an indignant thrill of horror through the veins as the recent report that a Presbyterian clergyman, in our own State, had whipped his son, not three years old, so severely, because he would not wear his pinafore, that the child died after a few hours afterwards. Furthermore, the minister—much religion has such a minister!—was now heavy weighted by his grief, was indeed little more than a baby, using a shingle for the purpose!

This is more shocking than the murder of the Innocents by Herod of old. No circumstances can make such an act otherwise than in the highest degree atrocious! To force a child, by punishment, to "keep his pinafore aware of Sunday ajee. It is stated that several of the child's fingers were broken, also, in consequence. The father tied the hands behind before placing it in the coffin. While physicians were making the post-mortem examination, the infuriated monster sat by, coolly watching the proceedings. It is said that he justifies his horrid deed, thinking it his duty to punish the child while still alive "to save his soul." And this poor little victim of a father's wrath, had, according to report, been in every way a child of unusual promise, as to the heart, does not appear to have objected to the punishment.

There are many fathers and mothers—unworthy the name of parents—who are habitually cruel to their children. It is not often, we are thankful, that extreme cases occur among the civilized nations. But, wherever they do occur, whoever they are who do not have enough to treat children humanely, they should be visited by some public society analogous to that for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

A few years ago it was reported that a little girl of five years old was "kept in" by a teacher in one of our city schools for a whole afternoon, until she was so exhausted that she fell into a prolonged fainting fit, which left her deaf. We believe that the perpetrator was afterwards made to establish the fact that the little creature had not been shamming, but thoroughly. Very little doubt. And that would have been a good reason why she should have been tenderly dealt with, instead of being "kept in" for study. Helpless children are often more helpless from more thoughtlessness, carelessness, and neglect than most of us imagine.

The general health of the city, notwithstanding the heat, has been remarkable. The very few cases of cholera here have been promptly reported, and attended to by the Board of Health. Almost without exception they resulted in the victims' intemperate habits, or extraordinary indulgence. There is good reason to believe that this disease, which has been so dreaded, will not prevail in our city, from the prompt and efficient measures taken by the Board of Health for keeping the city clean have served a good purpose. We suggest, however, that all be not yet accomplished. On the western side of the city, somewhere in the vicinity of Thirty-third Street, there are still to be found, in the boiling establishments, whose nauseous odors pollute the air. Some of these loot days scarcely a breath of air is stirring, and the atmosphere, until after we are exhausted that the fell into a prolonged fainting fit, which left her deaf. THE JUNE DREAM.

A GARDEN in the burning noon,
Green with the tender green of June,
Save where the trees their leaves unfold
Against the sky, less green than gold—
A garden full of flowers, as bright
As if their blooms were blooms of light!

There, while the restless shadows play
Upon the grass, one comes to-day
Musing and slow, but fair of face,
Gentle and winning as a Grace,
Rosy and beautiful to see,
And in the June of life is she.

Among the flowers and by the trees
She comes, yet free nor flower sees—
In vain the golden pansy blows,
Vainly the passion-hearted rose,
And—trembling in the grass-dew swells—
The campanula's purple bells.

Those in her fancies have no part:
She wanders dreaming in her heart,
And ever, while around her flow
A silken ripple as she goes,
The sound of winds and waves it takes
And helps the pictures that she makes.

Wide underneath the June-blue skye
She sees the breadths of ocean lie,
And with the opal's changeful tints
From blue to green alternate change,
While still the sunshine on it rests
Trembles and glows in its surest.

And on the far horizon—white
A sail is shining in the light,
And what she hears is not the breeze
That treads on in the shimmering trees,
It is the wind that fierce and strong
Harries that yielding ship along.

It cuts its way with creak and strain,
The sail is wet with spraying rain;
But o'er the side one seans the foam,
And dreams and ever dreams of home,
And of the heart that, madly press'd,
Still seems to throb against his breast.

Oh, brave young sailor! Eyes of blue
Like thine were never aught but true;
And truth dwells on those lips that kiss
Scarce with the salt sea-brine are wet,
And in that pen-ih-like cheek the flame
That burns can never burn with shame!

In all the fears that wring her heart
Doubt of thy truth can have no part—
She fears the flush of angry skies,
The winds that roar, the waves that rise,
Wreck, death, whatever ill may be,
But, no, she has no fear of thee.

A tender melancholy lies,
A shadow in her downcast eyes,
While by the trees and through the flowers
She thinks of the departed hours—
Regret her loving heart wear bear,
But anguish has no portion there.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH.

VICKSBURG

is called the "City of Hills," but it would be equally appropriate to name it the City of Flats. Built on one of the bluff formations of the Mississippi Valley, it presents a picturesque sight from the river and neighboring heights. The sketch is made from a hill once the site of a Spanish fort, and during the siege of Vicksburg a portion of the Confederate line of defenses. Prominent is the Court-house, still showing the marks of the peppering it got from the Yankees. Below the left facade is Jones house, formerly a Rebel, now the quarters of the Freedmen's Bureau. To the right is a flag-staff and a fort, the highest in the line, and where "Whistling Dick"—a gun well known to the Union army—had its eyrie. Another flag-staff, away to the left of the picture, shows the headquarters of the commander of the Department. A fine old warrior, General Woods. Negro-huts dot the middle distance, while to the right the river stretches off into the distance, showing a little of the opposite shore, where GRANT camped a large portion of his army and tried to cut a canal.

The trees and gardens of Vicksburg give it a delightful appearance. Choice flowers and shrubs flourish almost spontaneously, blossoming even through the winter. As it rained all the time I was there I can testify to the superior capabilities of the soil in the matter of mud. At other points the inhabitants say the dust is unbearable, which, indeed, is the case in all the Mississippi towns and cities. Deciduous culverts are there to carry off the water, but for all that it cuts ravines through the roads, and occasionally renders the streets impassable. One block from the Washington Hotel there was a gully cut through the street by the rain, ten or twelve feet deep. The Post-office and a number of stores and houses were flooded by leaky roofs without, however, disturbing the equanimity of the owners to any degree.

Vicksburg is governed about as badly as Memphis. The city government, like that of Memphis, is in the hands of foreigners, the police being among the worst specimens. All but one or two of the City Council are foreign-born, and so is the Mayor. The abuses of the New York city government all exist here, but upon a meaner and more ruffianly scale. Nothing is apparently too dirty or mean for these police; for instance, they are constantly arresting negroes on the plea of vagrancy, fining them, and letting them go; or, if they have no money, hiring them out till it is earned. Often, however, the colored man pays the fine and says no more about it. Good job, too, when you think of it—vagrants paying fines! This is a trick which I find the police and constables every where play upon the negroes. If they suspect they have money they take them up and let them off again (often without examination), for hard cash.

Of real beggars—negroes—I have seen none. There may be such; but all the beggars I have met were white. As slaves the negroes were too dear to have few wants, and wages being good, they find it easy to satisfy them. Ignorant and used to forced labor, it is hardly to be wondered at that they love to indulge their ease, although it would be better for the country and themselves if they would work more. The Bureau is doing all it can in this department to attach them to regular labor, and a number of planters have acknowledged to me that it was an advantage to them. As an instance of the appreciation for it of the intelligent men of the South—those who wish to see their country prosper again—I may mention the case of a planter above Vicksburg, where a previous officer of United States Volunteers has been engaged by the planters themselves, there being at present of the Bureau there, to remain to the end of the year, they agreeing to pay him three thousand dollars for his services, under the rule of the Freedmen's Bureau, being a practical recognition of its usefulness in keeping the contracting parties to their duties. It is true, however, that this is an exceptional case. The majority of the people are bitterly opposed to the institution, many still hoping to yet establish a harsher system, if not one of actual slavery, as soon as the troops shall be withdrawn and the States in full possession of their former rights. I have also seen ever prevail it will only cause much trouble in the future; and it does appear as if the Government was merging too hastily in the withdrawal of the troops. It would have been decidedly better to let them remain till a calmer and more settled feeling ruled the inhabitants of the South.

The black soldiers in Vicksburg do not enjoy altogether amicable relations with the white soldiers, and with the police it is worse. They hate, fear, and hate them. While I was in Vicksburg I saw several small encounters with the police, for which they were most to blame. One evening a policeman proposed to arrest a negro soldier for being too noisy outside the theatre. The negro claimed that he had no authority. The policeman then drew a pistol and ordered the soldier to march to the station-house, and on his refusing shot him through the neck, inflicting a probably mortal wound. The white soldiers, probably a little influenced by "firewater," occasionally undertake to push the colored volunteers off the side-walk. This frequently ends in a row, in which the negroes usually get the best of it. The people are much opposed to the possession of arms by the negro, but they have no fear, as at Memphis, that they will, if made desperate by persecution, use them.

There was nothing to stay in Vicksburg, a Masonic procession, several Union officers participating. A gentleman on the sidewalk audibly expressed his disgust that d——d Yankees should be permitted to join the procession.

Your artist was severely taken to task by the ladies for holding up the Southern ladies to ridicule in pictures. The only defense open to that luckless citizen was, that if all the Southern ladies had exercised that dignity to which they have laid claim there would have been less chance to exhibit them in any light compromising their pride and self-importance.

NATCHEZ.

Having already sketched Natchez under the Hill, to make sure of it before the Mississippi had carried it into its bosom, the next thing was to take the picture of the more aristocratic portion on the bluff. So numerous are the steps to ascend that it is difficult to see much of the buildings from any point. This view from the cupola of the Marine Hospital is probably the best.

The River is a prominent as well as necessary part of the picture, as in all views of cities upon its banks. Then there is the Court-House, its inclosed buildings, surrounded by a ditch and palisade; and in front of that a knoll covered with tents, occupied, I believe, by white soldiers. On the left the Catholic Church is most noticeable. The Market-house, the Episcopal and other churches, can also be made out by the initiated. Natchez-on-the Hill was always claimed to be a very aristocratic place—in fact, the most select upon the River. As far as my observation goes it is clean, healthy, and pleasant, and appears to be more orderly than towns higher up the river. There is no drunkenness, and the opening of stores and places of business upon Sunday—so you do not meet a flaunting saloon on every square with open to the street, as the custom is in so many places in Louisiana. The air of Sabbath stillness in the city of Natchez was very grateful after having been for months accustomed to the every day obtained in other places upon the river. A number of gaps exist in the streets of Natchez, where houses have been destroyed by fire, and many of it a ruined appearance—probably the effects of private incendiarism, as Natchez has not suffered from any battles being fought near it, although a gut bombarded once by the fleet, owing to the folly of some citizens who fired upon a boat which came ashore for ice. It is needless to state that the rapscallions who perpetrated that outrage were not property-owners, and if the inhabitants had been wise they would have given them up to the commander of the naval force. It was such tricks as this which brought destruction upon so many of the finest places along the river; although, if you ask a citizen of those parts why it happened, the answer is sure to be to the effect that it was all done in wantonness. The responsibility is mainly with those high-spirited young men who staid away from the army to indulge in a little safe shooting from behind the bushes. Of course it is not to be denied by an impartial witness that many cases occurred where no excuse existed for destruction.

Along the edge of the bluff—a fine cliff of about 150 feet in height—the city of Natchez has reserved a strip of land, broken and planted with trees—a delicious place for a walk at sundown in the fresh breeze, and affording a fine view of the river, stretching away to the right and left till it disappears in the bends.

The river has been so high here that, on the other side, the deer have been driven from their accustomed coverts to the levee, and in one place some twenty lay rotting where they had been shot in mere wantonness.

SUNDAY DUEL IN NEW ORLEANS.

The last Sunday your artist was in New Orleans he selected several scenes illustrative of the day, the last being a duel, to which he was hurried out at four o'clock in the morning. This was fought at the Half-way House, on the usual ground, such little settlements having by no means uncommon in the Crescent City, although but seldom reported for the news columns of the daily papers. This one was not mentioned in any way, although known to a good many folks before the day was out. The challenger was the husband of an actress at the French Opera-house. The provoking party, and married but three weeks—had already caused him to regard with jealousy a young actor named Hinton, who had been playing in the theatre. After the usual preparations the first shots were fired at fifteen paces, without results; the husband—who used his left hand, the right arm being disabled in some former duel—advanced a little, and another round followed with equally ungratifying (?) results. Infuriated husband approached still nearer, and at the third fire went down, shot through the leg. His opponent, clapping both hands on his head, fell insensible immediately, the ball having struck through the brain; it was, however, but the effect of his horror at, as he supposed, having killed his man—the latter meanwhile declaring that he would have another round. It was sufficiently dramatic; and experts declared the men to have acquitted themselves very creditably. So the event proved an excellent topic for breakfast, and was revived with fresh interest at intervals throughout the day; the jealous husband meanwhile nursing his teeth over his wounded leg and disappointed revenge—a beautiful instance of the utility of dueling!

A. R. W.

A SUNDAY A CENTURY AGO.

AN old brown leather-covered book, the leaves yellow, the writing scarcely legible, from time and decay: evidently a diary in MS. To the fire or to my private shelf? Which?

These were my reflections as I looked over the papers of my late uncle, the rector of a Somersetshire village.

I liked the look of the book and decided for the shelf; and I am glad I saved it, for I found in the crabbed characters a simple story, evidently written toward the close of the writer's life. This story I give as transcribe into a more modern style.

"He'll be fit for nothing," said my father; "an awkward booby who holds his arm in a bad cuts his food with his left hand."

So said my father, and, so, alas! I felt. I was awkward. I was left-hand; black-set, strong, but terribly clumsy. I could not make a collar, nor sew a pair of blinkers, nor stuff a saddle, nor do any thing that I ought to be able to do. My fingers seemed to have no mechanical feeling in them. I was awkward, and I knew it, and all knew it.

I was good-tempered; could write fairly, and read any thing; but I was awkward with my limbs; they seemed to have wills of their own; and yet I could dance as easily and lightly as any of my neighbors' sons.

"I don't know what he's fit for," said my father to the rector of the parish. "I've set him to carpentering, and he cut his right hand nearly off with an axe; then he went to the smith, and burned his hand till he was laid up for a month. It's all of no use; he spoils me more good leather in a week than his earnings pay for in a month. We have, as he, like other Christians, use his hands as the good God meant him to? There! Look at him now, cutting that back strap for the squire with his left hand."

I heard him; the knife slipped, and the long strip of leather was divided in a moment and utterly spoiled.

"There now! look at that. A piece out of the very middle of the skin, and his finger gashed into the bargain."

The rector endeavored to soothe my father's anger, while I bandaged my hand.

"You'd better let him come up for that vase, Mr. Walters; I should like a case to fit it, for it's very fragile, as all that old Italian glass is; and like it with the softest leather, please."

And so I went with the rector to bring back the vase, taking two dressed leathers to bring it in.

We reached the house, and I waited in the passage while he went to fetch it. He came back with it, and I was soon engrossed in the leathers. Alas! At that moment there came from the room, against the door of which I was standing, the sound of a voice singing. It was a female voice, although—a voice I hear now as I write these lines—so clear, so sweet, so pure, it was as if an angel had revealed itself to me.

I trembled, and forgot the precious burden in my hands; it dropped to the ground and was shattered to pieces.

How shall I describe the rector's rage? I fear he said something for which he would have blushed in his calmer moments, and she came out.

She who had the angel-voice—his niece—came out, and I saw her. I forgot the disaster, and stood speechlessly gazing at her face.

"You awkward scoundrel! look at your work. Thirty pounds! Fifty pounds! An invaluable treasure gone irreparably in a moment! Why don't you speak? Why did you drop it?"

"Drop it," I said, waking up. "Drop what?" And then it flashed upon me again, and I stammered out, "She sang!"

And if she did sing, was there any occasion to drop my beautiful vase, you doubly stupid block-head? There, go out of the house, do, before you do any further mischief, and tell your father to horsewhip you for a stupid dolt."

I said nothing, did nothing, but only looked at her face, and went shambling away, a stupid and altered being. There was a world where horse, collars and horse-shoes, tenons and mortices, right hands or left, existed not. That world I had seen, I had breathed its air and heard its voices.

My father heard of my misfortune, and laid the strap across my shoulders without hesitation, for in my young days boys were boys till eighteen or nineteen years old. I bore it patiently, uncomplainingly.

"What is he fit for?" every one would ask, and no one could answer, not even myself.

I wandered about the rectory in the summer evenings and heard her sing; I tried hard to get the old gardener to let me help him carry the water, dig pits, and when I succeeded, as I often did, I entered the rector's garden, that I was entering a paradise. Oh happy months when, after the horrible labor of the week was over, I used to follow the carriage and hear her sing! My old withered heart beats fuller and freer when the memory comes back to me now.

Alas! alas! my awkwardness again banished me. She met me one evening in the garden as I was coming along the path with my cart full of water, and spoke to me, and said,

"You're the boy that broke the vase, aren't you?"

I did not, could not reply; my strength forsook me. I dropped my cart on the ground, where it was upset and flooded away in a moment some seeds on which the rector set most especial store.

"How awkward to be sure!" she exclaimed. "And how angry uncle will be!"

I turned and fled, and from that time the rector gate was closed against me.

I led a miserably unhappy life for the next three years; I had only one consolation during the whole of that weary time. I saw her at church, and heard her sing there. I could hear nothing else when she sang, clear and distinct, above the confused, sound sensation that came from the voices of others, hers alone pure, sweet, and good. It was a blessed time. I would not miss a Sunday's service in church for all that night offer. There good words were expressed; as a mother knows the tones of her child's voice, to the minutest shade of difference, so I could tell when her heart was light and when sad.

One Sunday she sang as I had never yet heard her, not loudly, but so tenderly, so lovingly; I knew she changed home—she was to be wed; it thrilled in her voice; and at the evening service he was there. I saw him. A soldier, I knew, by his bearing, with proud, head, gray eyes and dark mane. I knew it. I detected a tremble and gratitude in the notes. I felt she was to suffer as I had suffered; not that I sang. I had no voice. A harsh guttural sound was all I could give utterance to. I could whistle like a bird, and often and often have I lain for hours in the shade of a tree and joined the concerts of the woods.

One day I was whistling, as was my wont, as I went through the village, when I felt a heavy hand on the shoulder by an old man, the cobbler of the next parish. I knew him from his coming to my father for leather occasionally.

"Sam, where did you learn that?"

"Learn what?"

"That tune."

"At church."

"You've a good ear, Sam, my boy."

"I've nothing else good, but I can whistle any thing."

"You can whistle me the Morning Hymn?"

I did so.

"Good; very good. Know any thing of music, Sam?"

"Nothing."

"Like to?"

"If I can all I have in the world to be able to play any thing. My soul's full of music. I can't sing a note, but I could play any thing if I were taught."

"So you shall, Sam, my boy. Come home with me. Carry these skins, and you shall begin at once."

I went home with him, and found that he was one of the players in the choir of his parish, his instrument being the violoncello. That was my first lesson, and from that time commenced a new life. Evening after evening, and sometimes during the day, I wandered over to his little shop, and while he sat, stitch, stitch, at the boots and shoes, I played over and over again all the music I could get from the choir.

"You've a beautiful fingering, Sam, my boy, beautiful, and though it does look a little awkward to see you take your bow with your left, it makes no difference to you. You ought to be a fine player, Sam."

I was enthusiastic, but I was poor. I wanted an instrument of my own, but I had no money, and I earned none—I could earn none. My parents thought, and perhaps rightly, that if they found me food and clothing I was well provided for, and so for some twelve months I used the old cobbler's instrument, improving daily. It was strange that the limbs and fingers, so rigid and stiff for every other impulse should, under the influence of sound, move with such precision, ease, and exactness.

"Sam, my boy," said the cobbler, one day, "you shall have an instrument, and your father shall buy it for you, or the whole parish shall cry shame upon him."

"But he don't know a word of this," I said.

"Never mind, Sam, my boy, he shall be glad to know of it;" and he told me his plans.

At certain times it was customary for the choirs of neighboring churches to help each other, and it was arranged that the choir of our parish should play and sing on the next Sunday morning at his parish church, and that he and his choir should come over to our parish for the evening service.

"And you, Sam," said he, "shall take my place in your own church; and, please God, you do as well there as you've done here, it will be the proudest day I shall know, Sam, my boy, and your father and mother will say so too."

How I practiced, morning, noon, and night, for the great day; how the old man darkly hinted at a prodigy that was to be forthcoming at the festival and then the day itself, with its events—all is as vivid before me as if it were but yesterday.

The evening came; and there, in the dusky-lit gallery I sat waiting, with my master beside me.

"Sam, my boy," said my master, "it's a great risk; it's getting very full. There's the squire and my lady just come in. Keep your eyes on your book and feel what you're playing, and think you're in the little shop; I've brought a bit of lavender to help you," and he put a piece of that black leather that has a peculiar acid scent in front of me. The scent of it revived me; the memory of the many hours I had spent there came back to me at once, and I felt as calm as if I were indeed there.

She came at last, and service began. Oh, that night! Shall I ever forget its pleasures?—the wondering looks of the florists and neighbors when they and found in me, the despised, awkward, left-handed saddler's apprentice, the prodigy of which they had heard rumors. Oh, it was glorious! The first few strokes of my bow gave me confidence, and I did well, and knew it, through the hymn, through the chants, and to the anthem before the sermon. That was to be the gem of the evening; it was Handel's then new anthem, "I know that my Redeemer lives!"

It began—harsh, inharmonious, out of tune—I know not why or how; but as it progressed it seemed upon all her and myself; one by one the instruments ceased and were silent; one by one the voices died away and were lost, and I was left alone, bowed together and driven on by an irresistible impulse, went through the anthem; one soul, one spirit, seemed to animate both, the whole congregation listened breathless as to an angel; and she, self-absorbed, and like one in a trance, sang, filling the whole church with a delicious sense of exultation, the like of which I have never known since.

It came to an end at last, and with the last triumphant note I fell forward on the desk in a swoon.

When I recovered I found myself at home in my own room, with the doctor, the doctor, and my parents there, and heard the doctor say,

"I told you he would, my dear Madam; I knew he would."

"Thank God!" murmured my mother. "My dear boy, how we have feared for you!"

What it was to have I was counted and made much of. "Genius!" and "Very clever!" and "delightful talent!" such were the expressions I now heard instead of "stupid!" "awkward!" and "unfit for any thing!"

My fortune was made a fine instrument; and I was the hero of the village for months.

It was some days after that Sunday that I ventured to ask about the rector's niece.

"My dear boy," said my mother; "the like was never heard. We saw you there and wondered what you were doing; but as soon as we saw you with the bow, we knew you must be the person there'd been so much talk about; and then, when the anthem was and we all left off singing, and they all left off playing, and only you and Miss Cecilia kept on, we were all in tears. I saw even the rector crying, poor girl, she seemed to feel it in a dream, and so did you; it was dreadful for me to see you with your eyes fixed on her, watching her so eagerly, and then to look at her, raised as she sat at the stained glass window as if she could see through it, miles and miles away into the sky. Oh, I'm sure, I never was! and then, when you fell down, I screamed, and your father ran up and carried you down and brought you home in Farmer Slade's four-wheel chaise."

After this I had an invitation to go up to the rectory, and there, in the long winter evenings, we used to sit and while I played she sang, with those happy times! when she loved me, but only as a dear friend; and I loved her as I never had loved before, and have again. I do not know the kind of love I had for her. I was but a little older than she was, but I felt as a father might feel to his daughter; a sweet tenderness and love that made me pitiful to her. I knew she loved a man unworthy of her, and I think, at times, she felt this herself, and knew I felt it.

I was perfectly free of the rector's house at last, and was used to find in our music a means of converse that our tongues could never have known. Ah, me—those days! Gone! Alas! they are gone.

She left us at last, and in a few years her motherless child came back in her place, and as I again sit in the old rectory parlor, years and years after my first visit, with her daughter beside me singing—but, alas! not with her mother's voice—all the old memories flood back upon me, and I feel a grateful, calm joy in the openly-shown respect and affection of the daughter of her whom I loved so silently, so tenderly, and so long.

I sit in the old seat in the church now and play; and, once in the year, the old anthem: but the voice is gone that it!—at the old church as with a glory on this day. And, as the sounds swell out, and the strings vibrate under my withered fingers, I am but waiting to hear her under the old yew-tree outside, and it may be, nearer to her still in the longed-for future.

UNFORGOTTEN.

SWEET Lady mine, the faded rose
Is often dearer than the flower
Fresh-gathered; so each memory grows
More precious since the parting hour:
And all Love's untold pain can give
Of glowing tint and tender shade
Is with me, that your face may live
In colors that can never fade.

And still my fancy paints you near,
Though all the room is lone and bare;
And oft at eventide I hear
Your phantom footstep on the stair;
A presence in the gathering gloom
Thrills all my pulses with delight,
And seems to glorify the room
With loveliness denied my sight.

And little reck I that long miles
Of smiling lands and foamy sea
Divide us; love at distance smiles,
And holds the willing winds in fee;
And every wind that racks the clouds,
Or gently moulds them in the blue,
Bears love-thoughts in numberless crowds,
Or softly wafts a prayer for you.

CHAPTER VIII.

Next day Lily and Primrose had gone out to the work-day world, and Clover was left to see the new tools looked by daylight, when Clover came running out, her face beaming with pleasure.

"Now just listen, please, but hush! Don't say a word, mamma says she thinks white is quite as pretty."

"I don't," said Lily. "What a nice note! Oh, isn't it charming!"

"Yes," said Clover; "and I think we can learn so much about flowers, because they have so many. Is Maria Kelly white or red?—I've forgotten."

"Chestnut Hill," said Lily, studying the note.

"Yes, we've never been that way," said Clover, "because the water-cart's so bad; and the family were away too. But mamma says it's a mile or two beyond Hicory Corner, so it's at least six or eight from here. Mamma don't know exactly."

"The farther the better," said Lily. "I'd like to get ever so far from home, for once."

"Why, Lily," said astonished Primrose. "And from mamma, and all?"

"Just for once," Lily repeated. "To see how it feels. Clover, I do think we're the happiest children! There were the tools last night—our dear tools, and here it's Saturday, and there may something will come to-morrow—our seeds, maybe."

"Oh no! they won't be here for several days," said Clover.

"I would not expect them for at least a week more," said Sam, who came in just then.

"But why?" said Lily.

"It takes so long for letters to go and for answers to come. And then a seedsman must serve his customers in proper order, and there may have been fifty names down in his book before yours got there, and then there would be fifty packages of seed to send off before yours. I dare say there have been fifty names down in his book before yours got there, and then there would be fifty packages of seed to send off before yours. I dare say—"

"Fifty people wanting seeds!" said little Primrose, with whom the world seemed to be all turning on a question of seeds.

"Ay, and a good many fifties!" said Sam, laughing. "Never mind, Prim, the fifty-first parcel will come to us."

"But, Sam," said Lily, "do you know we're going away to-morrow?"

"I have heard. Here—that box is about finished."

"And, Sam," said little Primrose, eagerly, "if we go we go beyond Hicory Corner, don't you think we might stop just one minute for the watering-pots?"

"Doubtless," replied Sam, "or three minutes. Perhaps a mantle for each watering-pot will not be too much. Never, young ladies, I beg you to part toward your green-houses, or window-boxes, or whatever you choose to call them, you must do the cost."

"You haven't told us what to do yet," said Lily.

"These boxes," replied Sam, "have, you perceive, a sloping top made of glass. You will also observe that the panes of glass are movable. Now when the boxes are in use the sloping roof must be turned toward the sun, so as to get the light and heat. But if the heat becomes too great—in a very warm day, for instance—then a pane of glass can be lifted, so—or taken quite off, to give the plants fresh air."

"What a beautiful contrivance!" said Clover.

"But the seeds aren't to be planted just in the box, are they?" said Primrose.

"Ah!" said Sam, "that brings us to another branch of the subject. But you must come to another work-shop for that."

So Sam laid down his hammer and led the way to another little outhouse, which seemed to be for the express purpose of holding every thing that would not go any where else. Odds and ends of all sorts were piled up and strewed about; and among the rest there stood a great box of earth and a quantity of flower-pots.

"Learned people do say," observed Sam, "that beginners would never plant their seeds in pots; but when nothing else can be had beginners must do as best they can."

"What should they use?" said Lily.

"Shallow boxes or pans. But, as I said, these must do. Here are the pots all ready, you see, and here's the beginning of the earth you want to fill them."

"Why, Sam," said Primrose, "I should think that was earth enough to fill a thousand flowerpots!"

"Yes, and more too," said Lily. "Pretty large beginning, I should think."

"But the thing is," said Sam, "that there isn't earth here to fill one flower-pot—not of the right kind. This is only sand and old sifted manure. It wants earth, common earth out of the garden, and some vegetable mould out of the woods; and we can only get either till the ground thaws a little, so it's just as well the seeds are not here."

"Sam, what is vegetable mould?" said Clover.

"The earth that's decayed leaves and wood."

"What's the use of mixing so many things together?" said Lily. "It's a great deal of trouble."

"It will be some to me, for I must get the mould from the woods myself," said Sam; "but the use is, that plants are supplied with the richest soil, others thrive half so well upon bread alone, or one kind of meat, as you do upon meat and bread and vegetables and fruit."

"Why, do plants eat?" said little Primrose.

"Of course they do; and they're almost as different in their tastes of apples are. Some are called "gross feeders," because they eat every thing before them—" exhaust the soil," as gardeners say; some can eat very well after other plants, because they want so much; or perhaps those other plants are "gross feeders," and starve them out. Some must be constantly supplied with the richest soil, others can pick up a living any where and any how. Some must have sand, some demand clay; some are always thirsty, and love like dry weather; and some do nothing but drink for one part of the year, and then never care to drink a drop all the rest."

"Oh, Sam!" said Clover, "it's perfectly delightful!"

"Then I guess I'll have to be careful with my little watering-pot," said Primrose. "Because I might water something that would not like it at all."

"Not many garden plants are so very particular," said Sam. "You'll see some of the notional ones to-day, I dare say, to-morrow to-morrow."

"Sam," said Clover, "at all these notions, as you call them, derived—I mean do they all come equal as the days of the week, and half-hardy nature, from the native country of the plant?"

"I think," said Sam, "that it's the nature of the plant that has the native country, or its native soil. Plants are made to to just so notional, I think, so that some one of them may grow on every sort of earth—in every climate, wet or dry, rich or poor. We put all sorts together in a garden, and they live on together, and that's rather a fashion; but to itself, each wild plant chooses its home. The seeds of water-plants will not open on the dry land, nor those of land-plants in the wet; and in the woods, where all places look so much alike to us, you will find one sort of flower blooming here and another there; and some in the second patch of ground kind within half a mile. Now there are, for instance, two kinds of squirrel-cups—one variety chooses to grow on the sunny side of hills and ridges, and the other almost always on the south side.

"Oh, what are squirrel-cups?" said Primrose.

"Dear little flowers—yellow flowers—you'll see by-and-by, when we've had a little mild weather. I saw a pretty thing of that sort—talking of notions," Sam went on—"when I was at Thornblake. There was a beautiful wild flower in the woods there, called the chimaphila; but it never grew any where but in the woods under the pine-trees, and would not live in the garden at all. Well, three or four years before, Mr. Austin had set out a young silver pine on his lawn, and by the time it was growing well, and now a little bunch of chimaphilas had suddenly come to establish themselves at the foot of this one tree, where there on the lawn all by itself. There they grew and bloomed in its shade."

"But, Sam," said Lily, "how did they come?" said Primrose, very much interested.

"Ah! that I can't tell you," said Sam. "Some seed may have been dropped there, or have lodged in the tree roots when it was dug up. But I suppose you might have planted bushels of chimaphila and under any other tree on the lawn, and not one would have come up."

"Sam," said Lily, suddenly, "don't you think your note-paper is a great deal more elegant than white?"

"Pink note-paper!" ejaculated Sam; and by way of answer, he gave a little convulsive shrug to his shoulder, and rushed out of the old shed and along the gravelwalks at full speed to the house. Lily and Clover followed, laughing, out of breath.

"Now, Sam! what did that mean?" said Lily, when he had set Primrose down in the sitting-room at her mother's side.

"It means—Good-afternoon!" said her brother, walking off demurely.

"Well, and Lily," I guess it's just as good he's gone, for you know, Clover, we've got to lay out our things for to-morrow. Mamma, what frocks shall we wear?"

"Mamma," said little Primrose, "if we go through Hicory Corner, may we go just a little earlier, so as to get the watering-pots? Three minutes would do, Sam said."

"Did Sam say that?" asked Mrs. May, smiling; "I think he was greatly mistaken."

"No, mamma, not just that—Prim didn't understand," said Clover. "Sam said three minutes would not be too much. And eh, mamma, he's been telling us such beautiful things! where plants grow, and all that—the differences between them. Mamma, do you think King David knew a great deal about flowers?"

"His son Solomon did," said Mrs. May. "I don't know how it was with David. Why, love?"

"I thought he might," said Clover, blushing and hesitating a little. "You know, mamma, what he wrote: 'O Lord, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all.' And Sam was telling us such wonderful things. No one could have arranged it all but God."

"He hath made every thing beautiful in his time," answered her mother. "'He maketh grass to grow upon the mountains, and herbs for the food of man.' 'O Lord my God, thou art very great!'"

TO A YOUNG LADY, ON HEARING HER SING A FAVORITE SONG.

You "wish you were a bird?"
Free, dear, to be stirred
A glut of your airs and ags
Wouldn't that be a cage
And fed on canary seed?
A fine bird you'd make, indeed;
Shut up with your fellow,
Obliged to live in a tree,
Robbed of your very best,
With flies and worms to eat!
You were a bird, my sweet,
Yoked up in a vastly neat,
Tidy basket to hang on strings,
Where you'd never get wings.
And in all sorts of weathers,
And even a change of feathers.
With what you manage to speak,
With such very ridiculous beak,
To do out without picking your neck,
Nothing up and down to fix a peck?
Ah no! for nothing to do
Round about in the sky,
Nothing to sail up and fly!
To drive off being absurd,
Nothing to be a bird.

The very polite Lord Chesterfield happened to find himself in company with the Countess of Huntingdon and Mrs. Pendarves, a female blue-stocking, with her cousin, who endeavored to introduce the subject of various religions, and declared himself to be a Deist. Lord Chesterfield replied, which gave his Lordship the much wished-for chance of showing off his learning, a most profound bow, and retired with these characteristic words: "I never put you in my own company when I can help it, and only half-hardy nature, from the native country of the plant?"

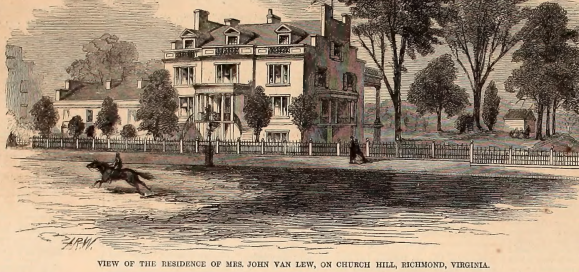
RESIDENCE OF MRS. VAN LEW.

AMONG the many points of interest to be shown to every Union man visiting Richmond there is, perhaps, no one more deserving of notice than the one selected for illustration on this page. The late war called forth many heroic characters, whose deeds have been proclaimed through the civilized world; but there are many whose works, although unobtrusive, and hitherto unheralded, have been such as to do honor to the American name—indeed, to the human race; and of that noble band we know of none more deserving of a nation's gratitude and applause than the estimable lady and her daughter who form the subject of these remarks. As long as a FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE or a GRACE DARLING are remembered with love and respect by all possessing a human heart the names of MRS. VAN LEW and her daughter will be treasured.



Every Union soldier who has ever pined in the prisons of the Libby or Belle Isle will remember well and bless the very sight of these names; but for the benefit of the general reader it may be well to state who and what they are.

MRS. VAN LEW, now an aged lady, is the widow of Mr. JOHN VAN LEW, a wealthy hardware merchant of Richmond, who died, much respected and lamented, in September, 1843, after a very long residence in that city. The estimation in which he was held in that community can best be gleaned from the following obituary notice, clipped from one of the leading Richmond papers of that day:

"He sunk to rest lamented by a large circle of friends, and will long be remembered alike for his useful and well-directed energies as a citizen, and for the goodness and charities of his heart. His good deeds had a reward here, but 'in the rising blossom promise more.'"

MRS. VAN LEW and her family, consisting of a son and a daughter, succeeded to large property by the energy and enterprise of her deceased husband. She is the descendant of an old Huguenot family, and is understood to have representatives, on both father's and mother's side, in the old Revolutionary War. She was always one of those who held the most intense—indeed, almost romantic—attachment to the Union of these States; and the principles she ever entertained toward her country have been profitably instilled into her no less zealous and enthusiastic daughter.

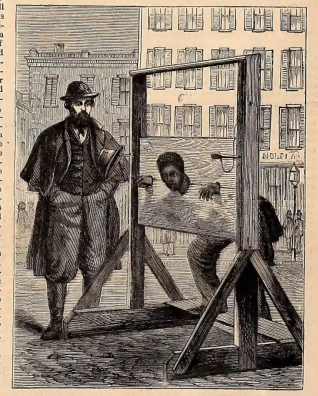
The situation of two ladies so situated during the war, and among a whole community entertaining opinions well known to be perfectly hostile to their own, is such as few in the North can even imagine. The few prominent Southern men which the war revealed of the stripe of ANDREW JOHNSON of Tennessee, PETIGRU of South Carolina, JOHN MISON

VIEW OF THE RESIDENCE OF MRS. JOHN VAN LEW, ON CHURCH HILL, RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

BOTTS of Virginia, TALLIAFERRO of Louisiana, CHARLES ANDERSON (late Governor of Ohio), and A. J. HAMILTON, both of TEXAS, are beacon-lights of high moral and physical courage that will go down to history as heroes. But what estimate shall be put upon the moral courage of WOMAN when subjected to similar dangers, trials, and social proscription? Perched on their quiet and ostracized homestead, on the summit of Church Hill, overlooking the turbulent sea of frenzied passions rolling beneath their feet, there were oftentimes when these brave ladies—for merely being known to be antagonistic to the destruction of their whole country, and administering to the necessities of those who had bled and suffered in its defense—were in imminent personal peril. They were the subjects of constant espionage, and the most slanderous abuse in the public papers. They were constantly receiving the most threatening anonymous letters; their friends of long years' standing deserted them as they would lepers; and "men" have been even known to shake the forefinger upbraidingly in their faces on the public street.

How far public feeling in Richmond ran against them during the war can best be seen by the one or two following extracts from the public papers, taken from a number of similar ones:

"SOUTHERN WOMEN WITH NORTHERN SYMPATHIES.—Two ladies, mother and daughter, living on Church Hill, have lately attracted public notice by their assiduous attentions to the Yankee prisoners confined in this city. . . . The largest human charity can find ample scope in kindness and attention to our own poor fellows who have been stricken down while battling for our country and our rights. The latter, we should have been just under charge of competent surgeons and provided with good nurses. This is more than they deserve and have any right to expect; and the course of these two females in providing them with delicacies, buying them books, stationery, and paper, can not but be regarded as an evidence of sympathy amounting to an indorsation of the cause and conduct of these Northern Vandals."



Another paper, after the grossest personal abuse of them, says:

"If such people do not wish to be exposed and dealt with as alien enemies to the country, they would do well to cut stick while they can do so with safety to their worthless carcasses."

How the writers of such paragraphs, if still living, must blush at a reperusal of them in calmer and more sober moments! To them, most assuredly, can not be applied the poet's magnificent boast that they never penned

"One word which, dying, they would wish to blot."

These ladies are now living in most peaceful retirement, and spending their means—painfully reduced through the war—as they have always done, in quiet acts of individual charity. Their home is a perfect picture of rural beauty—as lovely a spot as is to be seen about Richmond, prolific as it is in beautiful sites. From its spacious gardens, exquisitely terraced along the declivity on which it is perched, a sublime and spacious view of the winding James is embraced, extending all the way to Drury's Bluff, while the magnificent shade trees, cool alcoves, and rich lawns present, in summer, one of the most tempting and delicious resorts it is possible to conceive.

STEPHEN VENARD, THE NEVADA DETECTIVE.

"VENARD SENT A BALL CRASHING THROUGH HIS BRAIN."

AN AMATEUR DETECTIVE.

THE subject of this sketch, STEPHEN VENARD, was born at Lebanon, Warren County, Ohio, in 1834. He was once elected Marshal of Nevada City, California, and for several years past has been a policeman at that place, in which occupation he acquired an enviable reputation as a man of courage, nerve, and judgment in every thing pertaining to the ferreting out and capture of desperadoes, such as infest the mining localities of California. But it was on the fifteenth day of May last that VENARD succeeded in accomplishing one of the most daring exploits that have ever been recorded.

Nevada County, famous for the productiveness of its gold mines, has for years past been infested with a number of daring highwaymen, and scarcely a day passed but that the papers chronicled some robbery on travelers, and not unfrequently the stages plying between the mountain towns were stopped, and express treasure and passengers robbed of thousands of dollars. These "road agents," as they were called, collected more toll than the toll-keepers, and they made toll roads of free roads.

At four o'clock on the morning of May 15, as the San Juan stage was within five miles of Nevada, three men armed with revolvers appeared in front of the horses and ordered the driver to halt. The passengers, eight in all, were compelled to get out of the stage, searched for their arms, marched to one side of the road, and were guarded by two of the bandits who covered the party with their revolvers. WELLS, FARGO, & Co. had $6000 in treasure on board, which was in an iron safe, built in the coach under the driver's seat. This safe they attempted to break open with a sledge but failed. They then used powder, and after trying twice, succeeded in blowing the safe open. After taking out the treasure they ordered the passengers to get in and the driver to drive on. In thirty-two minutes from the time of starting the stage arrived at Nevada City, and the news of the robbery was made known. By six o'clock Sheriff GENTRY, VENARD, and four others started for the spot, which was on the down grade near Black's Bridge, on the South Yuba. The party divided in order to scour the country. VENARD, and a man named LEE, found the trail of the robbers, which seemed likely to lead to another road crossing the Yuba, about three miles below the road above-named. LEE went back to take their horses around to the other road, and give information to others of the party if he should see the robbers, and of the course they appeared to be taking. VENARD followed the trail alone till it struck the Yuba, near the mouth of Myers's Ravine. On examination he found that the robbers had not crossed the river or the ravine. The face of the country at this point was exceedingly rocky and precipitous and rapid progress was impossible. VENARD was impressed with the fact that he was in the vicinity of their retreat and proceeded cautiously. With his sixteen-shooter rifle (HENRY'S patent) in his hands cocked, he stepped a few feet above him on a rock. Huge rocks were above and around him, and smaller ones between. An opening or fissure in the latter led to the larger ones, and sitting at the base of the latter, and within 14 feet of him, he saw two of the robbers. Their eyes were upon him, their hands even grasping their revolvers. Not a second was to be lost, and to attempt to retreat was death. VENARD had no wish to retreat and no desire to die, and so he shot one of them through the heart. The second robber slipped into a cleft in the rock, while his hand and pistol showed over the top, pointing at VENARD. The latter had his trusty rifle at his shoulder, aimed at the very spot where he anticipated the robber's head would appear in order to take aim. The instant his head came partly above the rocks VENARD sent a ball crashing through his brain. And here was another wonderful instance of coolness.

VENARD was aware that there was still another close by, and for aught he knew might be concealed behind some rocks and might fire upon him at any moment. He was alone. None of his comrades were within a mile of him. The thought flashed into his mind that if he should retreat from his position the third robber (and for aught he knew there might be half a dozen left yet) might take the treasure and escape with it, in which case he might be charged with murdering two innocent men. Acting upon this thought he went to the spot where the men were shot and found the treasure—the best evidence of their guilt. Taking this and their revolvers he hastily covered them with some leaves and boughs. He then proceeded with cautious steps up a steep point on the other side of a torrent of water that was pouring down the ravine to discover, if possible, the remaining robber. About 100 yards above he saw him clambering up the almost inaccessible side of the mountain. He fired, and the man fell for an instant, and then continued on his way. Another shot and the robber stopped his course, stared at Hance for a moment, and then his head fell, and his body rolled down the hill about forty feet.

Shortly after this Sheriff GENTRY and his party arrived, the dead bodies were visited, and the bags of money brought to Nevada and delivered to WELLS, FARGO, & Co. before one o'clock on the same day the robbery was committed. During the afternoon a coroner's jury was summoned and went to the scene of death, accompanied by a large number of citizens. A more lonely, rugged, inaccessible spot could scarcely be conceived. The bodies were carried by hand with great difficulty for three-fourths of a mile, and then brought to town in a wagon. It is needless to add that the coroner's jury rendered a verdict of justifiable homicide, and exonerated Hance from all legal responsibility for the commission of the act. Immediately after the robbery was made public WELLS, FARGO, & Co. offered a reward of $8000 for the recovery of the treasure, which VENARD obtains. When we consider the importance of VENARD'S following alone on the trail of three desperate men, fully armed, and on the alert for the avengers of the law, that they knew were on their track, trusting to meet their den, miles from any human habitation, and by coolness and celerity of action saving his own life and killing the two lieutenants of the gang, all mid mountain jungle, we confess our admiration of such heroism. No romance could depict greater bravery.

The following closing notice of SETTLER VENARD we take from a copy of the Nevada Transcript, published immediately after the occurrence:

"It can not be denied that the feat of private VENARD'S is a splendid one, and never excelled in the State. It displays a coolness, courage, and skill of a most extraordinary character. It must live as an event in the history of our county, and be criminal history of the country. A rifle is robbed at half past four in the morning by three robbers of $8000. At seven before the daring villains be taken, kills them all at four shots, and restores the money to the owners at two o'clock of the same day. If life as it is not worthy of reward we know of no act that is. We hope, in addition to the reward offered by WELLS, FARGO & Co., that the Board of Supervisors will vote a handsome sum. It is true that those who fell by the rifle of the good of society should receive the reward of their merit."

VENARD has since received an appointment as officer on the staff of the Governor of Nevada.

STATUE OF COMMERCE, CENTRAL PARK.

MR. STEPHEN B. GUION has presented to the Central Park Commissioners a bronze STATUE OF COMMERCE, to be placed in Central Park as soon as the pedestal is finished. This statue cost $20,000 in gold; and from what we learn is a splendid affair. It was on exhibition in Paris after it was finished, and was highly commended as a work of art. It is now at the Central Park.

Mr. GUION is a native of this city, but is now one of the leading merchants in Liverpool, England—of the American house of GUION & CO. and a liberal part of his time this method of testifying his devotion to the place of his nativity.

NEGRO IN STOCKS.

THE illustration shows a mode of punishment common in Brazil. It is copied from a photograph taken in the streets of Apalachicola. The negro was thus punished for an assault upon a white man. The white man represented in the picture is the sheriff who is carrying out the sentence of the court, according to which the negro was to be kept in the pillory for one hour and ten minutes. Is this the way in which white people are punished for assault and battery in Florida, we wonder? If not, and there is a different class of penalties for black men, is it not proper that Congress, if necessary, should take measures to abrogate a distinction so manifestly unjust?

THE PASTOR.

SOME years ago the pulpit of St. Peter's, one of the principal German churches in St. Petersburg, was filled by Pastor B——t, who, like most of the preachers of that wealthy sect, had amassed a considerable fortune, and was much esteemed and beloved by his congregation. Not a day passed without numerous applications to him for assistance of various kinds, and none were sent away without a word of consolation or a more substantial gift.

One day, as he was completely indisposition to keep his room, a woman came and craved his interference. She had lately removed to St. Petersburg with her husband, who was a goldsmith, and who had succeeded in establishing himself so well that he earned an ample support for both of them; but he made her extremely unhappy by his persistent and outrageous ill-treatment, without the slightest provocation or retort on her part—all of which she had until now patiently endured.

The Pastor expressed his regret that indisposition prevented him from leaving the house.

"Bring your husband to me," said he.

"That will be no easy matter," returned the woman; "for if he suspect that a rebuke is waiting for him he will not come. No, Sir, you know nothing of it beforehand. But if I tell him that you wish to buy something from him, then he will not fail to wait upon your reverence."

"That is a lucky thought!" said the Pastor, "for I am about to purchase a complete tea-service of silver."

"And he has just finished a very beautiful one!" exclaimed the woman.

"Very well, then, tell him to bring it."

The next day the goldsmith came with his chest, accompanied by the woman.

The Pastor was secretly surprised to see her with him, but continued to meet him, saying: "Ah! the silver?"

"Yes, your reverence, I have brought the service as you desired."

"Very well," said the Pastor. "Be so good as to come with me into my study."

When they were alone the good clergyman began to speak urgently upon the duty of a husband, and dwelt with impressive eloquence upon the sacredness of the vows which married partners make before the altar to each other.

His listener seemed very much astonished, and several times attempted to interrupt his discourse, but the Pastor begged him to hear him to the end. "What excuse can you make for your conduct?" asked he, in conclusion. "What is the cause of it? You look so mild and so good-tempered, my friend. How comes it that you are such a bad husband?"

"But let me say just one word, your reverence, I en——"

"I know what you mean to say. You are usually as meek as a lamb, and only impetuous at certain times; but to go so far as to beat your wife!"

"You have mistaken the person, reverend Sir, I have never beaten my wife—"

"How! do you deny it?—for——"

"Because," continued the man, "I am not married!"

"Why, your wife is at this moment waiting in the next room!"

"Who? my wife? Your reverence is mistaken. I have no wife. The woman who has been my housekeeper; she came to me with a commission from you to bring a service of silver for your inspection."

The Pastor began to feel uneasy. "She must be a mad-woman," said he.

"Or a thief!" exclaimed the goldsmith.

They went hastily into the next room—but it was empty! The woman had disappeared with the chest of silver, and all the efforts of the police to recover it were in vain.

This incident is calculated to give rise to many weighty considerations. The trick was so well devised and executed that it would have succeeded with the most prudent and circumspect. The goldsmith left the silver in the outer room under the charge of the supposed housekeeper, at the express desire of the Pastor; while the latter confided it to the keeping of the so-called wife of the former. Had the matter been investigated, the question whose would have been the loss? Fortunately the good Pastor lost no time, and could say, with a good conscience, that he had done his duty. The grieved parishioners, who gained a precarious living by his labor; and as he, on the contrary, was rich enough to bear the injury, he bore it alone.

THE HUSKING.

THE room is lofty, large, and wide
Where we are met to husk the ears,
And heaped in rows on either side
The yellow ripened corn appears.
The stendy lamplight softly falls
On graceful forms and faces bright,
On clerks at ease 'neath home-spun cloth,
And eyes which do outshine the light.

The fairest maidens here are met
In all the neighboring country round,
No handsomer eyes of deepest jet,
Or brown or blue, can be found.
A lovelier girl than Mattie Price
Throughout the land you will not meet;
In stature form and face they're
In all the city's crowded street.

There's Maggie Gray with golden hair,
She never was without a bean;
Whit stronger proof that she is fair
Than all the lads around her see!
And Stella Vain with hair as dark
As are the shadows in her eyes,
And lips whose perfect shape seems formed
To utter Love's expressive sighs.

With giddy mirth the rafters ring,
The room resounds with shout and laugh;
Sometimes a merry song we sing,
The sparkling cider, too, we quaff,
And deftly strip the husks away
While speed the winged hours along,
We heed not time, so swiftly flies
The Autumn night with cheer and song.

One ear I find whose polished grains
Are turned red instead of gold;
The envied now of all the swains,
Aloft she looked-for prize I hold.
Then from each maid I claim the boon,
And last of all from Mattie Price;
I twine my arms about her waist,
And kiss her lips once, twice, and thrice.

Oh, Mattie Price, a time will come,
Although just now you may say "No,"
When I shall fold you to my heart,
Never again to let you go—
Never again as Mattie Price!
For you shall be my sweet comfort there:
Already blooms the orange flower
Which you shall twine within your hair.

THE ENGLISH EMBASSADOR.

NEW YORK is celebrated for its gangs of burglars, Paris for its pickpockets, St. Petersburg for its thieves, and London for all the three. St. Petersburg bears away the palm for comparative security from such depredations; but let it not be thought that this great city is deficient in brilliant examples of that talent which is displayed in the ingenious appropriation of other people's property.

An English embassador some years ago, doubted the existence of this popular class of operators, and made a singular wager with a Russian prince upon the subject. The latter bet him a large sum of money that he should be robbed of all the orders on his breast, in the day-time, in the open street, without his perceiving it; and all that was required from him was that he should walk for three days, between the hours of twelve and one, adorned with all his decorations.

The wager was made, and resolved to avoid all suspicions contact, the noble man commenced his promenade. Soon after setting out a laborer placed himself in the street, and appeared to need a roof, from which depended a slate tied to a string, as a sign that workmen were engaged upon it; and as my lord followed the gesture with his eye the man made an awkward attempt to approach him. The thought suddenly flashed upon the embassador that this was a disguised thief, and as he hastily retreated he read plainly the disappointment of detection in the others face. Some days after still laughing at this adventure, he was importuned by some beggar children, and just as he was giving them some coins a drunken man nearly fell upon him; but he was upon his guard and stepped quickly aside, upon which the inebriate staggered off, but soon recovered his natural and steady gait.

"Aha!" thought the Englishman; "so much for the second attempt!"

Some days further on he saw a large crowd of people, in the midst of whom the driver of a drosky was disputing with a gentleman about a trifling difference. While he was looking he forcing his way through the throng the latter, still venting his expletives upon the extortioner, attempted, as if by accident, to run against him, but he thrust the stranger aside with the exclamation, "Number three!" Just then the clock struck one, his ordeal for the day was over, and he reached home safely with all his orders.

In the evening he met the Prince at the English Club, who was still smilingly related the satisfying attempts which had been made upon him, he perceived that the former was evidently embarrassed and even vexed.

"Let us see what the morrow will bring forth!" said he, as he rose to leave the house.

"I may add," said the Prince, a difficult matter to take advantage of you," said his friend, with a serious air.

The next day he was followed and surrounded by all sorts of people. Some slunk behind him, others met him and then, suddenly turning, passed close to him. One suspicious-looking person offered him a fine handkerchief and asked politely if he had not lost it. A handsome, well-complexioned young man urgently pressed upon his notice some remarkable English publications, which he entreated him to purchase. The Englishman was passionately fond of rare books, and fell into an ecstasy over the beautiful specimens before him; but suddenly he bethought himself of his orders, and turned away with he was about to rush to his rescue he suddenly perceived a string (skillfully concealed behind the certain) which had been fixed to a little creature's foot, and he quickly avoided the crowd, who had gathered upon hearing the child's screams, and who would evidently have taken advantage of the opportunity.

"It was a very ingenious device!" said he, that evening, to the Prince; "and quite appropriate, for the boy was so strikingly like my own son in England that I came very near forgetting myself."

"I confess myself vanquished," said his adversary, in a low voice. "My accomplices have played their last trump. They have speculated in vain upon your well-known love for rare books, upon your paternal tenderness. They have failed, and I will pay you the bet at once."

"By no means!" answered the Englishman. "The terms have not yet been complied with. I can not consider the wager as regularly won until I have walked three days in the streets."

On the third day he commenced his last trial; but this time he met not one single auspicious countenance. He continued his walk quietly and uninjured for an hour, and had nearly reached his own residence, when a large ladder wagon, loaded with household furniture, came lumbering out of the "porte cochère" of his neighbor, a distinguished Polish Count. The wind was high, and a bolster was so poised on the top of the load some of its contents upon the pedestrian; upon which two liveried servants, who were standing in the doorway, immediately offered him a handful of the feathers from his dress.

"Is your master at home?" asked he.

"He is, Sir," answered they, as they proceeded with the cleansing process.

"Then I will go up."

As he entered he found the room filled with company, among others the Russian Prince, who advanced to meet him.

"What! without your orders!" exclaimed the latter, laughing.

The Englishman looked down, and rushed impetuously to a looking-glass.

"Damn it! I have lost. They are gone! But who, how, where? Not a soul has touched me except the Count's liveried servants!"

"I have no liveried servants!" said the Count. "Do not distress yourself, my lord! They were my worthy thieves."

"With all due deference for their talent," replied the Englishman, "I must say that you managed less adroitly in the beginning, for your friends of yesterday and the day before were mere bunglers!"

"How unjust!" exclaimed the Prince. "They had strict orders to be as awkward as possible, in order to throw you off your guard, my lord!"

"I have learned a lesson," said the Embassador. "Here's your money, and I promise you that henceforth I shall hold in respectful admiration the thieves of St. Petersburg!"

"BUT IS IT RIGHT, FATHER?"

IN a pleasant suburb on the Surrey side of London there lived a married couple, whose early life had been passed in a very busy district of the borough of Southwark. They were fruiterers, and had from year to year carried on their business without ever thinking of the claims of the Sabbath. One great trouble had clouded their lives. Out of a large family only one child had survived beyond the first two years, and little Annie, who had most probably have laid beside her little brothers and sisters in Norwood Cemetery, but that she had been taken into the care of Sunday-school aunt who lived there, and who not only had to rejoice over seeing the little child's character developed to her care grow into a blooming, active, happy child, but was successful in teaching her little charge some Divine truths, that, when received into the mind, fill it with heavenly light. Annie was, both in body and soul, a healthy child. The parents naturally pined after their darling, who was likely now to be their only treasure. Mr. Richards, the father, took a house a few miles from London, and, having established his wife there, brought his little girl, now seven years old, home to be the joy as well as treasure of the dwelling. On the very first Sunday after the family's return, she came down stairs dressed in her best, thinking that her father was going to take her with him, as her aunt had been to church. He kissed her kindly, and, to her surprise, was going away.

"Where are you going, father?" she said the child.

"Oh, I'm going to business, child."

"But it's Sunday, father."

"Yes—yes—I know that, my dear, but I'm obliged to go. I'm very sorry, but I must—now don't cry; I'll be home early, my child."

"But is it right, father?" the words kept ringing in his ears. He could not silence them. He felt that if he had told his child yes, he would have attained a life-long influence over her words, and a lesson. No, it was not right. Was he then to keep on doing wrong, when even his little child had, by her question, convicted him?

Was he?

For hours that day these thoughts troubled him in the town's. It was not right, father's PHEMIE KELLER. A Novel. By F. G. TRAFFORD, Author of "Maxwell Drewitt," "The Race for Wealth," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

The introduction is charming. Phemie Keller, a beautiful young girl, is a clear and well-drawn picture, which the reader will carry through with him to the end of the book. Her innocent voice created it never lost.—Saturday Press.

The same minute power of delineation which produced a portrait of George Guith that lives in the reader's memory has been expended upon Phemie Keller. From the day when we greet her singing in the Lake country, "blue-eyed and auburn-haired," to that when we leave her at the end, "still beautiful, and still a widow," she is to us a living presence, a breathing flesh and blood.—London Spectator.

Not only have we the different sides of the same character presented to us, but we have the different character of the same person at different times. Mr. Trafford has succeeded perfectly in doing what few novelists ever attempt—in making a character grow before us, unfold its successive changes as dissimilar and yet as naturally connected as bud, blossom, and fruit.—Athenæum. Mr. Trafford has such a command over our sympathies to recall them at will that he can afford to plait the worst as well as the best side of her favorite character. . . . The insidious dawn of the passion, her sudden consciousness of its existence through a pang of jealousy, her agony of shame and remorse, and her succeeding heroic struggle for self-conquest, made more desperate by the unmanly persistence of Basil Standon's overtures, do describe with extraordinary power, and make Phemie Keller one of the most perfectly-drawn characters of modern fiction.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Words of Vital Interest.

With the thousands who read columns of frivolous verbiage every day devote five minutes to the perusal of a few facts which concern them nearly? Our text is Health, and we will set our commentary into a short one. Weakness is indirectly the cause of all sickness; for if nature be strong enough to resist the morbid influences which produce illness, of course they are powerless. Seek strength, therefore. Invigorate and regulate the system. When the quicksilver ranges from 90 to 96 degrees in the shade, the most athletic are relaxed, and the weak are prostrated. It is at such a time that such an invigorator as HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS is urgently needed. What are the effects of this new Vegetable Tonic? Would that all who have known its benefits could condense their experience into this paragraph. They would tell the healthy, to protect health they must use this great safeguard against the debilitating influences. They would exhort the weak to discard all unsanctioned and impure stimulants and cling to this wholesome and unfailing tonic and alterative as the shipwrecked mariner would cling to a raft in a stormy sea. They would, of dyspeptic pangs without appetite restored, of shattered nerves restrung, of headaches cured, of disordered functions regulated, of hypochondria dissipated, of miasmatic diseases baffled, of fever and ague cured, of liver complaints arrested, of heat, privation, and toil defied, of hope reanimated, and cheerfulness restored. Such are the effects of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS.

Works of Nature.

In a state of health the intestinal canal may be compared to a river whose waters flow around the whole length through the channels nature or art has made, and improve their qualities: so long as it runs on smoothly the channels are kept pure and healthy; if the course of the river is stopped, the water in the canal is no longer pure, but soon becomes stagnant. There is but one law of circulation in nature. When there is a superabundance of humoral fluid in the intestinal tube, and the obstruction takes place, it flows back into the blood vessels, and inflames itself into the circulation.

To establish the healthy course of the river we must remove the obstructions which stop its free course, and those of its tributary streams. With the body, follow the same natural principle, and remove the obstructions of the bowels with Brandreth's Pills, which never injure, but are always efficient for the perfect cleansing of the system from feculences or disease. Remember, never suffer the bowels of blood to be taken from you. Evacuate the humors as often and as long as they are deranged, or as long as you are sick.

See that "BRANDRETH" is in white letters on the Government Stamp.

Amelia in "Vanity Fair," wearing out her days in sorrow over the death of a heartless coxcomb, while she rejects the homage and devotion of the true-hearted Dobbin? Mr. Lover's argumentative Irishman, in expatiating with his "Widow Machree," very cleverly represents to her the unbecomingness of her widow's cap, and the solitary plight of her single tea-cup, in contrast with the harmonious fellowship of tea-pot and tongs upon the hearth; and by such logic as this carries his suit to a successful issue.

The famous case of the Ephesian widow can scarcely be given as an example worthy of imitation without slight modifications! but the story may be apropos to our subject: Once upon a time a worthy lady at Ephesus had the misfortune to lose her husband—as good a husband that nothing could console her for his loss. Every day she went to the vault where his remains were deposited, there to strew his coffin with flowers, and to pour out her sorrow in tears and lamentations. One day these sounds of woe attracted the notice of a soldier who had been placed near the gate of the vault to guard the dead body of a malefactor. Lured by curiosity from his post, the night that next the watch passed he espied a female in the midst of feelings. To ask the cause of so much grief, to proffer his manly sympathy, was the impulse of a moment; to find that sympathy accepted took a little more time. Finally, however, it was not rejected; and the time passed quickly by, until at length the recollection of his duty recalled the sentinel to his abandoned post. But what was his consternation to find that, in his absence, the body had been set by guard had been stolen away! Here was a catastrophe! The soldier's life would pay forfeit for his negligence. He returned to the widow and told her of the disaster. It was a trying emergency, but woman's wit was equal to it. "The corpse she had been crying over took the place of the malefactor's; and a living husband, in the person of her military comforter, was substituted for the husband she had lost.

What a widow has satisfied herself of the necessity and probable efficacy of the remedy we have been speaking of, it is needless to say how soon she proceeds in the matter. Mr. Tony Weller's apprehensiveness on the subject of "widders" is justified by observation and experience. There are numerous instances—which it would be invidious to particularize—where leading public and business men, who certainly could not be considered undesirable husbands, have offered the needed consolation in such a predicament. Attractively, too—though the theory may not apply to every case—the matter is intelligible enough. A man who is actively engaged in public life can not spare time for the protracted process of wooing which inexperienced young ladies consider indispensable. In such a case the experienced widow offers a safe resource. A certain amount of diplomatic caution is necessary, perhaps, but ordinarily the parties are ready to meet each other half-way. Sometimes the lady does not hesitate to make a small fraction of even that interval, and an understanding of the most cordial character is the speedy and satisfactory result.

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT
PIANO-FORTES

Have taken 25 First Premiums, gold and silver medals, at the Principal Fairs held in this country within the last ten years, and in addition thereto they were awarded a First Prize Medal at the Great International Exhibition in London, 1862, in competition with 209 Pianos from all parts of the World.

That the great superiority of these Instruments is now universally conceded is abundantly proved by the fact that Messrs. Steinway's "scales, improvements, and peculiarities of construction" have been copied by the great majority of the manufacturers of both hemispheres (AS CLOSELY AS COULD BE DONE WITHOUT INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT RIGHTS), and that their instruments are used by the most eminent pianists of Europe and America, who prefer them for their own public and private use whenever accessible.

STEINWAY & SONS' direct aerial attention to their Patent Agraffe Arrangement, which, having been practically tested in all their Grand and Square and Upright Pianos, and admitted to be one of the greatest improvements of modern times, will hereafter be introduced in every PIANO MANUFACTURED BY THEM, WITHOUT INCREASE OF COST to the purchaser, in order that ALL their patrons may reap its benefit.

STEINWAY & SONS' PIANOS are the only American instruments exported to Europe in large numbers, and used in European concert-rooms.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH.

COLUMBIA, SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE rapidity with which this place is being rebuilt certainly shows that there is still left in the South money and energy, with the men to remove, almost within ten years, all traces of the late struggle.

The sketch of Richardson Street, down which SHERMAN marched when he entered the city in February, 1865, is taken from a point near the ruins of the convent. A few months since one could see from this spot only the wreck which had been left by the great conflagration that took place on the night of the 17th February, 1865. Now, new buildings are going up with great rapidity. True, many of them are not so well storied as those destroyed, being roofed at one or two stories, as the owner's purse holds out.

Many of the freedmen who are laboring in this rebuilding find house rent so high that they construct for themselves, in some convenient corner, their little huts, using for their erection brick, sod, mud, and sticks, and for the roof large masses of tin, formerly the covering of some stately mansion. In these little huts large families live, all that are capable doing their portion of the labor which is to earn their scanty livelihood.—The sketch is taken near the ruins of the Court-house, in which locality there is a large number of squatters.

T. R. D.

SUNDAY IN NEW ORLEANS.

Military rule having been withdrawn from the city of New Orleans the people are once more enabled to exert their ancient rights and privileges. Among these the Sunday opening of all the markets, groceshops, places of amusement, billiard and gambling-rooms, takes a prominent place. General BUTLER, among other deeds which he enacted in that city, caused the Sabbath to be observed after Christian notions of the subject; and it is only just to the New Orleaners to say that they considered it a high-handed act, and one which they have pretty effectually reversed since.

Opposite the French Market is the Cathedral; an effort to hear the services there ended in failure, owing to the noise of a neighboring billiard saloon, and a canvas-covered show, with a big drum, to which was added the constant rattle of carriages.

After the passage of a German procession, bound out of town for a day's dancing and picnicking, it became matter of grave consideration whether the horse-races or the cockpit offered the greatest attractions for a sketch. The verdict being in favor of the latter, we were driven along Esplanade Street, and not far from BEAUREGARD'S mansion stopped at a place where, right upon the street, entrance-money was taken at a little ticket-office window before the spectator was admitted to the pit, where a fight between two game chickens was progressing fast and furious, the spectators around betting as furiously in English and French. Here full-blooded negroes and elegant mulattoes sat side by side with whites, and among the latter were Yankee merchants, Southern planters, professional gamblers, Mexicans, Cubans, Frenchmen, and Spaniards.

One of the unfortunate chickens being soon killed the business of matching and weighing others occupied a little time; which our party expended in visiting the cages where the stock of fighting cocks were kept; a special privilege, the proprietor himself accompanying us in the inspection.—These, as the reporters used to say of the army, "were all aching for a fight; fine healthy birds, with no immediate occupation other than crowing lustily. Two more fights and the sketch was finished: once in a while the attendants would pick up the bleeding roosters, sprinkle water from their lips upon them, and revive them for another round.

The afternoon is a season of comparative quiet till it is cool enough for a drive out on the Shell Road. As New Orleans during the hot weather usually has a fine breeze off the Gulf this is a very pleasant trip, and all who can raise a light wagon and a pacing horse take it; trotters are quite rare, and not at all fashionable.

For those who have not means for the above amusement there are horse cars to the Half-way House, and boats—towed by men or mules indifferently—to the lake. In the evening all the theatres are open.

The creoles—by which is usually understood the light-colored natives speaking the French language—occasionally give a theatrical entertainment at the French opera-house, where all the actors, and the greater part of the audience, have colored blood in their veins. These and the creole balls in the winter are considered quite "distingué" affairs, and it is openly said that you will find as much or more taste in dress, as rich jewels, and as good-breeding, as in the most aristocratic circles of New Orleans.

AMONG THE RUINS OF COLUMBIA, SOUTH CAROLINA.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

THE CATSKILL MOUNTAINS.

AMONG all the bold and romantic scenery for which our country is noted, there is none more attractive than that of the Catskill Mountains, which we illustrate on pages 456 and 457. The picturesque, wild loveliness of the falls, the ever-changing beauty of the vast landscape spread out before the preserving pedestrian on the highest peaks, the profusion and variety of foliage which covers the lofty mountains, the quiet charm of the placid lakes, are all prominent objects of interest well known to our summer pleasure-seekers, and their praises have often been made the subject of pen and brush.

Our picture shows many of the most frequently visited places, some of which will be familiar to our readers—the Kaaterskill and Haines Falls; Fawn's Leap in the Clove; the view from the North Mountain, showing the two Lakes and Mountain House in the distance; also, the view from Sunset Rock. Another view is given of the Laurel House, a hotel kept by Mr. Schutt; and on the road up the mountain we pass the Half-Way House and the Rip Van Winkle House. At these last-mentioned houses the weary steeds need no invitation to stop, but come to a halt of their own accord, and refresh themselves with some of the sparkling water which flows over the rocks into the little spring basins. Others are other stronger beverages to be had for the thirsty travelers also. For the last few miles the ascent is so abrupt as to make it necessary to lighten as much as possible the load of the panting horses, and those who can walk generally do so. A sudden turn of the road brings us in view of the Mountain House, kept by C. L. Beach, and a most welcome sight it is after the toilsome journey. Our picture shows us sunrise among the mountains, that wondrous effect, when the clouds all lie in the valley beneath you; Mr. Nast has faithfully represented the appearance of that soft, rolling, billowy sea, and one vainly expects to hear the roar of the waves; but there is not a sound, the most solemn stillness reigns over all.

THE RUINS OF COLUMBIA, SOUTH CAROLINA—RICHARDSON STREET, LOOKING TOWARD THE CAPITOL.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 21, 1866.

THE PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION.

THE most earnest advocates of the proposed Philadelphia Convention announce that it is to form a new party. They assert that the Republican party was purely a sectional, and not the Union party, a war party. It is now the country, they say, in their judgment, to assemble delegates from every State and Territory, and lay down a common national platform. This is all well. This seems very simple. But declarations of intentions have always a most unless tone. The late rebel leaders, Davis, Toombs, and their allies, always insisted upon being called "National Union Democrats," and while their mouths rang with patriotic vociferation they were plotting disunion. It is necessary, therefore, to look at the basis on which the Convention likely to represent the true and saving union sentiment of the country? Will it be composed of those who have been proved by experience to be the most faithful, intelligent, and consistent friends of the Union? If so, every honest man will rejoice. But it is not enough to say that it will be so if such men choose to send delegates. The question is, whether the terms and circumstances of the call, and the manner in which it has been received by the country, show that it is intended and likely to include such representatives.

The first significant fact, then, is, that the call is issued by the three Democratic members of a separate Conference from the Union majority in Congress, by the Assistant-Postmaster-General and two or three gentlemen who approve that separation, and by two Senators who have uniformly opposed the action of the Union party, and who supported the Chicago policy of surrender to the effort to destroy the Union. The second fact is, that it is regarded in the country by the whole body of what are known, for good reasons, as the Copperhead members of Congress, excepting Senators Saulsbury and Riddle of Delaware, and Representative Harris of Maryland, and the members from New York city. The third fact is, that it is not approved by the Union members of Congress in either House, nor by the conspicuous and representative Union journals of the country.

The Convention, therefore, will be composed of three classes; first, those whom, not for offense but for distinction, we may call Mr. Thurlow Weed's party; second, the Democratic party of the North; and, third, the Democratic exrebels of the South. It will not represent such Union men as Senator Fessenden and ex-Governor Andrew in New England; Ward Hunt and Charlie J. Folger in New York; Senator Sherman and Chief Justice Chase in Ohio; Senators Logan and Senator Yates in the Northwest; Governor Fletcher and Senator Brown in Missouri; Horace Maynard in Tennessee; Judge Bond in Maryland; Ambrose Spencer and the original Unionists in Georgia; Andrew J. Hamilton and the voters against Throckmorton in Texas. The question is, therefore plain, Is a Convention which, by the nature of its call, excludes such men and those who sympathize with them, a representative National Union Convention? If the three classes that we have first named, the party of Mr. Weed and the old Democratic party, compose a more truly Union party than that which is now known as such?

We say that they are excluded by the call and by its general interpretation. The call is issued in intentional disregard of the equal rights of the loyal Union colored population of the Southern States, whom it proposes to abandon to those who were lately in rebellion. It does this under profession of regard for State rights, and in defiance of the truth, now terribly demonstrated, that absolute equality of individual rights before the law is vitally essential to the harmony of the national Union. Governor, Mr. Seward, who favors the Convention, in his letter to Tammany Hall, speaks with perilous and reckless rhetoric of "sovereign States." Thus the Convention proposes to prefer the rights of States to the rights of citizens of the United States; or to leave the protection of the latter solely to the States, when our experience has proved that that course is nationally disastrous. Nor can the Convention point us to the Civil Rights bill, for the callers of the Convention all opposed it and supported the veto.

Composed of such representatives and holding such views, who are likely to attend the Convention? Will it be Mr. Thurlow Weed and his friends, or the allied Democrats from the North and South? The question may excite a smile, but it deserves a serious answer. But if the Democrats control it, can the Convention have any other result than a reorganization of the Democratic party? And is such the purpose of the organizers and the co-operation of Mr. Weed and his friends that party should return to power, is there any reason to suppose that the old policy of pacification with its Southern wing would be changed? Clearly not, because since the beginning of the war the only hope of that party has been the return of its Southern members, and to cement the alliance it must yield to the demands of those members. In the North the Democratic party is virtually dead as a governing force. It is, indeed, a large vote. It disputes three or four States; but it is generally defeated in them, and always in the others. The reason is, that in the Democratic party is merely a resentment reaction and protest against progress and reform, and as the public opinion of the Northern States is educated and intelligent it is constantly distrusted and rejects it. Hence, also, the steady and uniform opposition of the Democratic party to the elevation and education of the colored population at the South. The Democratic party is the outpost against the "Democracy." To educate the whole population of the South Carolinas and Georgia and Mississippi is amongst those Senators from the "Democracy" which held its last Conventions in Chicago, and which speaks now by the lips of Vallandigham, Pendleton, "Jack" Morrissey, Augustus Schell, Garrett Davis, the Tammany orators, and the members of Congress who approve the Philadelphia call. That Democracy, Tammany Hall itself, whatever it may have been before by the ignorant vote.

It was the slums of the city of New York that elected Horatio Seymour Governor in 1862, and Fernando C. Wood local majority in 1864. Abolish the slums in the whole country, and you abolish the Democratic party.

It is a very useless folly to suppose that the spirit which has been so long dominant in our politics is destroyed. It has been routed by argument and the ballot in one part of the country, but it is the spirit of slavery, and having been defeated, will now betake itself there also to argument and the ballot; and it remains for the intelligence and patriotism and moral sense and faith of the country to accept the battle in this form also, and complete the victory. The Democratic party could not save slavery nor secure rebellion, but it was still strong enough for ignorance and unequal rights. It will not change its name, and it can not change its nature. In a deference to the Democratic party at Philadelphia it may call itself Union Democratic, or Democratic National; but it will still be the Democratic party. The "Last Rose of Summer" is added to the leaves of "Auld Lang Syne" played slowly. The party may not make Mr. Ben Wood or his virtuous brother President of the Philadelphia Convention, and may nominate Mayor Hoffman or Senator Morgan for Governor of New York. But it is still the organized reaction against the development of the Union party; second, the Democratic party of the North; and, third, the Democratic exrebels of the South. It will not represent such Union men as Senator Fessenden and ex-Governor Andrew in New England; Ward Hunt and Charlie J. Folger in New York; Senator Sherman and Chief Justice Chase in Ohio; Senators Logan and Senator Yates in the Northwest; Governor Fletcher and Senator Brown in Missouri; Horace Maynard in Tennessee; Judge Bond in Maryland; Ambrose Spencer and the original Unionists in Georgia; Andrew J. Hamilton and the voters against Throckmorton in Texas. The question is, therefore plain, Is a Convention which, by the nature of its call, excludes such men and those who sympathize with them, a representative National Union Convention? If the three classes that we have first named, the party of Mr. Weed and the old Democratic party, compose a more truly Union party than that which is now known as such?

We say that they are excluded by the call and by its general interpretation. The call is issued in intentional disregard of the equal rights of the loyal Union colored population of the Southern States, whom it proposes to abandon to those who were lately in rebellion. It does this under profession of regard for State rights, and in defiance of the truth, now terribly demonstrated, that absolute equality of individual rights before the law is vitally essential to the harmony of the national Union. Governor, Mr. Seward, who favors the Convention, in his letter to Tammany Hall, speaks with perilous and reckless rhetoric of "sovereign States."

The Democratic party is not dead, but it is dying. Its conduct in the present crisis is the most significant proof of that fact. It is not dead, because it is a party of principle, but it is dying because its principle is wrong. It is not dead, because it is a party of principle, but it is dying because its principle is wrong. It is not dead, because it is a party of principle, but it is dying because its principle is wrong false. This will come about; but it will take time. The New York Times, which has opposed free trade in times past, is now feeling its way to its support. A strong free-trade sentiment is developing at the West. Even Mr. WILSON of Massachusetts shrinks appalled from the enormity of the proposed tariff, and on behalf of the section disclaims all responsibility for the proposed increase in the duties. These signs indicate the future; but the end may yet be far off.

"An Original Republican" fears that the mistakes which are being made at Washington on this tariff question will enable the Democrats to regain their old ascendency in the Government, and will ruin the Union party forever. This is, no doubt, the calculation of many Democrats both in and out of Congress. And it is not altogether without a basis. For though many good Unionists, including leading members of Congress and leading newspapers of the party, have denounced and do denounce the proposed new tariff, yet still a majority of the House of Representatives, which is overwhelmingly Union, are voting it through, paragraph by paragraph, with disciplined acquiescence. For this action the Union party will be held responsible. It is the action of a majority of the recognized representatives of the party, and the protest of the minority will not exonerate the party as a whole from the responsibility. It is the height of folly to insist that the country will regard the Union party as committed to protection.

"A Manufacturer" inquires whether increased protection may not in reality damage the interests protected? Of course it may. All legislative interference with the freedom of trade and industry is hurtful to the objects of that interference. Trade and industry thrive best when left to themselves—nay, thrive only when left to themselves. The very boon of protection now claimed of Congress by the manufacturers will prove fatal to them, as it is, our manufactures are inferior to those of England, with the single exception of machinery, which is protected, and the few articles which we make for export, and which, of course, enjoy no protection. In countries beyond the Cape American cottons compete successfully with the Manchester article. Why? Because they are not protected, and our manufacturers know enough to make them as well and as cheaply as the English can. As regards those articles which are consumed at home, iron and steel goods, woolens, cottons, etc., our manufacturers have no such incentive to exertion. If they can make an article one half or one third the corresponding foreign article, the law of the land will compel the consumer to pay as much for it as for the other. Why need they to excel in such a case? The reason why our manufactures of cloths, hardware, etc., are now inferior to those of England is that our manufacturers have always been protected, and so has tended to dull the energy and quench the ambition of the makers, while foreigners, having nothing but their own merits to rely on, have sought unremittingly to command success by superior skill. If our people had had to struggle against as many obstacles as the English our goods would now have been superior to theirs. It is the old Eastern story over again. Two men were running a race, and each relying on himself alone, was straining every nerve. Presently came the Prince, recognizing one of the runners as a fellow-townsman, and wishing to "protect" him, ordered a rival to carry on his shoulders a bag of sand. Exulting in this advantage the Prince's townsman, made sure of victory, ceased to exert himself, and ran carelessly. His rival, on the contrary, stung by the injustice of his treatment, made superhuman efforts, and, overladen as he was, succeeded by matchless agility in winning the race. The story may serve when the accounts we read of a want of prosperity in some branches of industry which have been highly protected for a generation.

PORTLAND.

THERE were few more beautiful cities in the country than Portland, whose heights, covered with gardens and delightful houses, looking under noble trees and surrounded by green gardens, the spectator looked to the sea or landward on a fair valley." Its trade is prosperous; its society cultured; its public spirit and generosity famous; and very many of its ways are universally known and honored for conspicuous acts and gifts. The great calamity which has befallen the city has awakened the widest sympathy, and no American but must be honored by the full and prompt relief of that sympathy. Boston, the nearest large city, instantly sent a large sum of money. All the other large towns and cities simultaneously stretched out their hands. Providence told its mayor to ask the mayor of Portland to draw upon him at sight for ten thousand dollars; Brooklyn and Bangor did the same. Buffalo, Philadelphia, and New York did not delay. Within a week hundreds of thousands of dollars were ready for the relief of the sufferers; and not the least pleasant fact was, that many of the citizens of Portland most earnest in promoting measures for the succor of the unfortunate victims of the disaster was Mr. J. R. BROWN, the head of the Sugar Works, himself by far the greatest loser of all.

The destruction of the City Hall was peculiarly a misfortune. It was one of the finest, most spacious, and convenient public buildings in New England. Its great hall was not surpassed by any in the country in all the desirable qualities of such a room. But the spirit of the noble city will not quail, we are sure, even under so dire a blow. Its prosperity was not a chance. It was the result of great natural advantages admirably improved. Those advantages and that indomitable will remain, and from them a new city will arise. Esto perpetua!

Our artist, who is upon the spot, has sent us a series of striking and faithful views of the great fire, which will appear in our next issue.

HOW MUCH SHALL WE EXERCISE?

WHILE with the sedentary man the question is how much exercise is required for the maintenance of health, with the laborer it is how much can be borne without impairing the health. The danger of excess in labor is not sufficiently appreciated, and many a man does himself vital injury in this respect almost daily who does not suspect it.

Let us look at the rationale of the matter. In all muscular action there is some wear and tear, or destruction, of the muscular substance; but repair is continually made, and especially during the hours of rest. Now if the labor be too severe, or be so protracted that the muscles are not fully sufficiently long, there must be deficiency in the repair, and a very little lost in this way every day will at length amount to a great deficit. The laborer will even be thoroughly broken down long before old age comes on.

Especially is there liability to injury from excessive labor in childhood and youth, when, besides the daily repair, there is daily growth or enlargement to be provided for. The muscular system is governed by recognized in regard to children as it is in regard to young horses. So little is it realized, that it has been found necessary to prevent parents from putting the pressure of law to prevent parents from putting their children to work at too early an age, and from keeping them at work too constantly. The law says:

Much has been said of late years of the number of hours that men ought to labor. Undoubtedly ten hours are enough—and often even less than ten, either be overwork, or, what is perhaps more often the case, be done really by no more than he would do in the ten hours. Indeed, it is a question for laborers, as a whole, accomplish more now than when than he was for the same time. The object of the law should be to use it. This proviso is significant, for in the present condition of common education in the learning of words, and forms of statement, and rules and processes, that are not understood, while the study of the things, the realities, the facts, to which all these refer, is neglected—a neglected there is little encouragement for mental improvement in the laboring classes of society. We hope to see a great change in this respect, and in consequence an extensive individual adoption of the eighthour plan, so that time may be had for carrying out the mental cultivation proper to the new school-room. This is the effectual way of giving dignity to labor.

When labor is all of one kind much less can be done than when there is variety. There are two reasons for this. Sameness makes labor tedious, and none one bores himself. But, besides, the muscles acting in one way alone soon get tired out.

Turn over the digs, and hoes, and rakes, etc., will not get so tired as if they were all used in one thing alone, though the amount of work may be the same in either case. So the speaker who has variety in his speaking will not tire his audience so readily as the monotonous speaker, and will not be liable to debility and disease of the quarter.

With all that has been said about the necessity of exercise for persons whose occupations are sedentary, very few will be found to take enough of it. This is true even of those students who are quite earnest enough of it. This is true even of those students who are quite earnest enough of it. This is true even of those students who are quite earnest

HON. JAMES H. LANE.

A few days ago a brief telegram told us that JAMES H. LANE had been prostrated by a paralytic stroke while sojourning in a hotel in St. Louis. Next we learned that he had arrived at his home in Leavenworth, KANSAS. On the 2d inst. Representative CLARK, of Kansas, received a telegram at Washington, from Leavenworth, saying that Senator JAMES H. LANE had shot himself through the head on the Sunday night previous. Later in the day Mr. CLARK received another dispatch that Senator LANE died at 9 o'clock on Monday morning. Although a still later dispatch announced that Senator LANE was not yet dead, it gave no hope of the Senator's recovery.

The following dispatch from Leavenworth, July 2, gives the details of this melancholy event:

"Senator LANE had been acting strangely for several days, and a careful watch had been kept over him; but while riding last evening with his brother-in-law, Mr. M'CALL, and Captain ADAMS, brother of his son-in-law, got out of the wagon, which stopped at the government farm residence of Mr. M'CALL, and stepping to the rear drew a pistol and shot himself in the mouth, the ball passing out through the top of the skull. The deed was undoubtedly the result of a temporary mental derangement. This is the third member of the family who has destroyed himself. The occurrence created an unusual sadness here."

Mr. LANE was born in Indiana, and was in Congress from that State in 1853, 1854, and 1855. He went to Kansas and took a very active part in the excitements attending the settlement of that Territory. To recount his participation therein would be to rewrite almost the whole story of one of the most extraordinary periods in the history of the country. When the Territory became a State he was sent as a United States Senator for the term ending 1865. He was re-elected, and his term would have expired March 4, 1871. During the late civil war he was commissioned a Brigadier-General. He was a member of the Baltimore Convention of 1864. As a Senator, his committee labors have been chiefly in agricultural and Indian affairs, and during the present session he has been quiet to a noteworthy degree, taking the floor but seldom, and always voting with the STEVENS faction.

Senator LANE has lived for the last ten years in the midst of the most exciting events of our history. In these events he has taken a prominent part. Though not always wise in his political opinions, he has always been straightforward and honest in their expression. He leaves behind him many friends—men of his own mould, hardy, stern, and unyielding — in whose hearts his memory will long be cherished.

TAKING THE OATH.

THE subject of this beautiful statuette, by Mr. ROGERS, is so familiar to our readers as scarcely to need explanation. In the progress of our armies through the South supplies were freely given to such citizens as were willing to take the oath of allegiance to the United States. This work of art is one of the best of a large number of beautiful groups which have come from the hand of Mr. ROGERS.

THE NAVAL SCHOOL EXCURSION.

On the 26th of June the fleet of vessels selected for the three months' summer cruise of the Naval Academy pupils left Annapolis. These vessels are the old frigates Macedonian and Savannah, the side-wheel double-ender steamer Winnepec, the screw propellers Marblehead and Saco, and yacht America. Within the past three months such of these vessels as needed repairs have undergone thorough overhauling at the Portsmouth Navy-yard; so that all are now in good condition to enter on the duties assigned them.

Scattered through the vessels constituting the fleet are the present pupils of the Naval Academy, besides the late graduating class, numbering seventy-four members, in all some four hundred and twenty-five adolescent middies. The classes are mixed up on the various vessels, and the number on each is not uniform, but varies according to the size of the different vessels. On each ship they are arranged in divisions, for the greater convenience of instruction, and in this regard the most perfect system prevails.

The first or graduating class have decidedly the most agreeable time. Their position is that of middlemen, and their duties those of this class of subordinate officers. They stand watch on deck, and, when on the steamers, in the engine-rooms also. On the lower classes devolves, while on the sailing vessels, the duty of going aloft and adjusting or removing the sails, and doing all the work of ordinary seamen, except cleaning the decks. Those on the steamers have to go into the fire-rooms, and, with coats off and sleeves rolled up, perform the dirty and disagreeable duty of shoveling the coal and feeding the furnaces. The theory is to familiarize all with the duties of managing sailing and steam vessels, and the fullest practical knowledge of either theory is the paramount if not sole object of this cruise. Before the cruise terminates those now on the steamers will be transferred to the sailing vessels, and vice versa, so as to give all a chance to familiarize themselves with the minute details of the diverse branches of navigation.

The graduating class flow into the full-fledged costume allowed them in naval regulations—that is to say, the blue jacket, with two rows of buttons, anchors on the lappels, and stars on the sleeves. Straw-hats, white vests and pants, and the white regulation gloves are largely indulged in, with variations to the blue pants and cap, as the weather may vary. The under graduates wear the "jumper" jacket or pea-coat at the Academy, the members of the various classes being distinguishable by the length and wordings of the ornamental tapes. All these sport the naval blue pants and the Scotch cap—a recent academical innovation, but, in connection with the low turn-over collar of the blouse, forming a costume as neat and jaunty as it is striking and pleasing. Of course the full-grown middies sport sword and frock-coats as occasion may require or personal pride suggest.

The command of the yacht America was promised to the one of the graduating class bearing away the highest honors. The recipient of these honors was S. N. Kane, of Rhode Island, and present commander of the yacht. He is a cousin of Dr. Kane, the Arctic explorer. There are nineteen officers on the various ships, all having the rank of lieutenant-Commanders. The fleet goes to Portland, Maine, and cruises up and down along the Atlantic coast.

A VEETIAN BRIDAL.

Say is dancing in the palace,
In the dance on the sea;
Down, far down, the sullen water
Floweth silently.
She is radiant in her beauty,
Pearls her clson ringlets twine,
Rubies glisten on her finger,
Sapphires her bosom shine.
She is queen of every heart there,
Envy of the beauteous train;
On her looks are fiefdoms pending,
Deadliest loss and loftiest gain.
Princes for her sake are sighing;
She is fairest, first of all
Who are dancing in the palace
At the Doge's festival.

Dancing in the Doge's palace,
In the dance on the sea;
Down, far down, the turbid water
Rolleth sullenly.

For her love a royal bosom
Beats with fierce desire;
Unrequited passion, burning
Like consuming fire.
Wherefore does she shrink and quiver
When He breathes her name?
Wherefore is her cheek and bosom
Dyed with crimson shame?
And her eager eye turns from him,
Glancing far astray
For some absent one, regretful
Of his long delay.
Fix'd upon her with dark meaning,
Glare those baleful eyes;
Fast clench'd, by the wrist, he holds her:
"Thou art mine! My prize!
Vainly from the fowler's clutches
Would the bird take flight;
Gainst the strong is no appealing,
Here, where might is right."

They are dancing in the Doge's
Palace on the sea;
Down, far down, the cruel water
Murmurs mockingly.

But her cheek grows white: he comes not,
Come not, whom she loves.
Drooping, vacant, 'mong the dancers
Listlessly she moves.
Heard in the heavy footsteps
Cross the bridge of doom?
Nor the iron fetters clanking,
Of the living tomb?
Hears she not a sudden splashing
In the tide beneath?
Drown'd in tones of mirth and music
Are the sounds of Death.

She is leaning from her casement
O'er the dark polluted tide,
Orp ere set of sun to-morrow
She will be a prince's bride.
Little seems the royal bridegroom
Dreaming of her in his sleep,
How she watches at her casement
In the dead of night, to weep.

"O thou dark and dismal channel,
Father's net was never cast
In thy gulfy waters, shrouding
Bloody secrets of the past.
In the day of retribution,
When thy waves are backward roll'd,
What an awful revelation
Shall the startled world behold!
Yet my spirit yearneth o'er thee,
And my envious eyes would peer
Through thy mysteries, to recover
All my broken heart holds dear.
What a pearl lies hid beneath thee!
I would venture fathoms deep
To regain my stolen treasure
Which thy gloomy secrets keep.
They have made me fast, their victim
But I scorn their utmost might.
I will break my chains, Believe!
And will be with thee to-night!"

They are waiting in the palace,
Bridegroom, kinsmen, guests and all:
Wherefore does the lady tarry
From the wedding festival?
What a rare and splendid pageant!
What a scene of pomp and pride!
Nothing at the marriage wanting,
Wanting, but, alas! the bride.
Hearts grow sick with hope deferred;
Livid is the bridegroom's cheek:
Near and distant for the lady
High and low they search and seek.
Bridegroom 'twixt thy dreams and waking—
Blissful dreaming of thy bride—
Hearest thou not a splash, a ripple
Break the stillness of the tide?
She is safe forever from thee.
Will thou ever in the deeps
Of the foul forbidden waters
Where thy FAVOR'D rival sleeps?

Roll on, woeful, wicked waters,
Bear them out into the sea;
Let them lie at undefiled
In the blue immensity!

There is mourning in the palace,
In the palace on the sea;
Down, far down, the doomed waters
Throb lamentingly.

RECOMPENSE.

"Is that Oldtown church yonder, if you please, Sir?"

A girl spoke to me. I turned and looked at her. There are women of sixteen and children of sixteen. This one was a child. She wore the scantiest of cotton dresses, belted at the waist, a pair of leather boots, and a white apron. In her hand she carried a sun-bonnet, and her hair, cropped close like a boy's, curled in flaxen rings about her head. The face was a baby's face in sweetness and in innocence, the little brown hands the hands of toil. No young baby this, yet there was simplicity, nature and vulgar about her unless it were those hands.

"That is Oldtown church, my dear," I said, "Are you going there?"

"Yes, Sir, to see the wedding. Are you?"

I was, more fool I, though I did not say so to this child. The bride for whom the bells were ringing was to be mine once, would have been but for the accident which had crippled me and changed her heart. She had done nothing openly treacherous, but I saw the truth and set her free. She took her freedom gladly, and we were two. She had quite forgotten me, no doubt. I believed I never could forget her.

I knew exactly how she would look in snowy silk and lace and coronet of pearls. I had dreamed of her in bridal robes so often.

I nodded to the little thing beside me trudging over the meadow path with the tall grass almost to her waist, and looking at me wistfully.

"I never saw a wedding," she said.

"No?"

"No, Sir. Grandfather said I might come. He didn't care himself. It's a long walk too from the tavern, and it's very old."

"Does your grandfather keep the tavern?" I asked.

"No, Sir—I wish he did!" said the child. "He has only his fiddle, and people half the time don't care for tunes. What you call 'em though? To-night there's a dance, and he's to play for them. That's why we stopped."

A poor fiddler's ragged grandchild—as poor as decent poverty could be—yet her presence somehow cheered me. Half child, half woman, and all a child at heart. Innocent, unsuspicious, and kindly. I encouraged her to linger at my side. I said to her:

"I will show you a place where you can see the bride well. It is in the gallery. Will you like that?"

"I don't know," she said. "I haven't often been to church. We pray mostly in our houses, grandfather and I. Will you be there, Sir?"

"Yes."

"I know I should like it."

"Come with me then," I said, and she followed me.

I had meant to hide myself in the gallery, and see my lost love married quite unseen. This companionship had not been in my plan at all. But I liked it. No friend, no relation, not my own sister, would I have had beside me; but this child thing was too innocent to harm me. I led the way up the dark old stairs, and toward a spot quite sheltered from general view. Then I sat down and she stood leaning over the balustrade.

The church was full of bonnets. Here and there only a masculine head. The minister was in his seat reading, in a voice taken for effect. He was a handsome man, and knew it perfectly well.

Girls whispered and giggled, matrons fanned themselves, and men yawned. Soon the soft roll of carriages on the gravel-path was heard, and the bridal party entered. I saw her at last. Aletta.

"Is that the bride?" half-sobbed the girl's voice at my side. "Is it a real lady? She looks like wax. Oh, how pretty, how beautiful! Look! look!"

She touched me with her little brown hand, and looked at me, her eyes sparkling:

"Did you ever see her before?" she asked. "Is she like the lad in everyday clothes? Oh, how pretty! how pretty!"

Men have no right to weep. I put my head down upon the cushion of the pew and hid my eyes. I felt the child creep close beside me.

"Poor thing, he's tired!" I heard her whisper, and put her little hand out and patted me softly by the sleeve.

Soon I looked down into the church again, and saw Grant Stanton kiss his bride.

"Is it over?" asked the girl.

"Yes, it is over," I said.

"Then I must go," she said. "Thank you for being so kind to me, Sir. Good-by."

"Good-by," I said, and her little feather shoes pattered over the aisle and down the stairs, and I had seen, as I thought, the last of her. When she was gone I opened my Bible.

I went home when the church was quite empty. It had not been as hard to bear as I had feared, and oddly enough I found myself thinking of that child's little gipsy head, and those beautiful long-fringed eyes. I wondered at myself, but it was so.

"I should like to see the child again," I said, and as I spoke I spied a crowd about a tavern door upon the road.

It was a poor place, and poor rough people made up the group. But it was plainly no common quarrel or drinking bout which had brought them there, for their faces were all grave, and their voices suppressed. I crossed the road.

"What has happened, friend?" I asked of a tinker near me.

"Only a blind fiddler dropped dead," he said, "But there's a gal there that's cryin' rt."

And then I pushed him and went in. An old man lay upon the floor, and across his body a girl had flung herself. I knew the gipsy hair and the brown neck, the scant cotton dress and the sunbonnet, flung with a handful of wild flowers upon the floor; and I bent over her, touching her little despairing head.

"My child," I said, "he is happier than we are."

And she looked up at me.

"He was all I had," she said; "all, all!"

So had I thought when Aletta gave me back our betrothal ring. I knew exactly how her face looked other word, but I led her to an inner room, while two men bore the dead man up stairs. She wept wildly, but not uncontrollably—comfort her.

After a while she drew closer to me, and, sitting on a low stool, leaned her forehead on my knee. Soon my hand rested on it, and in an hour she had sobbed herself to sleep.

"The girl shan't go until I hear from you, Sir," I said. "I know where she will go. She seems friendless, and such a child for her age. Thank you, Sir!"

And I went on my way again, thinking not of Aletta, but of the dead fiddler's grandchild. This sun-browned waif, so simple and so ignorant, so friendless and alone.

I was turned yet—not five-and-twenty—a bachelor, and likely to be one my life long. I had no proper person to take her to be my friend to all me. At last, in my extremity, I thought of Betty—old Betty, who had once been my nurse, and who loved me as she might her own child in the goodness of her heart.

I made my way to her poor home. I found her trimming her vines in the bit of garden-ground, and I told her my plan across the fence even before the gate was opened.

"I've been thinking of you," she said. "I knew it was you as soon as I heard some one coming. Then every young gentleman would weary himself to see an old body like me. Sit down, honey, and rest."

"I came to ask a favor, Betty," I said.

"Just name it, Master Bertie."

"Will you take a little girl, Betty?"

"Bless me! In my two rooms?"

"Only a child, Betty."

"A child—Master Albert!"

I told her of the fiddler's death, and of the girl. "I have money enough," I said, "but no female relatives. I can only come to you."

"You always were kind-hearted from a boy," she said. "I'll take the little girl, Master Bertie."

Then she looked up on my shoulders.

"You haven't fretted, have you?" she asked.

"At least I have not," I said.

"Fretted?" I asked. "Why?"

"Nay, why indeed?" said old Betty. "Bet fish in the sea than ever were caught yet." Then in a moment more she added: "I've been to see the wedding."

I felt my face flush. "Shall I bring the girl to-morrow after her grandfather's funeral?" I asked.

"Do, Master Bertie," said Betty. "But, Master Albert, what do you mean to do with her? You are doing all this in a hurry. Just think a bit."

"I mean to adopt the child," I said. "It will make me happy to have a young thing to care for."

Betty laughed. "You'll have young things of your own, please God, some day," she said. "Why, Master Bertie, she's a beggar. Just think a bit."

"I shall never marry, Betty," I said.

She caught my fingers in a close clasp with her horny—looking hand.

"you was back again a baby on my knee, Master Bertie," she said. "I'd like to sing you to sleep as I did then. Ah! it's a grief to an old woman to see the young we've nursed grow up to tall and old, with their troubles so shut up in their own hearts that we can't come at 'em. Going? Well, then, good-night! I'm ready for the child when you will. I'm ready for any thing that will please you, Master Bertie. I ought to my Master Albert always now, I suppose; but the old times do come back so!"

I left her leaning over her gate looking wistfully after me, knowing as a mother might the grief which I had buried in my heart. And if her words had given me a pang, it was like some ointment which makes the wound smart in its very healing. It was something to be loved so even by my old nurse.

Late the next day I led my young stranger from her grandfather's grave to Betty's cottage. She kept my hand upon the road as a little child might. I had no thought but that she was one, until old Betty's cry of tenderness, Bertie, I thought you said a young child! Why, this is a grown girl!" startled me into consciousness.

"It don't matter, does it, Betty?" I asked. She turned to the girl.

"Take off your bonnet," she said, a little grimly. "I want to look at you. What is your name?"

The girl obeyed. "I'm only Nelly Hay," she said, and stood to be looked at. Betty looked stormy at first, then pityingly.

"I La, no! Master Bertie, it don't matter," she said. "I don't see any harm in her. There's a peg behind the door, child. You can hang your bonnet on that." And I left the two together.

Not long, though; every day found some new errand to take me to the cottage. I put on elderly airs, and gave advice. I had her sent to school, and went through grave examinations on Saturday afternoons. I told old Betty that when I was a man of middle age I should take my little daughter home, and she should keep house for us. And I began to fancy, very soon, that there could be no such happiness as that a parent felt. The girl was growing tall, it is true, and I was only ten years older than she was; but when she checked her light tread to keep pace with me, when the childish laugh hushed and stifled at something which could only make me smile, I felt that years are not the only things which age us.

I was working hard at my profession too. I had hands and heart full. In a year I found that I could pass Aletta on her husband's arm without a pang. I was not sorry when I discovered she had really changed, or whether I fancied black curls more than I did golden bands, for I found myself thinking my little daughter must be pretty.

In the sultry summer evenings I used to leave rett tape and parchment and go to the cottage to take tea with Betty and her and my adopted child. Then, while she polished up the cups, Nellie Hay and I used to walk down to the river. I talk as we walked slowly. I had a way of holding her hand still; and we had such pleasant talks! such old, unworldly chatter! Those were the days when I should have rested the brain, wearied with law business, quarrels, and quibbles, and stratagems, more than I can tell.

The rough hands had grown softer now, the waist taper, the bust full. The sweep of woman's robes, the trained air of woman's light-shod feet had taken the place of clumping leather boots and scant cotton skirts.

I knew this, but Nellie was a child to me all of the same. Was I not by adoption her father? Had not my early grief and the staff on which I leaned aged me before my time? Of course she always would be young to me; and why I felt so angry if by chance some gay young farmer chatted with her after the church service was over, or walked home from church, I could not tell. "An old man's temper, I suppose," I said, and sighed like a young one.

So three years passed. At the end of that time Aletta's husband died. They had quarrelled, and she had made him woefully jealous, it was said; and he, in his peppery, savage, a mere puppet, was willed to strangers.

One day a lady in black walked into my office; when she lifted her veil I knew Aletta Stanton's face, closer to me than it had been since we parted. My heart gave no wild throb. I felt as though I were a mere statue.

Courteously and quite calmly I heard her business. She intended to contest the will and needed advice. I gave her what I could. I referred her to a brother-lawyer as the one who would best espouse her cause. As for myself I told her truly that my time was too completely occupied to undertake any thing more, and I wished her success.

She looked at me wistfully, with her great blue eyes full of tears, but I was firm.

"It was cruel of him," she said, "very cruel to leave me so poor; but he was always cruel, nevertheless. The honey-moon was short."

"I regret to hear it," I said.

"I could expect nothing more," she said; "I did not love him—I never loved but one, and that one—"

She paused and looked at me.

"That one I love still," she said.

And Heaven knows no feeling of revenge or petty triumph was in my heart when I looked in Aletta Stanton's eyes as if I did not understand her and courteously bowed her out.

"Did I ever care for that woman?" I thought. "or is it all a dream?"

I took my adopted child to the theatre that night and we saw the Lady of Lyons together. I saw her first play-going experience, and she enjoyed it immensely. She wore a white dress and bonnet and the coral drops I had fastened in her ears before in her father's. I was very proud of her. I could not help looking into her eyes, touching her hand with mine. And after all, let her I kissed her.

"Good-night, my child," I said.

And she answered, "Good - night," with a cheek dyed on the instant deeper scarlet, and ran away as Betty came out to chat with me.

From that night I dated an odd change. My adopted child seemed dearer and better to me by her hand—shy even of chatting as she did. She was graver, more womanly. I fancied she did not care for me as she did. Perhaps some of those farmers who leaned over the gate at sunset, some of those young fellows who so often escorted her home from church, had won her from me. I grew a little moody. I found myself in brown studies when I should have been at work. At last I determined to discover whether I was really to lose my child.

and went down to the cottage. I found her there sitting at work with Betty.

After all, it was no easy task. I could not do it as I had hoped. I tried jesting, and spoke of one and of the other of the young fellows near. "We shall have Nellie stolen from us, I suppose?" I said.

"There is nothing so easily lost from a family as a pretty daughter. But who is to have you, Nellie?"

She looked at me as children look before they burst into tears—her chin quivering, her throat swelling—then she dropped her work, and stole from the room without answering me.

"What ails the child, Betty?" I asked. "Have I offended her?"

Old Betty stood before me sturdy and stern—a look in her face I had never yet seen there.

"Master Arthur," she said, "whatever she was when she came here, Nellie is no child now. Oh, Master Albert, I can't believe you've done it on purpose! You couldn't—such a sweet, innocent thing!—but it's done. All I can say is, go away, or let her go, and maybe the wound will heal. It ought to have gone in time. I was an old fool. Oh, you how could you, Master Albert?—how could you?"

"What have I done?" I cried. "I would rather die than harm her."

"And yet you've made her love you," said Betty, sternly. "You who knew you never would love her. You've been very selfish, Master Albert."

A new light dawned upon me, a radiance brilliant beyond my hopes.

"Betty," said I, "you are dreaming. She must think me old enough to be a grandfather, with my long face and bald crown and this crutch. I've had one dream only, don't set me dreaming again like Heaven's sake!"

Old Betty looked at me; then caught my face in both hands and kissed me.

"Master Bertie," said she, "I shan't tell you a word more. The child is under the grape-vine, two yonder; go and find out what you want to know for yourself. You silly, handsome, good-for-nothing fellow!"

I found my child under the grape-vine, her face wet with tears. I sat down by her and put my arm about her waist.

"Nellie," said I, "don't shrink from me. I am your true friend. Your friend, whatever answer you may give me now. I am older than you, and am not vain enough to think myself a young girl's beau-ideal. But I love you dearly, Nelly. Can you love me enough to be my wife? If you can not, if another claims your heart, do not say yes from gratitude. Tell me the truth, and still retain a father's, a brother's, a friend's affection. Nellie?"

I bent over her, and my life seemed in her keeping. Until that moment I had not known myself. I loved her dearly. I felt it now better, far better, than in my youth I had loved Aletta Stanton.

She spake no word.

"Nellie?" I said. "Nellie?" and a brown hand was laid of its own accord in mine, and beneath my gaze the dark eyes dare not lift themselves, but hid their sweetness under my breast. Nellie was mine.

I sat with her beating heart so near my own, and thought it all over. I remembered the child in her cottage standing in the gallery of the church on that wedding morn. I remembered the child whom I had taught; the girl with whom I had passed such happy hours. And I felt that this living love, sprung, phœnix like, from the ashes of the dead one, was the purest feeling of my life.

So my old fancy of keeping house with my child came true at last; only when she crossed the threshold of my home she was not a child but wife. And still the touch of her brown hand brings comfort with it; still her sweet voice is better to me than all the music in the world. And, as in my youth I fancied myself old, surely in my age I shall believe myself young, for while we love and are beloved youth can never die, and while we live I and my Nellie must love each other.

HALF A BREATH.

AT an upper window of a beetle-browed building, in a certain manufacturing town, there is, or there was, a man of odious and unwinking look, perched on a platform before a desk; a man of more than Roman integrity, not to be seduced by the glance of the surest bribe, by so much as the blink of an eye, aside from the ledger, in which he eternally wrote, through all hours of the day and night; a wooden Sir Isaac Newton Stylites, in cutaway coat and lank trowsers; object of much childish speculation on my part; subject, also, of a current legend, which though no one ever to be caught in talking of, was in some mysterious way was perfectly known to all our townsfolk.

The legend is of two wooden men. One, the Stylites just described; the other walked about on two legs that could bend, and did; and if you had poked him, by no doubt your finger would have rebounded his flesh; a most respectable man also, as our townsfolk will assure you when I name I. T. Minor; and I. T. maintain, a man of worth, as he lived in the nineteenth century, and behaved in it like Cæsar, Hamilton's goose on the truck. After an entire train had passed over her, sitting between the rails, "she arose, looked over her shoulder, as who should say, and saw no I heard something, and waddled off with placid but evident contentment for all such flummery." He used his little shred of life as the Chinese ladies did the new trousers, which he patched precisely where the old ones were patched. Wooden! why if the legend be true, the Stylites was infinitely the most impressionable of the two. I say if the legend be true, for I vouch only for my two men of wood.

One night, lying in his bed, I. T. Minor heard himself loudly called—I. T. Minor! I. T. Minor! It was not an hour at which people are apt to be called; half past twelve by the little clock on the mantle; and the voice sounded from without; without the house was silent; besides the night was wild with rain and wind, coming with voices that clamored, and voices that wailed, and bursting against the house with a wet rush, like waves and breaking surf; and yet I. T. Minor felt himself irresistibly compelled to get up out of his warm bed and pop, shivering, out into the wet street; and as he stood at the window came the voice again: I. T. Minor! I. T. Minor! more loudly and imperatively than before; and though Mr. Minor certainly intended to get back to bed at once he got into his boots instead; and though assuredly he would never venture out on such a night and at such an hour, he found himself pulling on his trowsers, and urged by the terrible voice, and in spite of himself, he hastened his great-coat and took down his hat, though groaning all the time.

"Oh dear! what is it would stop." I shall be obliged to go! I can't stop myself! Oh dear! what will the neighbors think, hearing my name sounded all over town? And why don't somebody wake up?"

As if people ever waked when wanted, and the wife of your neighbor, for example, ever did, and always more at night through your visitations of toothache and ghosts! The voice rang out on the night like the long strain of a steam-whistle, yet nobody stirred. No windows were opened on the opposite side; no night-capped heads peeped out after I. T. Minor as he unwillingly stepped from his door into the street; but then, inconsistently enough, from shame and confusion, at the public nature of his mysterious summons, he hoped no one within they would look out and stop him if they could. He remembered certain garroting legends, and looked suspiciously at arms and alleyways, and dead-quarters of the blackness about him. He observed to himself that it was at once disagreeable and delicious to be a recipient of regular habits to be prowling about after midnight of the worst night of the season. And then the unfeeling world, not to mention Mrs. Minor, would lend a doubling ear to stories of ghostly voices and irresistible impulses, and would not be convinced but once—in spite of all which he went steadily forward.

To his astonishment he presently discovered that he was not alone. Familiar front-doors opened, one after the other, and familiar great-coats came swinging heavily down the steps. Mr. Screwby, Mr. Screwby, Box and Cox, almost every man in the row, in fact. I. T. Minor rubbed his eyes with

"Why, where the deuce are you going, Coger?"

"Don't you hear it?" returned Codger, with an air of listening. "I thought it would wake the whole town with its "I. T. Minor! I. T. Minor! David Codger! Ellis, Screwby! what pious ears you've!"

"Don't you hear it:" cried Screwby, with the same air of listening. "I know it was called me, Screwby! I tried to stay in bed but I couldn't, so here I am!"

And they marched on together, while Minor stared incredulously after them, doubting his senses, all the time more front-doors opening, more people crowding into the street. Mr. Minor was hailed and jostled on all sides by a crowd, for which I must use capital letters to express the awful and supernatural effect it produced there, made up of the very Best Men, speaking after Mammon, each and all answering, when questioned, Hoosed, and hurrying on. Done, each wrapped in himself and unconscious of his neighbor, with the same air of listening clearly in his own face, as they hurried on. And still Minor heard only and continually I. T. Minor, above all the stir; and all, urged by the same mysterious impulse, pressing onward—where?

Minor was asking himself that with some perturbation, when he found himself in front of his own warehouse, at whose door stood the wooden Man or Man at his desk. How it was that he could see distinctly in that pitchy darkness; how it was that the Wooden Man had not been left behind; and looking straight at the crowd; how it was that he no longer wrote in his ledger but held up a hand as if to appeal with the other to the lofty effigies of painted fingers, or what brought that pale girl there on the platform beside him, I. T. Minor did not even ask. He accepted it all as he may do the unnatural conditions of a dream, and understood that here was a court of inquiry: that here in the ledger was a record against him that he, in the pale girl, was a witness against him and the other highly respectable gentlemen on trial with him. What he did not comprehend was a fact he had as they could have been guilty. He glanced at his neighbors, but Codger, Screwby and the rest, were intent on the pale girl about to speak. A half recognition stirred in I. T. Minor's mind. Where had he seen her?

"I am sorry," commenced the girl, nervously, "I do not desire to complain. I did not come here of free-will, and I know you will not be remember it against me, for though my salary is small I should not like to lose it. I have a bed-ridden brother and a mother to support, and though twenty-five days out of seven is certainly wearing work, yet I have continual reason to be thankful that I am in possession of such a situation, and I quite believed the gentlemen when they told us at the end of the quarter that there was positively no money in the treasury, and that we must wait. I make no wait. But it was a bitter disappointment to those not so poor as we; and to us, who have always to struggle so—gentlemen who are not obliged to live three times over every penny can hardly tell how bitter" continued the girl, warmly. "I could have spared about a quarter, out of which I lay aside so much for rent, and so much for fire. With the rest we buy of course just flour enough for bread, just sugar, just every thing enough to last till relief comes again, that is, next pay-day, and patch, and darn our shoes, and stockings, and last one hour, and lights, lest any thing should give out before; so you understand how it is that every thing runs out together just before pay-day. There is no more medicine for the sick one, you are half-way down your last pail of coal, you have kneaded your last quart of flour, you are at the bottom of your tea can, you have promised to pay back the money you borrowed to-morrow, and to settle certain bills, and can hardly, perhaps, keep the old shoes on your feet in which you go for the money that you have earned by three months' hard work; and—the city has built a new hall, or a tower, or the proper appropriation has not been made, and gentlemen give us drafts, payable in—what matter does it make to the eager, anxious ones at home how many months, when they have already stinted and pinched to its utmost tension and can wait no longer? Gentlemen will cash our drafts at a discount—that means seven, or ten, or fifteen dollars, as the case may be: but when it is hardly possible to keep alive on ninety-three dollars, all told, how is it possible to do it on seven or ten dollars less? Shall we wait, then, till the proper pay-day, and live on credit? That means, gentlemen, getting behindhand every day a little and a little more. Impossible to economize, and use discretion and dis——"

"And if it is," burst in I. T. Minor, who was deeply interested, and recognized in the girl a teacher or a school of whom board he was a member, "a quarter cause for which to rout men like us out of their beds at midnight! What can we do about it? Is it our fault if the proper appropriations are not made?"

"We are very sorry—"

"Yes, very sorry," echoed Codger & Co.; "but what can we do?"

"Do!" cried the Wooden Man. "What would you have done, if in your salaried days—for I take it, most of you, at one time or other, have been glad enough to receive a salary—I say what would you have done if, after three months' faithful labor, your employer had said he was 'very sorry,' and so he presented you with a draft, due three months from date, because he really would not have the money before? If your employer was 'very sorry' in this manner, once and again, sometimes for three quarters running, as has happened to this girl and hundreds of other women in similar positions—and what you would have done for yourselves, it is not your duty, Christian men, to do for your brothers—and more for those who, being women, especially appeal to you, as weaker than yourselves? If the laborer is worthy of his hire, then, when he fails to get it, there is a wrong somewhere, and it is your duty to find it out; and that the girl has spoken within the bounds of truth I bear witness, for here, as I stand above your heads, I write down, day after day, the sighs, the struggles, the tears, the disappointments, the groans, of men and women in positions like hers; and the dullness, blindness, hardness, and stupidity I regard them as I do the sighs, groans, and tears of your beds, indeed! Why, it has roused a Wooden Man to speech. I protest I am hearthily glad of the condemnation of you, gentlemen!"

At the word "condemnation," Codger, Screwby, I. T. Minor, and the rest, looked blankly at each other, while the Wooden Man made a mounting motion, instantly checked by the Wooden Man.

"There has been lately," he went on, in his dry, hard voice, "a deficit of air unparalleled since the earliest days of the world. Of the cause I am unable to speak, but I can confidently assure you that the deficiency will be supplied in three days' time at the least. Meantime, by accurate computation, it has been discovered that there is not sufficient air about the city to supply each individual with his usual quota, and it has been decided, for very evident reasons, that the atmospheric dearth shall fall principally on you gentlemen here assembled."

Here there was a murmur and commotion in the crowd, quickly silenced by the Wooden Man, who continued with the same unpleasant chuckle:

"We are aware that you are fully entitled to as much air as will sufficiently inflate your lungs at every breath; but what can the Board of Works and Currents do? We have not the air on hand; and we can only pledge you our honor that in three days time sufficient will return to their usual course. Meantime you will receive but half the usual amount of air at each breath. Take it well, also, gentlemen, and husband your strength; you will, also, accordingly need your entire powers without any breath at all, and will then be obliged to borrow of some more fortunate neighbor, or of some seller of inferior mixable stories, or an incurable scold. We are very sorry, but really, gentlemen, we are doing for you the best we can."

"Shameful!" commenced I. T. Minor, indignantly; but his protest was cut short by a new and disagreeable sensation, almost precisely that of choking, but a continual impression and apprehension that he should shortly come to that. He inflated his chest to its utmost capacity, his mouth at its widest, but the result was quite as unsatisfactory as before. He looked about on his neighbors; they were gasping like himself. He glanced appealingly at the Wooden Man, but he was again as stolidly intent on his ledger as ever.

Day was breaking when Minor reached his home, but nobody had observed his absence; neither did any one at breakfast perceive that he was in a half-strangled condition. He gave down-pour at business-hours, from force of habit, he found no one sharpened his ears at home, all evidently talking; nothing arose in his wardrobe, as the Wooden Man had warned him, he lost breath entirely.

"Hest ailed you, my dear? what is the matter with you?" cried old Brown, who was talking with him, jumping backward in a fright.

"Give—give me—breath!" Minor; but not another word could he get out till, catching a chance breath of his alarmed companion, he recovered as suddenly as he had been seized.

"Singular attacks—very!" remarked old Brown, suspiciously.

"Oh, it's nothing—nothing—subject to it—hereditary, you know!" explained Minor, confusedly; but a few moments after he was seized again—breath entirely gone, and black in the face. Men ran on all sides to find remedies and a physician.

"No; air—air!" gasped Minor, faintly.

"Yes, yes; give him air," said every body, getting away from him, and so removing from the unlucky man all chance of borrowing a breath, and he kicked out against it in a frenzy of despair. Just then Codger passed by, but, as Minor looked imploringly at him, shook his head—had not breath enough for himself, good fellow! and if it had not been for a friendly puff of wind the next paragraph would have been I. T. Minor's obituary. As it was, he lost his bargain, his wealthy customer not having time to wait, and gained the desirable reputation of being subject to fits.

"I shall be ruined—ruined and dead before the three days are half over," said Minor, mournfully, to himself, trying to make half a breath answer for a whole one, and quaking in anticipation of no breath at all, when he felt himself seized by the shoulder, and heard Mrs. Minor's voice:

"Why, I. T., wake up! wake up, I say! What are you groaning about?"

At least that is the way in which friends of the family try to blunt the point of the story: rather dull in nightmares, per se, than absurd, as some say, that I. T. Minor was actually wandering abroad all night, and came home at daybreak, haggard and miserably dead, declaring that he had lived three birthdays in one night. To this ending I incline, but, as an impartial historian, give both versions. Take your choice. I vouch for the first two things—and those, as I said in the beginning, my two wooden men. For two things? No. For three: for the sad truth of that pale girl's troubling story also.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

POLICE "INTELLIGENCE."—"There isn't any!"

Why are the ladies of the Ballet very kind to their relatives?—Because they are so fond of their grandjetes.

Love is as necessary to a woman's heart as a fashionable bonnet to her head. Indeed, we think, rather more so; for nothing but love on a large scale will ever cause her; whereas the recent fashion has shown that she can be satisfied with a very little bonnet.

Milton was asked, "How is it that in some countries a king is allowed to take his place on the throne at fourteen years but may not marry until he is twenty-one?" "Because," said the poet, "it is easier to govern a kingdom than a wife."

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

At the next meeting of the Zoological Society a Paper will be read on "The Face of the Skull," with a view to its Gallup.

Also a corresponding meeting of the Pharmaceutical Society a Paper will be read "On an Infusion of New Blood."

The last day story is of two dogs who fell to fighting in a saw-mill. In the course of the tussel one of the dogs went plump against the circular saw, which cut him right in two instantor. The hind legs ran away, but the fore legs continued to fight and whipped other dog.

STRIKING TO THE LAST.—The robbers of Nantes have recently been on strike because the name of their patron saint, Orlando, has been struck out of the Roman Calendar. The authorities, out of regard for the ears of the people, corrected still further, and the pride of the thieves was healed. The disturbance was thus allayed, and the robbers, who threatened to come to blows, returned to their work.

RISSING.

"Oh, girls—get out!—you sure don't you—
I really wish you wouldn't!
Oh, girls—will you stop?—I declare
You know you ought to shouldn't.

"There, now, you've got it—oh, be still!
You're a bold one, Sally!
You've got—ah, take away your face!—
What an awful fuss about!

"Once more!—there—that'll do—don't.
You've ruined up my hair!
If you'll but quit, I'll give you one—
Now take that—there—there!"

NEW TAXES.

For each curl on a lady's head above ten, five cents.

For wearing a low-necked dress, one dollar.

For wearing loops larger than eight feet in diameter, eight cents for each loop.

For shooting a duck, ten dollars.

Seeing a lady home from church, twenty cents.

For every limb torn off, ten cents.

For kissing a pretty girl, one dollar.

For kissing a fat woman, ten hundred twenty-five cents to twenty-five dollars, she to fix the estimate of her own beauty.

Old bachelors over thirty are taxed ten dollars, and the widowers twenty-five dollars.

A wag that eulogizes his musical attainments: "I know two tunes: the one is Auld Lang Syne, and the other is I don't know the latter."

DREAM AFTER A DAY'S ADVENTURE

KAUTERSKILL FALLS.

GOOD-BY.

UNDER THE KAUTERSKILL FALL

A TALE FOR THE TIME.

Two dogs, one day, adown the street
Were trotting, holding converse meet;
For dogs, whatever man may teach,
Have wondrous faculty of speech,
And tell each other many a story
Not too much to their masters' glory—
Two bull-dogs, a good-natured race,
When man their nature don't debase.

Says Bob, "I heard them say last night
They've made a match, and we're to fight.
Quiet beneath old Scroggins' chair
And stretch'd out with a sleepy air,
I lay, while they with pipes and gin
Belch'd smoke and suck'd the poison in:
And first they talk'd about our weight,
And then our pluck; and long debate
They held about our several ways
Of 'going in' with just such praise
As, if we were both fools as they,
Might make us vain of what they say."

Quoth Tom, "I'm sorry, Bob, to hear it:
A bite or so, mind, I don't fear it:
If any stranger dog should come
Lurking about my place at home,
Thinking to cut me out with Rose,
Or match me before my nose,
I'd pitch into him with a will,
And prove I have both pluck and skill.
But you and I, old Bob, are friends;
Each in a quarrel always lends
T'other his help, and when we rally
Fore best be off—we'll clear the alley.

"What can we do, Tom? 'tis our trade;
High bets upon 't the event are laid:
My master's pride sack as a beagle,
Clears all before him at the Eagle;
Yours is not quite in such high feather,
But, Tom, when they've sit on together
Both cash and credit will be flowing,
Though where cash comes from there's no knowing.
As if they are the end of toddies
And grub out of our mangled bodies."

"I tell you, Bob," says Tom, "they're brewing
Fun for themselves, but our undoing.
Why, boy, master's voice we're set to win
Nor you nor I shall e'er give in;
Wherever once we fix our teeth
We hold at least to have breath:
Of one of us the death is sure,
The other main'd beyond all cure.
And all because those two-legged brutes
Live of our sufferings on the fruits.
Now look you, Bob, if I and you
Were only to each other true
We'd read these varmints such a lesson
They'd never find the sense to guess on."

"What would you do?"

"Serve them as they'd make me serve you—
Show them your teeth. Don't look dismay'd.
You say 'you're out of death afraid;'
The worst can happen is to die,
And let them kill you, Bob, not I."

What happen'd after this converse
It might be irksome to rehearse.
But out of a low bowel rush'd
One eve, a crowd together crush'd,
Following anon with sticks and staves
Two dogs, and furiously raves
One ruffian, "Why, the curs are mad!
Kill 'em!" Each passing man and lad
Joins in the cry, "Mad dog! mad dog!"
One brains the foremost with a log.
The other, maimed with many blows,
Lays by his old friend's ear his nose,
And just growls out, "So let 'em think.
To us who're just upon death's brink,
A word is naught; but 'mad dog's' bite
Shall haunt our sleepers day and night.
And these who've left us in this sort
Learn not to madden us for sport."
With that he left his comrade's face
And died—with bull-dog hero's grace.

THREE OF THEM.

EVERY thing in this world goes by comparison. Amidst the dead level of the prairies it would take a very little mole-hill to make a mountain; and it would require a very different girl to be queen in New York society from the one who finds it no task to be queen of hearts in a country village. Hetty May was quite a belle in Danbury. She was just a piece of pink and white prettiness. Her father and mother had been charmed by this same prettiness from her babyhood, and had unconsciously done homage to it all their lives. Her two older sisters, Hannah and Huldah, had never been too good to help their mother with the housework. They had baked and brewed, scoured floors and washed milk-pans, and been healthy and happy and womanly in spite of it.

Hannah married first, and Huldah two years afterward. Then the neighbors thought Hetty would have a day expressed it, "to come into it." But Deacon May and his wife had other views. They hired a stout woman in the kitchen; for Mrs. May said she "wasn't so strong as she used ter be, and she needed somethin' more'n a girl;" and Hetty, at sweet fifteen-years-old Miss Hetty away to boarding-school. In two years' time she finished her education. I use this term advisedly, for Hetty was not one of those to whom life is a continual schoolmaster. She would remain, mentally, very much as those two years left her. In them she had learned to paint flowers, and work worsted, and embroider collars and cuffs. This, besides acquiring a certain amount of taste in dress, was about all. She had recited lessons, to be sure, in botany and history, and some of the jingles, but they had passed into one of her pretty pink ears and out at the other, and left her the same empty-headed little Hetty after all.

But her parents saw no lack. To them, at least, she was

"Queen rose of the rosebud garden of girls."

And not to them only. Every unmarried man in Danbury was in love with her. Phil Rawson, the clerk in the dry-goods store, always grew sentimental when she bought a calico dress of him; and when the posthouse was a pair of boots, and he was permitted to try them on, his emotions transcended expression, and his expressions transcended description. Mr. Nichols, the clergyman-master, thought her voice the divinest music in the world, though she always sharped a little, and quite often sang out of tune. Tom Mansfield, who owned his own farm and drove a stylish pair of horses, wanted nothing so much as to see her mistress of all; and, indeed, Tom was a good fellow, and might have done very much worse. Sam Reeves, also, worshipped her from afar, with silent devotion; as indeed he ought, for he was the village blacksmith, and there was an aristocracy even in Danbury.

No wonder Hetty's pretty, foolish, little golden head was almost turned. If the little heart had not been tender and loyal, in spite of its lightness and vanity, she would have been unbearable. As it was, somehow, every one loved her, even the rest of the girls in the village, though she charmed their lovers away, and had so many beaux to her string that she amused herself by counting them, as she might have counted the beads on her rosary, if she had been a devout little Romanist, content to save for one of them than another. Her parents were in no hurry, either, to have her make her choice. She was but young as yet, and loved to each other, and it did them good to see her round. She didn't do much, to be sure, but somehow the house would be a different place without that pretty face, her bits of worsted work here, her vases there, with a sprig of honey-suckle in one, a bunch of violets in another. Sage-matron grumbled at her inefficiency in the daily ways in which "Miss May" let her daughter go on; but for my part, considering that the Deacon had money enough, and was generous also to afford the indulgence of something pleasant just to look at, I really think the aforesaid pink and white prettiness of Hetty's was worth much more than any thing she could have done with her hands. Do we complain of a rose-bush because it does not bear gooseberries, or a lily because it is not a pumpkin-vine?

Just at this juncture a new minister was settled in Danbury. He was a single man, and, therefore, as was but natural, he came to the Deacon's to board. Hetty had never seen quite the like of this Reverend Cuthbert Gallthorp. He was not at all after the Danbury pattern. She saw him first at supper in her father's house; for she had not been well, and so had missed the first Sunday when he preached his trial sermon. She had a little vague dread of ministers—an association of dullness and stiffness and severity. Perhaps connected with the intention of disarming this one that she made a ravishing toilet before she appeared in his presence; and came down, a pink-and-white vision, with the daintiest of delicate muslins, with ribbons as blue as her eyes at her throat and in her bright hair. Her cheeks crimsoned when they blushed before Mr. Gallthorpe's admiring gaze, and he thought he had never seen any thing so pretty in his life.

It was the first of May when the new minister came, and his acquaintance with Hetty progressed rapidly. It grew with the flowers, and blossomed with the roses; or, at least, by the time the Rev. Edward Waller had put the first one in her hair he thought himself very deeply in love with her indeed. He probably would have told her so if he had not been a minister; but he had a sort of creed that ministers must be above the basty impulses of ordinary humanity; and he had so thought that he behoved him to wait until he had considered the matter a little more thoroughly. It did not know, however, how long this thoroughness would have likely to hold out if another actor had not appeared upon the scene of affairs.

About the middle of June Deacon May received a letter from Mrs. Vandervere, his only sister. She had married well and was living in splendor. She seldom came to Danbury, and had not even written to him for nearly two years. This letter, therefore, was something of an event. The Deacon brought it home from the post-office unopened, and did not take it from his pocket until supper was over, and Hetty and Mr. Gallthorpe had wandered into the porch, as usual, and sat there enjoying the balmy beauty and stillness of the summer night. Then the good man drew his chair to the light of the lamp, put on his spectacles, carefully broke the seal of his sister's epistle, and read it aloud. It contained a request that Hetty might come for July and August, her youngest daughter. Violet, she said, was not well—a little tired with the past winter, in which she had been much in society, and wanted to go into the country to recruit, and thought she could not be so happy any where else as with her nearest relatives. Hetty, of course, would have smiled, at least, over that passage in her mother's letter. It was certainly an embellishment, but then Mrs. Vandervere was fond of embellishments of all kinds. Good Mistress May listened with some disappointment as her husband read. At last she said, rather fearfully,

"I spose there ain't no way but ter let her come?"

"Why should there be any other way?" the Deacon asked, with surprise in his tone. "Ain't Hetty you, Hetty not to hev a welcome ready for enny of my friends."

"Tain't that, you know it ain't, Abijah. I was only thinkin' about the consequences."

"Wa'al, he won't interfere. We've got more rooms than one in the house. She needn't disturb him."

"No," with a doubtful pause; "but you see I do think he's beginnin' to like our Hetty, and seems ter me she's just fit for him. There ain't nobody else in Danbury that she is fit for, any way."

If one thing vexed Deacon May's righteous soul more than another it was the thought of a broach to match-making. It was almost enough to make him cross, even to his wife; but he was determined to bring out her idea more fully. So he only uttered, after the manner of a true Yankee, an interrogative—

"Wa'al?"

"Wa'al, I've heard that Violet Vandervere is a regular high-flier, and mighty hansum to boot."

"All the more reason she should come here, then," the Deacon said, with Jove-like solemnity, and a crowl in his forehead which his wife understood. "If the minister can't like Hetty with Violet Vandervere beside her, I don't want him to like her at all. If he has eny notion o' Hetty, I look on it as a kind o' special providence that t'other one's comin' just now. For my part I ain't in enny hurry to lose my one gal."

Mrs. May saw that there was nothing more to be said; so, like a woman both meek and wise, she held her peace while her husband answered his sister's letter.

Just as he was finishing it Hetty—out on the porch—came in, followed by her man Mr. Calthorpe—was saying—

"It's curious how different you are from all the other ministers that I ever saw."

"And it's stranger still how different you are from all the other girls that I ever saw," the minister answered, with a true both of gallantry and of tenderness in his manner.

He might have said something yet more pointed, but if the Deacon had been struck with his letter, had not fancied it to be bedtime, and appeared in the doorway as a hint that he was ready for family prayers.

Two weeks after that Miss Vandervere came. Mr. Calthorpe saw from his study window a tall, graceful lady, clad in long, gray coat of the magic coach; but the face was so wrapped in blue veil that he could catch no glimpse of it, and he went back to his sermon with a feeling of half vexation that he should not have Hetty to himself any more. Habit is so much; and he had got quite used to enjoying her pretty, coaxing ways, and depending on her for his entertainment.

It was at tea that Miss Vandervere first dawned on him, as Hetty would have said, very different dawning this, however—one of Church's tropic scenes, full of mysterious splendors, after one of Bellows's cool, pearly twilights. Some people said Miss Vandervere had been called violet in a spirit of prophecy. I do not agree with them. Nothing could be less violet than was this dark, radiant Violet to her simple namesakes of the woodland, in all except the one item of the color of her eyes. Even there, by night, purplish blue—not violet. She wore the same color, too, as if she meant to make her name seem symbolical, and always threw back her veil in a faint breath of that sweetest of sweet odors which every one knows who has ever held in his hand a bunch of freshly-gathered English violets.

She did not say much this first night—she impressed rather by silence than by speech, by manner than by demonstration. But Reverend Mr. Calthorpe caught himself watching the languid grace of her motions; listening eagerly for her low tones—and then, with a consciousness for the compliments of the table, and the inquiries made about her journey—as, with the impression he thought Hetty had made upon him, he had certainly never watched and listened to her.

"I did not think there were such women in the world," he said to himself that night.

"I fancy I can get through the two months." This was Mrs. Vandervere's thought after Hetty had left her alone. "This country parson will do excellently to keep me in practice. I guess he and Hetty have made desperate fools of themselves in love, and it would be too bad to take him away from her, especially since I don't want him myself, only that I know Lucy would be much better utterly miserable. When he got satisfied with looking at her pretty face, and expected to find a companion in her, he would be horribly bored; and his weak heart with trying in vain to come up to his standard. So I shall do them a good turn by breaking it all up. I'll write to-day to break."

Satisfied in her own mind, by this reasoning, of the complete rectitude and harmlessness of her intentions, she kept her word—yesterday's mail was the far wrong in her estimates—the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light.

After breakfast the next morning Mr. Calthorpe tried to go back to his unfinished sermon, but somehow it was of little work—yesterday's zeal and inspiration seemed to have left him. He heard Hetty laughing and talking gayly below, and now and then mingled with her voice a softer, less voice, low as it was, stole very clearly to his ear. He could not descant to his own satisfaction upon predestination, or the predestined to fall in love, he asked himself, and then was unutterably shocked at the irreverence of his own thoughts. He got up, unlocked a door, and looked over the two years' sermons he had preached at his other parish. Hitherto, ever since he came to Danbury, he had preached a new sermon every Sunday. Hetty's freshness had been of the mild kind, and had never interfered with his preparations. He took and went he called her now in his thoughts; and then he wondered if the other were not more like the potent draught which the Deacon's wife had—was she going to intoxicate him against his will?

The fresh air would do him good, maybe. At any rate why should he grieve himself a second vacation, since his parish had made no such generous arrangement? He might preach old sermons for the next two months, and no one would be any the wiser. Without doubt the old ones would be a great deal better, and do more good, than any he could write now, with those summer boats opposing him. So he went down stairs, and there the two girls were in the entry. Of course that was why he had heard their voices so plainly—how wonder he couldn't write.

"Are you afraid of rattlesnakes, Mr. Calthorpe?" Miss Vandervere asked, as she got up from the lower stair to let him pass.

For a moment, as he met her glittering, dangerous eyes, with a strange, subtle ray in them, he wondered if she were talking in metaphor; but she quietly explained herself.

"Because I wanted to climb Blue Hill—it looks so lovely in the distance—and Hetty is afraid. She says a man went there once and saw a rattlesnake, and she was just telling me whether the man killed the snake or the snake ate the man—which was it, Hetty?"

"The man killed the snake," Hetty answered, simply, quite innocent of all comprehension of badinage; "but I believe the snake would have bitten him, only his fangs were so thick—somehow."

"Have you any cowhide boots, Mr. Calthorpe?" Miss Vandervere asked, looking so gravely into his face that he felt the corners of his mouth quivering in spite of himself with laughter.

"No, but I have a stout cane, and no fear of snakes before my eyes just now. Shall we go to Blue Hill?"

"'My good blade carves the casques of men,
My tough lance thrusteth sure,
My strength is as the strength of ten,
Because my heart is pure.'"

Miss Vandervere quoted; then she looked at him again, flashing a subtle, magnetic ray from under her long lashes. "Yes, Mr. Calthorpe, we will go to Blue Hill."

"And Hetty?" Mr. Calthorpe questioned, turning to her with a smile which brightened the girl's day, though she hardly knew it.

"I must keep far enough off from the snakes," she answered, laughingly. "I will go with you, though, to the meadow, and sit on the foot of the hill with my tatting till you come down."

"And we will climb the Hill Difficult," said Mr. Calthorpe, whose eyes were kindling a little. "Come, Sir Knight!"

So little Hetty sat contentedly at the hill's foot, and Mr. Calthorpe went up into the clouds with Violet Vandervere. Into the clouds, indeed; and I think in the enchanted air his head grew dizzy, and he wondered a little where he was. They stood on the summit of Blue Hill, and Miss Vandervere took off her hat and let the sunbeams glitter in her bronze hair and the winds toss it. Her cheek eyes kindled with a sort of inspiration; for—and herein, I think, was the secret of her power—underneath all the coquetry and recklessness of her nature lay an inborn, passionate worship of the beautiful and the true. Mr. Calthorpe felt this in her—understood it without any words. He would never have cared to stand on the hill-top with Hetty, but it was very pleasant to stand there with Violet Vandervere. It seemed that earth and air and sky had new meanings; and yet he looked at none of them so much as at the face of his new friend, with its play of light flooding them like the sea, her parted, tremulous lips, the color coming and going in her cheek.

"Let us go down," she said at last. "One does not care to feel like this too long."

So they went down to Hetty and her tatting. Could Mr. Calthorpe help it if he felt that it was going down in more senses than one?

My story is almost too simple to tell; and yet it must be set down—simple as it is—for there was not even the excitement of rivalry. Very soon Mr. Calthorpe ceased to think of Hetty at all. Violet Vandervere was the sort of night-shade that when the sun shines you can see no star in all the heavens. She talked, she sang, she walked, she sat still, she went in search pearls—glorified by some mysterious grace, seemed mere bewildering than the other. It was well that he had those two years of sermons to fall back upon, for I do not think he could have written one that summer. Miss Vandervere was not hypocritical. She really liked him—liked him for his talents, for his taste in music and sing with him; and all the while he did not ask her to love him. He was waiting—afraid, perhaps, to try his fate.

Hetty saw it all, understood it all, but her heart did not break. She was shielded not so much by her unvarnished tale into a heroine, as by her own romantic. She would be a true wife and tender mother by and by, doubtless; but her natural imagination enough to be in danger of any sentimental maladies. Her mother watched her with silent solicitude; but then she saw to it that the regular meals as well as ever—bowing, as usual, a decided preference for dainties—and that she came down in the morning with healthy cool and fresh, as the leaf rises from untroubled slumbers, good Mrs. May ceased to alarm herself.

The bright days passed, and "all the hay was down." August followed with its sultry splendors; and it was the last day of summer—Violet Vandervere's last day in the Danbury sky.

She spent the afternoon in the parlor with Mr. Calthorpe. Hetty had offered to pack up for her, but Violet had told the housekeeper that she was the way of doing her service. So she sat and read a little, talked a little, sang a snatch or two now and then. Mr. Calthorpe whose conscience would haunt the Reverend Walter for many a day. Overhead, moving to and fro, they heard Hetty's light, quick step. Mrs. May's voice quite ceased to be heard at her with a vague wonder whether he should ever sit beside her thus again. She was dressed in violet—he had seen her first. Some shade of fancy was it because they were to part—veiled the brightness of her dangerous beauty. She looked pale and tired. Ill? Did she love him? He could hear his own heart beat. He moved a little nearer to her, and asked, timidly in a low voice,

"Do you, could you love me, Miss Vandervere?"

There was, after all, a curious honesty in the girl. Being her straightforward to one point, she never deceived you. She returned his look for a silent moment. He was good and chivalrous—he had never thought of her as any thing else than bad ever met; he had made her short summer happy; but there must be winters as well as summers. She never could love him well enough to share the life he had marked out for himself, and she had too much conscience, in spite of her coquetries, to try to woo him. A tress of her glorious darkness fell over and trembled on her voice as she answered him.

"As you mean love no; I never could. I don't think I could ever care enough for any one to marry for love alone—and yet I do like you, so very much. You have made for me such a pleasant summer."

"A pleasant summer!" Was that, then, all it meant to her? He wished he had only kissed her just once before he asked her that question. No matter if she had been angry, it would have been a memory to keep for all his life. And now she would be nothing to him any more. What was life worth? She seemed to read his thoughts. She said, with a strange, sad gentleness:

"It is best as it is, Mr. Calthorpe—believe it. If I had loved you with all my heart I would have hindered you in your work. I am not good enough to be your wife."

Then she gave him her hand, and he did kiss that—held it for one will, swift moment, trembling with his own emotion. Then she drew it away, and went up stairs to Hetty.

The next Sunday the Reverend Mr. Calthorpe preached a sermon on "Love." Little children, keep yourselves from idols." In it the anguish through which he had passed found its sole utterance to human ears. At the power of his words the congregation wondered—only Hetty comprehended its source, and pitied him with a gentle pity.

Fifty days—but gently. It was a lesson that would not be lost; and yet he did not have to pay for it too dear a price. His fancy had been touched by pretty Hetty. Miss Vandevere had gone deeper, and captivated his imagination, roused all the romance and poetry of his nature. But the strength, the full of his manhood—a love which must satisfy soul as well as sense—will awake some day, and find its own queen. Her kingdom will not be lost by barter because once a usurper reigned over it in a summer holiday.

Tom Mansfield began, after the grain harvest was finished, to persuade Aunt Hetty to drive behind his splendid horses. She learned soon that she could satisfy him, without effort, and evidently. That nature was smooth, poetical enough, romantic enough—just right, in short, for this lover. She found it a very pleasant thing to receive such worship; and before the autumn leaves had fallen she came to the conclusion that, grand as it might have been to marry the minister, it would be a very deal more comfortable to marry Tom; so all the wounds in her kind little heart were healed without so much as a scar.

I think Miss Vandevere was, perhaps, the most to be pitied of the three. She had, after all, a nature which fashion and frivolity would never entirely satisfy; and I think there will come now and then, all through her life, lonely hours when she will remember Daubury, and a true heart she held once in her hand.

CHAPTER IX.

NOTHING could be more perfect than the drive to Hiccory Corner with such double pleasure at the end of it. The day was as fine as possible, the roads fast getting into good spring order, and the horses trotted along admirably, their bright harness jingling in the sun. Even the dark face of Hannibal on the box shone with satisfaction, and the three children were in a bounding state of delight. Lily, to be sure, was most entranced with the thought of spending a day with Maria Jarvis; while Primrose's heart was in her watering-pot; and Clover, with her two choice bunches and plans, ate into a very happy combination. She even found time (which the two others scarce did) to notice the dainty fringes of green grass that began to show themselves here and there, and to see the blackbirds, and the rich tint of the uncovered earth, and the look of careful lingering on the fields—thinking between-whiles very earnestly of the proposed work at the tinman's, and of great possible advantage from the social existence of Maria Jarvis. Sam was of the party, to see the children safe to Chestnut Hill; but on the express understanding that he was not to interfere with their plans or purchases at Hiccory Corner.

"It's so delightful to do it all ourselves!" said Lily. "Don't you, Sam, you are not even to advise us."

"No, I!" said Sam. "I have po such stock of good advice on hand that I can afford to waste it. I shall take myself off to the shoemaker's the minute I have set you among the pint-pots."

"Does the tinman have pint-cups too?" said Primrose.

"Pint-cups, and quart-cups, and all sorts of things. So if you change your mind, and want a nutmeg-grater instead of a watering-pot, you can have it."

"I guess I sha'n't!" said Primrose, with one of her gladsome laughs. "But, oh! Sam, would you get a blue watering-pot—or a pink one?"

"Upon my word," replied Sam, doing his best to keep a grave face, "I don't know. It's a wonderfully practical sort of thing. I think, just for the novelty of the thing, I should choose a pink one—if I could find it! Unless, indeed, I should be fortunate enough to come on a delicate sky-blue!"

"Now, Sam, you are advising," said Lily.

"Truly I am not," honestly replied Sam. "As far from it as possible."

"Yes, blue would be beautiful!" said little Primrose, with such a grave, contemplative air that her brother laughed outright; and stooping down to kiss her, bade Hannibal drive to the tinman's just as fast as he could.

"Fast little Missy won't find 'em there," said Hannibal, touching up his horses. "Missy can try—but this ole chap don't keep 'em."

"What other place?" said Lily.

"De green-house, Miss Lily—old Scipio's green-house. Every body at Hiccory Corner know old Scip. But here is the tin-shop, and here's Miss Sim all she want here."

Not all she wanted. To do that one must needs go about the world with far more moderate visions than those of pink and sky-blue watering-pots. Red ones, indeed, the tinman had—a dark brick red; and others of a dull lead color; but Prim turned away from both in great disgust.

"Let's go to the other place," she whispered to Sam, with forgetting all about the shoemaker's, stood silently looking on. "Pleas 'em to do at all."

"But such an entire, pure, sad Clover," examining the tinman's shelves with her eyes. "Will you let me see that one with the very long spout, Sir?"

"This 'ere long-nosed feller?" said the tinman, handing it down. "Well, I guess you might as well take it, for they don't seem to. Tain't of a kind nobody wants."

"Why, Clover, what could you do with such a looking thing?" cried Lily.

Clover took the queer watering-pot in her hand and surveyed it. It was not very large, just a nice size, the right kind, but the nose, or spout, was as long as three or four common ones put together; stretching itself out into the air, for no imaginable purpose but to see the world. Was in the way. And as if that were not enough, just at the end, close by the rose, the long spout bore a sudden sharp bend to the right side with the rest of its course; as if having set out to see the sky, it had suddenly received by the way the cent. There was no sense in it—just, altogether, that as Clover held the pot in her hand it weighed quite down, and touched the table.

"Sam, it wouldn't do that if it was full of water, would it?" said Clover, looking up at him.

"No, but the pot itself would be heavy, and so balance the nose."

"Wouldn't it be convenient for watering distant plants, to have a watering-pot with a tail?" said Clover, with her face of grave consideration.

"Couldn't say whether 'twould or not," said the man. "That's what it's made for; and it's a fine rare article."

"I think I'll take it," said Clover.

"That leaf-cutting bee," said Lily, "with its long nose." And just look how fine the holes are in the end. Why, it would take the water a week to come out!"

"Those fine holes are excellent," said Sam; "they can hardly be too fine!"

"Well, I don't think so," said Lily. "I don't want to be all day watering one plant. And the nose is all bent to."

"Bend it straight," said the tinman. "Saves water. When 'tain't bent you just go pourin' it round between things."

"Pour, I see. Is that one off there in the corner," said Lily. "How would you like that?"

"Tain't hardly a bit," said the tinman, bringing it forward. "I seastways not a sky color. And 'tain't much of a pot neither. Spout's too big and holes too coarse."

"Now I like that," said Lily, handling the blue watering-pot; the color of which was indeed rather dark and deep for the hue of the sky. "I should like to come out all the quicker, and then one would get done. I guess I'll have this. It's the nicest we've seen."

"One likes a gentle shower, and t'other a pourin' rain," said the tinman, nodding at the two children. "Suit yourselves, and I'll suit you."

Sam paid for the watering-pots in silence; and as he stood waiting for the change, little Prim's hand crept softly into his.

"Sam," she whispered, "do you think that'll be the only blue one?"

Sam looked her up in his arms and bore her away to the carriage.

"This is not a very pretty blue, Prim," he whispered, in return, "and if you don't like—never you want it blue—I'll paint it blue myself!"

And away they drove in triumph to old Scip's, the long nose of Clover's watering-pot looking contendedly over the rail, and the two pots were put and carry out its search after knowledge.

"To go visiting with such a thing in the carriage!" said Lily; "what will Maria Jarvis think!"

"I don't know," said Clover, merrily; "but I dare say she'll like it."

Which was as near being a severe speech as often came from the gentle lips of Clover.

"And you're all going to see!" said Primrose, her eyes beaming with thoughts of the pleasure to come, as they drew up before the little house that was half a greenhouse as well.

"All suited but you," said her brother, lifting her down; "so you can march in and ask for what you like."

"I think we won't get out," said Lily; "please don't, Clover! It takes a long time, and Clover yielded her rest; "please!" to Lily's without a word.

Primrose waited no urging, but walked straight up to the door and knocked, and became at once forgetful of all sublunary concerns. This was not the home-door with the brass knockers, but the side and back door of the green-house, through which green leaves and plants beckoned her lovingly. And as the door did not open at once, she pushed it softly, with a timorous entrance. Prim began to gaze up at the leaves in turn, and at once, as I have said, lost remembrance of every thing else. For the whole left hand side of the room, and the tall white flowers of a Calla and brilliant red blossoms of some other plant, were fairly entrancing; and Prim looked and looked, nor even heard Lily call to her to make haste. Then presently the sash-door stirred and opened, and Prim saw instead of the geranium-leaves the figure of a little gray-headed black man —very black, and the hair very gray, but every dark wrinkle on the old face full of gentle pleasure. He bowed low to Sam, standing behind the child; but then all his attention came back to her.

"Little lady," he said, "come to see old Scip? What de little lady likes to have? Scip gives right in not see."

And in Prim went, and the old man shut the door and limped slowly along his green-house walk past the beautiful flowers.

"Dere," he said, with a sweeping gesture of his hand, and turning round once more to Primrose, "little lady only say what she like, dat's all."

"Please, Sir," said Primrose, gravely, "have you got any watering-pots? Hannibal said so. And I can't find one."

Little lady can't find a watering-pot?" said old Scipio, with a broad smile. "Guess she can here —don't know, but see." And once more he limped off and found a door into a sort of outer room, where he kept his empty flower-pots, and then began to rummage behind this shelf and under that, bringing forth at last a dozen bits some fresh tin specimen for Prim to see.

"How do do now? little lady want it for de wash'woman, or to make de clothes, hey?"

"Oh no!" said Primrose, "we've got one for that. It's for myself."

"Little lady got one to have a garden?" inquired the old man.

"Yes, Sir," said Primrose, lifting the last specimen with great difficulty, "and I'm afraid this is too large. I'm going to have a garden, and a great many flowers."

"Little lady want to water de flowers all herself?" said the old man, with one of his gentle smiles.

"Oh yes! all myself," said Primrose, "won't it be lovely? And you see, Sir, I can hardly lift this."

"Little lady can't lift dis?" said old Scipio to himself as he moved away, "ain't got noting small enough for de child, no how! Guess I'll jes' give her Tudy's. She'll be quite happy. She's allus better so den rust." And with a smothered sigh he opened a cupboard in the wall, and brought out to view the very thing he had pretties! little watering-pot that Primrose had ever seen, even in her dreams—a little fairy concern, that would hold about a pint of water in all, and all things in the world, it was painted pink on the inside, but without was a bright green.

Primrose was in a state of rapture, hugging the watering-pot up in her arms, and exclaiming in her soft way, and looking up at old Scipio with eyes too full of joy to see the tears that shone in his.

"Dere—dere!" he muttered to himself, turning hastily away, "she wid de Lord—what need to cry 'bout dat?"

Prim did not hear the words, but her heart felt something of the tone, and she was grave in a minute.

"Can you spare it, Sir?" she said. "Have you got any more like it?"

"Yes, yes, dear! I'll spare it; no, dere ain't one like it in all de world. I'll spare it for de little white blossom. Little lady mustn't cry. Better so den rust," he repeated, softly.

Prim held out her hand to the old gardener, making him a little courtesy and thanking him with her face yet more than her words, and then ran away to the carriage to show her treasure, leaving Sam to finish the business. But it soon appeared that there was nothing for him to do.

"No, I couldn't; 'scuse me, Sir, but I couldn't take nothing for the use of a watering-pot," said Scipio, "noting but de joy of seein' her once'n a while. Couldn't take money for Tidy's watering-pot. She feel like my child," repeated old Scipio, looking tenderly after the carriage from which Prim waved her little hand to him, "she jes' like Tidy! Beth de souls white!"

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

"ONLY once a year!" was a consoling thought to the unfortunate possessors of nerves on the late "Glorious Fourth," for about the hour of noon they found their patriotism, without which there was to long for some safety book where they might bear no more the ceaseless crack and bang of revolvers, crackers, and fire-balls. Many hours had performed their mission with unstring vigor. But where was the open within the city limits, or without, the open from which the sound of the cannon's blare was suggested itself, though a crowd was surging thither. To be sure the cannon was there, but it was a Saturday, began, or rather on that day, to gather round the appointed hour for music; but they suddenly recollected themselves, and pushed their faces into the crowd.

The eager throng drinking in the lively strains which heralded the "Star Spangled Banner" failed to see the illustrative at the picturesque groups that dotted the Mall and Terrace. Not the fashionable butterflies of Saturday afternoon, but real citizens, with their wives and children, et cetera, radiated the lurking classes, to whom it was a rare treat to hear the music of beautiful Park. Helmet and sabre and punctilious etiquette were absent, genuine good-nature, intelligent appreciation, and natural grace were not wanting. Each one had overflowed. The soft green grass of the Mall seemed to grow more delicate by contact with the more delicate flowers

ANDERSONVILLE RELICS.

WHATEVER relates to the Andersonville dead is not likely soon to become void of interest, at least not to the loyal North. That bit of history is just now especially suggestive when a certain school of politicians are trying to create sympathy for "the noble martyr" at Fortress Monroe. Any whining about the variety and delicacy of "the martyr's" food inevitably suggests the grim horrors of the slow starvation of the immortal twelve thousand, coolly planned and remorselessly carried out by those whom "the great martyr" controlled. If the sentinel's footfall so hurt a sensitive ear as DR. CRAVEN suggests, it is a great pity and wonder so sensitive an organ could not have caught something of the unpitied groans of those thousands, tortured with deliberate intent forever to disable or slowly murder.

The nation, perhaps, ought not to act from the savage precedents of these same rebels toward Union men in their hands, or from the swift, terrible retribution of the English on the Sepoys, or, perhaps, to fall short of Mr. BEECHER'S idea of magnanimity. But ought treason to be honored—ought it to be so much honored as to sanctify other horrible crimes done in its name and to carry out its designs?

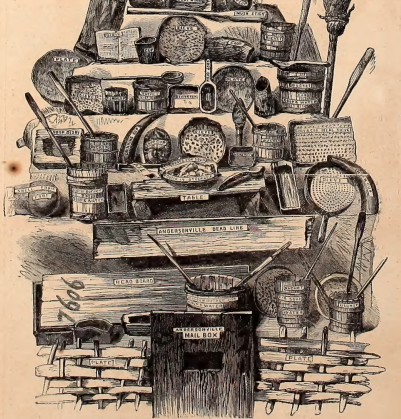
If, as seems likely, we are about to give treason special impunity from the risks attending other crimes, can we quite afford to allow even treason to gloss over Andersonville, Salisbury, Libby, and Belle Isle?—We thought of such questions as we stood before the Andersonville Relics at the National Fair now going forward at Washington.

These Relics vividly suggest the extremity of suffering, the despair, the hoping against hope, the fertility of pitiful helplessness during those awful days. Andersonville is a word of horror to the civilized world to-day; but a sight of these poor mementoes, that suggest the facts as no words can do, will give definite form and substance to what before was in many cases vague. One needs to examine them slowly and in detail to get the full purport and significance of each implement and the use it was intended to subserve.

Here is a number of pig troughs in miniature, dug out of little blocks with some hard, dull implement, and made to hold soup or mush.—Here is a piece of the "dead-line" board, to touch which was death. Here a bit of tin punched full of holes to sift the corn-cob meal a little. Near by is a bit of metal bent up for a spoon; the shell of a little turtle scooped out for an enviable soup bowl; pudding sticks and wooden spoons; a wooden mail box; a checker-board, and gourds and horns, and wattled flat basket-work for plates; water-buckets; soup bones, etc.

We could wish to see the culinary arrangements of "the martyr" at Fortress Monroe photographed by the side of these pitiful memorials of twelve thousand true Union men, dead victims of this man now imprisoned at the mouth of the Chesapeake.

The authenticity of these relics is placed beyond question by the source from which they come to this fair. To the forethought and care and rare good womanly sense, tenderness, and tireless activity of MISS CLARA BARTON the American people owe very much, as they will learn some day more fully. These relics were, of course, part of her care at Andersonville last summer when her expedition visited the stockade to mark the graves of the Union dead, and were collected by her then and there. She herself is near them in the Fair, and we would, if we dared, give the great American people, who so love and cherish her, a slight sketch of her appearance. It seems that as one is born with a gift for poetry, or music, or beautiful activity, so others seem born to be photographed. To this latter class our noble friend does not belong, at least we have seen no photograph that does her any justice. Sitting here this moment it seems as if we could, with a few words, make any one see her better than any photograph does. Crowning a firm, symmetrical figure, rather over than under medium size, are a large head and full face to which your attention is drawn by the positive character they betoken. A sweet smile that easily ripples into laughter lights up a face marked by rather prominent cheek-bones; she has large dark eyes that seem the smaller by not being prominent, and a mouth rather large and filled with fine teeth. Positive character—large capability, reticence, quiet, self-reliance, good health, and a tenderness that is at once womanly and strong—all specially manifest and all give assurance that she will do well and beautifully whatever she undertakes, and that she will readily undertake whatever needs to be done. The soldiers know and honor her most, for they recognize her as their efficient, persevering, and most unselfish friend.



The Congress of the United States never have done a more worthy, wise, or beneficent thing than when, unanimously and without one word of remonstrance or unfavorable comment from any source, that body granted her $15,000 to continue her present work of searching for the missing men of the army. In carrying out her beneficent plans of gathering up from surviving comrades the news of these men she had spent many thousands of dollars of her own funds. The number of these missing men is prodigious, and the work of searching for them has been very great; but the methodical, sagacious, and patient Miss Barton has filled large ledgers with her laborious researches in which thousands in the nation are vitally interested.

One thing we must not forget to mention in connection with the Andersonville relics. It is the original copy of the death register at Andersonville, made by Dorrence Atwater of Perryville, Connecticut, when he was confined there as a prisoner of war. This copy contains over 12,000 names of those dead, and furnished the first authentic intelligences our Government received of their fate. The public are getting a little familiar with the story of his making this copy at great personal peril, and of his bringing it through the lines to the Government; of his being dealt with in a most miserable, captious spirit by certain subordinates of the War Department; of his trial by court-martial for theft, in keeping these rolls which he had made and with the property in which he had never parted; and, finally, of his being found guilty, and of his being sent to Auburn State Prison, and of his detention there at hard labor for about three months—forming, in its full particulars, a record of peculiar cruelty and hardship, to which the attention of Congress may be profitably turned before its adjournment. Justice, though late, can not be forever delayed, even though the victim be a young soldier and the real malefactors hold official positions in the War Department.

INTERIOR OF MOUNTJOY PRISON, DUBLIN, IRELAND, WHERE THE FENIANS ARE CONFINED.—[See Page 462.]

KING JOHN OF SAXONY.

We give on page 461 a portrait of KING JOHN OF SAXONY, who, by reason of the Prussian invasion of his realm, is now an exile from his throne. He was born December 2, 1801, and was the son of KING MAXIMILIAN, who died in 1858, and of Princess CAROLINE OF PARMA. At the age of twenty, entering upon the duties of a Minister of Finance, he was elected President of the Council until 1831, when he retired to take a military command. As a member of the Upper Chamber he took an important part in the debates in the SAXON Diet, especially during the discussion of the Constitution, in 1831. He is a distinguished scholar, and in 1824 became President of the Society of Antiquaries of Saxony. He has twice visited Italy, and has published, under the pseudonym of PHILALETHES, a German translation of DANTE'S Divine Comedy. He succeeded upon the throne on the death of his brother, FREDERIC AUGUSTUS. He has three children—FREDERIC AUGUSTA MARY, born in 1828; MARIE ELISABETH, born in 1830; and FREDERIC AUGUSTUS GEORGE, born in 1838.

CAGING FENIANS IN DUBLIN.

We give on page 461 a view of the interior of Mountjoy Prison, Dublin, where the Fenian conspirators who were arrested, by way of precaution, under the Lord Lieutenant's warrant at the time of the suspension of the habeas corpus, are still kept in confinement. The railed inclosure, like an iron cage, in the centre of the yard, is the place where they are allowed to walk for exercise. They are obliged, even here, to keep at a certain distance from each other, and must not speak, but they contrive to make signs of talk on their fingers. A guard of two officers and thirty-six soldiers, besides the prison officials, is always on duty, so that the prisoners have no chance of breaking out by force. They are permitted to see their friends once a week, in the presence of two officials of the prison. The number of Fenians at present in Mountjoy Prison is 160, who will probably be discharged at the expiration of six months from the date of their arrest.

ARCHDUKE ALBERT.

ARCHDUKE ALBERT, whose portrait we give on page 460, has been appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Austrian army in Venetia. He has an army under him which numbers upward of 100,000 men—an army which bears the same relation to Italy which that under BENEDEK bears to Prussia, with, perhaps, the exception, that the former will, for the most part, maintain a defensive attitude. The Archduke has taken military possession of Verona, where he has his staff are directing the movements of the troops destined to defend the possessions of the "Tedesco" in Italy. The old town, so famous in story as the classical, is one of the bulwarks of peace in Italy, and is celebrated no less for its magnificent public buildings than for the beauty of its environs, for that it is so unrivalable place to be garrisoned, and the Austrians may well object to be turned out of it. Sixty-three miles west from Venice, with which it is connected by railway, Verona is situated where the last slopes of the Alps merge into the plains of Lombardy on both sides of the Adige, which traverses the town in a rapid torrent, and is crossed by four noble bridges. The fortifications, constructed by SANMICHELLI, were of great strength until dismantled by the French after the Treaty of Luneville; but others have taken their places, and the town is surrounded by lofty walls flanked with towers and bastions, and is entered by five gates remarkable for solidity and beauty.

Archduke ALBERT FERDINAND RUDOLPH, the eldest son of Archduke CHARLES and the Princess HENRIETTA of Nassau, was born on the 3d of August, 1817. Like all his peers, he received a complete scientific and military education, and, entering the army as an ensign, he advanced during years of peace, grade by grade, to the rank of Lieut.-General, and was at one time the commander of Upper and Lower Austria and Salzburg. He came into collision with a mob, which led to bloodshed. He gave orders to a portion of his infantry to disperse the crowd; the soldiers were attacked with clubs, and it is asserted by some and denied by others that he gave orders to his command to fire into the mob. At any rate, the affair became the occasion of so much ill-feeling that the Archduke resigned his command.

At a later period Archduke ALBERT joined the Italian army and accepted a division, but RADETZKY, although he was entitled to a much higher rank. He fought with great distinction at Mestara, where he came at an opportune moment to RENEDEK'S relief, and prevented the latter from being surrounded; also at NOVARA, where his cool circumspection contributed materially to the decisive victory of the Imperial army. After this latter battle ALBERT recommended that the Archduke should be made a Knight of the Order of Maria Theresa. In the course of the same year the Archduke was appointed Governor of Mantua, military commander in Bohemia, and a General of cavalry; and two years later he became Military Governor of Hungary. In this latter and most unenviable position he solved no party. The Magyars found fault with his strictness, and on the other hand he was blamed for want of promptness in suppressing the insurrectionary movement which, beginning in 1858, the next year grew into a formidable affair. In 1860 the Archduke retired from his Hungarian Governorship. In the mean while he had been engaged in diplomatic service at Berlin.

In the war of 1859 the Archduke took no part. He has lived since 1860 in Vienna, or in the castle of Weilburg at Baden. For two years he has been a Field-Marshal. In 1848 he married PRINCESS HILDEGARD, daughter of LOUIS, the Bavarian king; but his wife, April 2, 1864, and grief on account of his loss has so altered the Archduke ALBERT that he looks like a man of more than forty-eight years of age.

THE ITALIAN CAMPAIGN.

SCARCELY a week had elapsed after the declaration of war by the two allied Powers against Austria, when, on the 24th of JUNE, the Italian army, under VICTOR EMANUEL, ventured upon a general battle with the Austrian army on Venetia. The battle was fought on Sunday. The movement of the Italians was bold in the extreme; but it was just what every body expected, and the result also had been just that which might have been certainly predicted as inevitable under the circumstances. The Italians suffered a terrible defeat.

The Italian army, divided into three corps and a reserve—making up a force of from 80,000 to 90,000 combatants—after crossing the Mincio at Goito and other points on Saturday afternoon, and sealing or considering parties toward Peschiera and Verona, encamped from Pozzolengo to Solferino and Cavriana, between the two fortresses. On the ensuing morning an attempt was made upon those high positions of Sona, Somma Campagna, and Santa Giustina, which commands the fifteen miles' railway line joining the two strongholds, Peschiera which played a conspicuous part in the campaign of 1848. The object of the Italians was evidently to take possession of the railway, so as to isolate Peschiera and secure a basis of operations against Verona.

The Austrians, however, who were massed in great force at Verona, sallied forth from the place at daybreak, and, anticipating the Italian movements, took up their positions on the heights, which are now every where bristling with bastions and redoubts, and may be looked upon as mere outworks of the two citadels, Peschiera and Verona, or of one to those of the other. After a severe and bloody fight, as the Italians describe it, "desperate" struggle, which lasted nearly the whole day, the longest of summer days—the Imperial army was victorious along the whole line. They stormed the summit of Monte Croce, which is the highest of the line, the last, and at the close of the engagement, at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, they also carried the position of Custozza, a spot fatal to Italian arms on their encounter with RADETZKY in July, 1848. The victors captured several guns and about 2000 prisoners, and beloved, as the Archduke CHARLES's soldiers assures us, and as we may readily believe, with ever more than their ordinary bravery and endurance.

On the same evening the Italians were obliged to recross the Mincio, where it took up a position behind Goito, at Volta, Cavriana, and Solferino, or Castiglioni, and the Austrians occupied and closed the up to the latest accounts, and the intelligence of the disaster at Custozza will almost certainly induce Italy to abandon the campaign in Venetia.

On the Alps, while the Austrians have secured possession of the Stelvio Pass, and come down upon Bormio, in the Valtelline, the Garibaldians have pushed forward from Brescia to the Bridge of Caffaro and Ledrone, on that mountain pass, whence two roads branch off, the one to Trent and Riva on the Lake of Garda. At Ledrone they have driven the Austrians from their positions, not without bloodshed. This Alpine warfare has, however, only in accessory to the movements of the main armies in the plain, and these must be looked for in the paralyzed by the heavy blow with which the inconsiderate haste of the Italians has been visited, and by the reluctance of Austria to act otherwise than on the defensive.

In the battle of Custozza the Italians had seven of their Generals wounded, among others the King's second son, PRINCE AMADEUS, who has received at Brescia.

"An advance across the Mincio," says the London Times, "rightly into the heart of the Quadrilateral, is an enterprise which no other European army would undertake. Had Austrians been captured upon, beta-freely to do something seems to have possessed the whole Italian nation; and the men in command were not to be blamed, because their dashing their fields against those formidable stone walls. There may be bravery in no desperate an attempt to take the line of the Mincio; but we believe it would be impossible for the King or LA MARMORA to say what results they expected from their ill-concerted and ill-executed movement. It was a battle in which they staked the very existence of their army, while their enemies in the worst event had no other risk than that of losing what they already retired behind the shelter of their bastions. The least that may be said of it is, that, like the Balaklava charge, it was 'magnificent, but it was not war.' Ever since 1848 and 1849 the Austrians have strained every nerve to strengthen those fortresses, and have succeeded in making them so that the line between Peschiera and Verona especially is a vast intrenched camp. There is every probability, also, that the Austrians were on this occasion outnumbered by their enemies; for the Austrians have from 200,000 to 250,000 men in Venetia, and they had in front of them not only the Sardinian army, all engines of modern warfare, the railway, they had probably massed three-fourths at least of their troops in Verona, ready for the most powerful ballistic inroad. The Archduke's bulletins, in fact, spread visions of garrisons, "the bravest of the Imperial army" was in the field. The King of Italy has fallen back behind the Mincio, where he is not likely to be attacked, and where perhaps, with the condition of his shattered army enable him to resume the offensive for some time to come. We have no information as to numbers, but the Austrians crossed the Po at Polesella on the 23d. The tidings of the King's retreat, however, ought to disconcert all the plans of the commander of the Fourth Corps, as he would at Padua, or any where else on the line between Verona and Venice, fall in with forces with which his 60,000 men would be unable to contend. The Italian fleet, we learn from Florence, steamed from Taranto on the 23d; but if its destination be Venice, PERSANO is not likely to find any one to co-operate with him on the main land. The failure of the King on the Mincio will probably break down the whole enterprise."

The same journal indulges in the following comments on the situation:

"If there ever was a chance for diplomacy to step in with good effect between the ranks of the combatants it will be afforded now by this inevitable pause in military operations. The idea of an eventual, however remote and conditional, cession of Venetia has been entertained by the Emperor FRANCIS JOSEPH, and it has been under utterance in the moderate and dignified notes and manifestoes which have won so many partisans to the Austrian cause. Austria, we understood her to say, would not yield to compulsion, but would make the sacrifice of her rights, she would maintain the prestige of her military power. It was only after a battle and a victory that she could afford to be magnanimous. But she has come to pass sooner than could be expected. Three days have barely elapsed since the Austrians gained their victory, and she already fought her battle and won her victory. Enough has been done to gratify her pride: enough to show the heart toward those Italians whom she has found upon experience to be no contemptible enemies, and whom she must be aware that the Italian power to turn her out is staunch and very valuable friends. By merely opening a negotiation she would at once secure the support of Italy from the Franco-Prussian alliance, and be enabled at once to move from more than 200,000 of her best veteran troops, with an immense amount of matériel. All the success achieved by Prussia in Northern Germany during the last week has been more than overshadowed by the sudden and enormous accession of strength to her already powerful enemy. Indeed, Austria would at once find herself in the presence of such fearful odds that it may be questioned whether she would any longer feel equal to the contest.

"The settlement of the difference between two of the belligerent states, and the bringing the third to it—as Prussia and Italy only ventured on hostilities on the assurance of the support of powerful allies—would find Italy would not only free Austria from the necessity of fighting in the South, but even of maintaining an army on a first footing in Venetia. The Adriatic would be thrown into the scale against her adversary, and Prussia would be relieved from the fear of a hostile coup de main. Whatever leaning the German people may show toward Austria in the struggle, they would hardly refuse assistance to the Bund they may be in the South, or partial to Bismarck's scheme of a national Parliament in the North. Such a setting up of the Austrian power would be unjust to all, and that is their unqualified abhorrence for this fratricidal war. And the way to stop it before begun: hardly drop of German blood has been spilt; nothing has been done that may not be undone. Austria has only to relinquish, with a view to peace, between Austria and Italy covenant. Prussia of the hopelessness of a single-handed struggle, nothing more than to retain the Gastein annexation on the uti possidetis principle. They would be taken of the Austrian Southern frontier, and would have brought the two contending Powers to that point at which they might have arrived after a more severe struggle, to that frontier of the Main which will in all probability consider divide the North from the South of the Fatherland. Germany is now at war with Italy, and all the Austrian dependences too powerful, ever to be one; and it will be a happy day for Europe when that day shall arrive which has for more than a century distracted her councils and neutralized her power comes to be established, once and forever, on a natural and intelligent basis. If Prussia have the North, and her ambition will be at rest. Austria will exhibit a stronger determination than before her victory to humble both her enemies, if she be left to herself to achieve. Before this meets the eye of our readers the matter will probably have been already decided.

THE BROTHERS.

Nor far from Geneva there stands a fine old château, built in the seventeenth century, with its rose, misanthropic man, who mixed in no society, though, at the same time, he appeared to derive little pleasure from the profusion and luxury of the amenities with which, with a most lavish hand, his beautifully situated mansion had been surrounded. It was a fine property for sale, and much to the surprise of those who knew its value, passed—at a very moderate price—into the hands of a jeweler, well-known to many an English tourist, resident in Geneva.

Delighted at his bargain, Monsieur G. lost no time in making the necessary purchases to render the château to the taste of some "milord Anglais," who was certain to covet so lovely a spot for his winter residence.

He was right in his anticipation. A gentleman, with his wife and two daughters, soon established himself in the château, thus making the place not for the summer only, but by the year.

A few weeks elapsed, and they had begun to feel themselves at home in their pleasant dwelling, when, one evening Mr. M., while reading aloud to his family, encountered a difficult phrase, which it was impossible for him, by means of the context, to vary, and the younger sister, Emily, hastened to the library to procure that work.

She was gone much longer than was expected, and, when she did return, looked so pale and agitated that her mother anxiously inquired the cause.

"Well," was the reply, "I have had a fine adventure; but my ghost (for I have certainly seen one) was by no means terrible, and I don't know why I should feel afraid of it. It was a very handsome young man."

Pressed for details, the young lady related that she had seen nothing in her way to the library, but that on her return, just as she was descending the flight of steps which led to the terrace, she heard a step and, looking round, observed a young and handsome man in a naval uniform. He looked sadly at her for some moments, during which time she moved her eyes from his face, pointing with his finger to the side of the corridor, and vanished, as it seemed, into the wall.

This story was received, as the majority of such are destined to be, with some incredulity. Nevertheless, so much impressed was Mr. M. with what he had heard, that, when their daughters had retired, he and his wife rediscussed the matter, and came to the resolution that Mr. M. should visit the "haunted" corridor about the same hour, and see if any similar appearance would be vouchsafed to him.

Accordingly, on the following evening, he mounted guard, and walked to and fro for a considerable time without result. Tired at last of his vigil, he was wheeling round to commence what he had resolved should be his last turn, when he almost ran into the arms of a young naval officer, precisely answering the description given by his daughter. The figure pointed to the wall, and, before Mr. M. had fully regained his self-possession, disappeared.

Mr. M.'s countenance, on entering the drawing-room, sufficiently denoted that his search had been successful, but he declined to say what he had actually seen, and requested his family, for the present, to control their curiosity.

Early next morning he proceeded to Geneva, and called upon his landlord.

"I am come, Sir," he said, "to ask your permission to remove a portion of the wall in the corridor of the château." And finding the proprietor desirous, he at once related the whole apparition, adding that, unless his proposal were complied with, he must decline to continue a tenant of the mansion.

The landlord shrugged his shoulders, extended his palms, and, deciding within himself that this was but a new whim of that English eccentricity which it is equally impossible to comprehend and resist, gave the permission required.

Some persons being sent for, the work at once began. As it proceeded Mr. M. was much struck by the singular manner of the master mason, who, having first discharged the idea of disturbing the wall at all, threw every imaginable obstacle in the way, and subsequently, when his men had actually set to work, watched their proceedings with the utmost care, and face gradually becoming deadly pale.

An hour, however, elapsed before any discovery. At last one of the men at the end of the corridor was turned forth to the light the upright skeleton of a man, which, as the wall was removed, fell toppling forward into the visible world. At this sight the master mason reeled, and sunk upon the floor in a swoon.

Restoratives were administered, and the man was conveyed to Mr. M.'s study, where the latter, as soon as he was sufficiently recovered, questioned him as to the meaning of the strange thing that, in the event of his not relating all he had previously known concerning the bricking-up of the body, the authorities might attach to his own share in the business.

Under the influence of such arguments the man rallied, in a measure, and gathered courage. The circumstances here given he communicated in full.

A former possessor of the château—Monsieur Fermond—possessed a beautiful wife. They had no children.

One day Monsieur F. received a communication from the vote of a neighboring parish to the effect that his (Monsieur F.'s) brother had died suddenly, and that in his last moments he had expressed an earnest hope that Monsieur F. would assume the charge of his two sons.

A reply was forwarded, requesting that the boy might immediately repair to their uncle's house. In due course they arrived. The elder was a fine handsome youth, with frank, engaging manners; the younger, though handsome also, was reserved and unsociable, and the regards of the whole household were perfectly centred in the former, whose gayety soon dissipated the gloom of the château.

The younger brother, François, saw, with concealed jealousy, the decided preference which his uncle and aunt for his elder; nor was this sentiment likely to have been lessened by a fact that, before they had resided a year in the house, had by some means come to his knowledge—viz. that the whole of the property had been left to his elder brother, with the exception of a sum just sufficient to start him (François) in any profession he might select in which to earn his bread.

By the great kindness of Monsieur and Madame Frémont, Cécile, the elder, conceived a passion for the naval service, and, carrying his point, quitted the château, taking with him all the light and mirth it contained.

At first his letters were frequent, teeming with affection and contentment; then long intervals of silence would excite the apprehensions of his loving friends. The second winter after his departure was unusually severe, and the health of the old people began to fail.

One sad morning François, entering with a countenance of assumed grief, announced that the heartrending tidings, received, he said, through a shipmate of his brother's, that Cécile had died at sea. Already wretched by illness, the news was too much for the kind old people. Madame Frémont died within a few weeks; and before the close of the year her husband followed her to the tomb, having previously settled all he possessed upon his surviving nephew.

The latter, now at the height of his ambition, lorded it grandly over his dependents; and profound was the regret that the kind, mirthful Cécile had not lived to enjoy the master's position.

One evening François was sitting alone, moody and out of sorts, sipping his favorite wine, when he was startled by a voice speaking without the window, which looked upon the garden.

Advancing with caution, François demanded who was there.

"It is I, François!" replied a voice that blanched the heretofore cheek; but with trembling hands he opened the window, and his brother, radiant with health and happiness, bounded into the room. He had intended a surprise for his relatives, one whom (François having intercepted the correspondence on both sides) he had not heard for many months.

In one instant François comprehended his position and took his resolution. To his brother's eager inquiries he answered that their uncle and aunt, not being quite well, had dined up stairs, whither, after Cécile had refreshed himself, they would presently proceed.

Contriving, while Cécile was divesting himself of his over-coat, to secure the door, François returned to his brother, and, affecting to be overjoyed at his arrival, ordered wine to drink and talk until, wearied with excitement and his journey, the latter sank into a temporary doze.

It should be mentioned that at this time some confusion reigned at the chateau on account of altercations that were making in the house, and which necessitated the removal of a portion of the wall of the corridor. During this operation most of the domestics were quartered in an outbuilding some distance off.

No human eye witnessed the manner in which this true descendant of Jim that did the first murder completed what was in his mind. He presently quitted the room, locking the door, and desiring that he might be disturbed no more that night.

When all was still he crept forth and made his way to the lodging of the master mason. What passed between them was never exactly known, but on the following morning, the mason, assisted by his tenyter, contrived to wall up the remains of the victim, where they were subsequently discovered.

Tormented by remorse, the form of his brother ever before him, the wretched criminal at length dismissed his household, sold the chateau, and proceeded to Paris, hoping in that lively city to drown the remembrance of his flagrant guilt. But vengeance "suffered him not to live." A quarrel with the Comte de C, in a gaming-house led to a meeting next day in the Bois de Boulogne, in which François was killed. Singularly enough, among his papers was found a confession of the murder, though bearing his assumed name.

The remains of poor Cécile were decently interred in the cemetery of Charonne. The M. family continued their residence at Belle D., and certainly, up to the time when I (the narrator) made their acquaintance, nothing extraordinary had ever again disturbed their tranquillity.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1850 that this Compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a disagreeable cough. I had for some months previous thought that a preparation, having for its basis the inside bark of white pine, could be compounded so as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in diseases similar to that which I supposed a small quantity of the Medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was accordingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough entirely left, and a speedy cure was effected. Since this I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering for some weeks with a bad cough, occasioned by a sudden cold, and had raised means streaked with blood. She used it freely, and sent for more. She took about ten ounces of it, and got well. In November, 1850, I first advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled.—Boston Journal.

This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the test of extensive use in the New England States, where its merits have become a household word. It cures one throat, coughs, diphtheria, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally. It is a sure cure for diabetes, bleeding from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel; and for piles and scurvy it will be found valuable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicine generally.

Cheering Facts for the Bilious.

Every day demonstrates more clearly that Liver Complaint, in all its distressing forms, can be controlled and cured without difficulty or inconvenience. It is an obstinate disease, but its obstinacy is not proof against the persistent, remedial, and restorative operation of HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS. That genial corrective compels the organs to do its duty. It must secrete regularly and healthfully under the influence of the Bitters. Their action brings it back from a state of rebellion into perfect harmony with the laws of health. If there is costiveness, it disappears; if there is side-ache or backache, it cease; if the skin and the whites of the eyes are tinged with superfluous bile, they recover their natural hue: if the appetite is gone, it returns; if the digestion is impaired, it is restored; in brief, whatever the symptoms of the complaint may be, and whatever the phase it has assumed, a cure is certain. Such are the uniform effects of this preparation where bilious disease has been already developed; but in cases where there is merely a constitutional tendency to liver complaint, it may be prevented throughout life by the regular use, in small quantities, of this palatable medicine. These are proved facts, and should be silently pondered—or, rather, they should be promptly acted upon—by all persons of bilious habit.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the following Works by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States on receipt of the Price.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION. By ALFRED H. GUERNSEY and HENRY M. ALDEN. Part I.: From the Beginning of the Conspiracy to the Close of the Peninsular Campaign of 1862. With more than Five Hundred Illustrations. [This Volume consists of nearly 400 pages in large folio, each equivalent to 6 octavo pages. The Volume thus contains as much matter as 5 ordinary octavo volumes.] Price $6 00, in Cloth, Gilt, with Beveled Edges.

☞ Liberal Terms to Agents.

NAPOLEON'S CÆSAR. The History of Julius Cæsar. By His Imperial Majesty NAPOLEON III. Vol. II. Superfine Edition, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 50.

After no little delay this second installment of Napoleon's Life of Cæsar is made public—more than a year having elapsed between the issue of the first and second volumes. Comprising the events which lie between the appointment of Cæsar to the Governorship of Gaul and the crossing of the Rubicon, this second volume contains some of the most interesting and important circumstances of the great Roman's life, from which the imperial author does not fail to deduce political lessons and to suggest political parallels, more or less acceptable according to the creed of the reader, but always full of meaning. Since the publication of the first volume "Cæsarism" has become a creed and a party-word, and men will look into the present volume as anxiously as they would look into those of a Sybilline book—seeking to discover thereby the will of the gods and the fate of empires. They will find material for speculation, whichever way they read the imperial mind.—Athenæum.

ANDERSONVILLE PRISON. A Narrative of Andersonville, drawn from the Evidence elicited on the Trial of Henry Wirz, the Jailer. With the Argument of Colonel N. P. Chipman, Judge-Advocate. By AMBROSE SPENCER. 12mo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

The evidence upon the trial of Henry Wirz is confirmed by the personal experience of the author, who, during the Wirz, lived within nine miles of the prison-pen at Andersonville. The story is so sad as says that history records; but it is one that ought not to be forgotten, and which can never be truly told as now. Mr. Spencer, whose sturdy fidelity to the Union was conspicuous through the War, who maintained in the very heart of the Rebellion the indefeasible loyalty to which the South must owe its future guidance, and who was a sympathizing witness of the sorrows which he records, has told us a chou observer of the spirit of the population—wifes with intense and sober feeling. But he does not dwell upon the general horror. He aims to present a faithful abstract of the evidence and the terrible record. It is a chapter of history which should be of the truest service as illustrating the spirit of the Rebellion.—Harper's Weekly.

GREAT FIRE IN PORTLAND, MAINE—TENTS AMONG THE RUINS.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

THE PORTLAND FIRE.

No fire which has ever been inflicted upon an American town has been so ruinous, in its proportion of loss to the wealth of the city, as that which, beginning in Portland on the evening of July 4, raged with unabated fury for over twenty-four hours, destroying before its close one-third of the city. When the morning papers of this great seaport announced on the morning of the 4th that the pyrotechnic display of that evening would be of unusual magnificence, they did not foresee in what direful sense their prediction would be fulfilled before the day closed.

The fire began, it seems, in a small boat-builder's shop between Commercial and Fore Streets. It spread to UPHAM'S flouring mill, and thence to the sugar-house of JOHN B. BROWN & SONS. Thence the flames were caught by some Irish huts at GRAHAM'S corner. Short work was made of these; and the fire, fed by a gale from the south, marched on, fighting its way through the principal retail business houses of the town to the new City Hall. Every thing in its path was reduced to a smoking ruin.

The City Hall, a magnificent structure with a depth of 250 feet, and a façade of Nova Scotia freestone 175 feet long, was supposed to be fireproof, and fortuitous to the value of a quarter of a million of dollars had been stored in it to secure it against destruction. But this fine building was almost entirely destroyed, only the front walls being left standing.

The fire swept completely through the city from High Street to North Street on the Company, destroying every thing on its way so completely that the lines of the streets can hardly be traced, and a space of one and a half miles long and half a mile wide, appears like a forest of chimneys, with fragments of walls attached to them.

More than one-third of Portland was destroyed. All the banks, newspaper offices, the wholesale and dry-goods stores, the telegraph offices—in fine, all places of business, except the busy haunts of Commercial Street, were destroyed. Seven hotels were burned and eight churches. The loss in property was over two millions of dollars.

All the German families in the city were made homeless. The number of people of all classes who were thrown into the street was upward of 12,000, of whom only about one hundred had a part of their in the tent's which had been promptly sent to their relief. The whole city, in fact, had been rendered homeless were in houses, open fields, and in tents, barns, and sheds. Many of the people of them upon the watch their little stock of goods. Some had saved a hoop skirt and a stove; other a tin dipper and a couple of chairs; a tea-kettle and a pair of parlor pictures, a washstand and boots, and all such miscellaneous collections in small quantities. Famous were numerous, and quite a number of families saved their piano and a cat. One man, worth in the morning over $50,000, pulled a pair of his wife's boots out of his pocket, and said, "I was all he had saved."

The scene presented at the old City Hall, where the rations were distributed, was worthy of note. Here all day long were men, women, and children, American, Germans, and Irish, all huddled together, each awaiting their food, which had been sent from various quarters, and which they received with hearty thanks and joyful countenances.

ZEBULA CRESSEY, a truckman, and his mother, were burned to death in their house on Larch Street. The bodies were discovered on the 9th.

Portland, Maine, is ranked as the fourth or fifth city in the Union in exports. Her progress has been rapid for the last twenty years. Every great city in the country has been visited by nearly with her loss by forwarding contributions for the benefit of the homeless. Montreal, in Canada, has contributed over $40,000. Those contributions can not be too prompt or too generous. Every dollar will go to the alleviation of real distress.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 28, 1866.

THE CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS.

THE question to be decided in the autumn Congressional elections of 1866 is hardly less important than that of the Presidential election of 1864. At that time the question was whether the Democratic party, whose policy had produced the war, whose Southern leaders conducted it, and which, as a party, although with conspicuous exceptions of certain individual Democrats, justified the rebellion and opposed the war measures of the government, should be intrusted with the control of the Government. The response was prodigious. Every loyal State but Kentucky, Delaware, and New Jersey sustained the Union party. At this time the question is whether the Democratic party, with its tendency and policy clearly understood, shall determine the principles upon which the late rebel States shall resume their full relations in the Union. Is the Democratic view of the situation true, is the Democratic interpretation of the Constitution more just, is the spirit of the Democratic party more favorable to justice, equal liberty, and reverence for law, than those of the Union party. These are the questions which must determine our votes in the coming elections.

It may be true—indeed for ourselves we have not hesitated to say that it is true—that many foolish words have been spoken and some unwise measures adopted by Congress. Nor do we care to exterminate and upset that this Congress has been more fiercely vituperated than any of its predecessors. We have not to deal at the elections with the politeness or tact either of Congress or the President, nor do we need with the uniform wisdom of the Congressional measures. The point is a fundamental principle. Every measure of the action of Congress might have been improved in certain ways, is it probable that the action of the Democratic minority would have been, either in detail or in general policy, better for the peace and union of the country? Had the party of that minority been in the ascendant the test oath would have been repealed; Senators and Representatives like ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS and HERSCHEL V. JOHNSON would have been admitted; the Civil Rights Bill would have failed; and in a word, the men who, supported by their States, five years ago repelled and withdrew from Congress, and engaged in the rebellion, would have returned by the "continuous right" of those States, and those who had tried to destroy the Government and still declared their right to do so, would have voted upon every measure touching not the future security of the Union and country against the logical consequences of their doctrines.

Would this have been a wise policy or safe for the country? Yet this is the policy upon which the autumn elections are to pronounce. The Democratic party holds that, having been driven their country, the States lately in rebellion are exactly where they were before. The consequences of such a doctrine are plain. It assumes that a constitutional right remains to them to destroy the Union by war, and that the people of the loyal States who defeat the conspiracy in the field can rightfully take no further step whatever to secure the victory they have won. The Union party claims that loyal citizens, after so long and vital a war, have exactly the same right to secure their victory that they have to win it; and consequently that when the attempt of a combination of States to wrest themselves from the constitution of the Union fails, none of those States can resume their full functions in the Union except upon such conditions as a truly sagacious policy shall determine.

It must be remembered that it is not a question of more or less conditions, but of any condition whatever. The Democratic orators and papers ask distinctly what right have the insurgents have not complied with certain conditions. But neither they nor those who have been defeated acknowledge that right to compliance. Indeed, the Democratic theory and policy condemn the President equally with Congress, for to lend no more verbal constitutional authority to require assent to the emancipation amendment than Congress has to require assent to the new amendment regulating representation. States with what Mr. SEWARD calls the "inherent right" of equality with all other States can no more be required to adopt one amendment than another. The present co-operation of the Democratic party with the President, therefore, does not spring from love of him but from hate of Congress, and a very natural wish of our opposition party to divide the Executive and Legislative power.

Can a party which holds and proclaims the policy which we have described be safely intrusted with the government of the country that the sentiment of the war? Ought any thoughtful and honest citizen, however impatient he may be of the follies of certain men, to suffer his impatience to blind him to the fact that the elections are to decide whether the friends and the spirit of ABRAHAM LINCOLN shall recognize the Union, or the friends and spirit of HORATIO SEYMOUR and VALLANDIGHAM. There are not two parties—there can not be. Under the circumstances a Philadelphia orthodoxy must be as fatal to the cause of equal rights and just government and constitutional peace in this country as a candidate of Tammany Hall. Let us improve Congress in the ability and purity of its members as much as possible. But let all true men beware of a sophistry which would make Mr. "JACK DOLEFUL" the leader of a majority instead of a minority.

"FASTENING A QUARREL" UPON THE PRESIDENT.

WE are surprised and sorry to see in the New York Evening Post an assertion that Congress has "fastened a quarrel" upon the President. Certainly the facts do not justify the statement.

At the time of the President's accession to office leading members of Congress had the very best reason for believing that he did not seriously differ with them upon the vital question of the Union party. During the following summer the President's speeches to various committees from the Southern States, and such acts as the pardoning of General HUMPHREYS that he might be Governor of Mississippi, created some uneasiness as tending to complicate the situation. But the Executive action altogether was regarded as an experiment; and it was undoubtedly supposed by the Union party that the whole question of the resumption of their full relations in the Union by the late insurgent States would be referred by the President to Congress, in accordance with the views of the lamented LINCOLN, whose mild wisdom and generous fidelity to the fundamental principle of the American Government it was hoped and believed his successor would follow. "I distinctly stated," said President LINCOLN, in his last public speech, alluding to his action in Louisiana, "that this was not the only plan which might possibly be acceptable; and I also distinctly protested that the Executive claimed no right to say when or whether members should be admitted to seats in Congress from such States."

It was not until Congress assembled and immediately proceeded to act upon the subject, that the unpleasant probability of a difference and division between the Executive and Legislative branches became apparent. It then gradually appeared that the President considered the case to be virtually closed; that he thought he had a right to require conditions, but that Congress had not; that he was of opinion either that no security for the future could be taken, or that he had taken all that was necessary; and that Congress was only competent to receive or reject members claiming seats from South Carolina, as it did of those appearing from Iowa or New York, that they should take the oath. Until this was perfectly evident, this paper certainly counseled forbearance and a determination of co-operation upon the part of Congress. The harmony of the two branches of the Government was a point of so great importance as to be worth a strong effort, even to the surrender of unimportant details. Differing in theory, we still hoped that some common ground of action satisfactory to the saving Union sentiment of the country might be found. This was the hope of wise men in Congress. It was only a hope, however, and was shortlived. Both Mr. SEWARD and Mr. STEVENS were unquestionably rude and exasperating in the terms in which they spoke of the President. But had they spoken with the suavity of Mr. RAYMOND, does the Evening Post think the "quarrel" could have been avoided?

Unless, therefore, to disagree with the President upon the question of the scope of the executive power, and upon the necessity and true constitutional policy of the situation—in a word, upon the principle which required no surrender its views to the wishes of the President be to "fasten a quarrel" upon him, it is impossible to sustain the charge of the Post.

THE FINANCIAL CRISIS ABROAD—AND AT HOME.

MORE than two months have elapsed since the financial crisis broke out in England, and yet failure succeeds failure, the bank-rate is still ten cent., and New York correspondents of London houses are urgently requested to remit as largely as possible. The trouble, it seems, was more deeply seated than appeared at first. Overtrading, in the first place; a system of banking which reminds one of our wild-cat banks of the past; and a series of mercantile and financial operations based upon a prevailing belief in the final disruption of the United States, seem to have sapped the foundations of British credit, and gradually created a state of things so rotten as to be almost without parallel.

The chief trouble now comes from Bombay, where banks and merchants are breaking in rapid succession. This is a direct consequence of the termination of our war. Bombay rose from a third to the fourth place of trade in consequence of the cessation of cotton exports from this country. Merchants accumulated immense fortunes in a single year. The town grew like magic. Public buildings—all erected since 1861—vied with those of the ancient capitals of Europe. It became the best market in the world for large diamonds. All this was the work of cotton. A rational observer, noting this magical development of wealth and its cause, would have expected a reaction. Not so the English, who own Bombay and control its trade. They were sure that the American cotton trade was done forever, or at all events for a generation or two, and they invested their money in Indian plantations, mercantile houses, banks, public improvements, etc., in Bombay, without stint or condition. The consequence is, when cotton fell 50 per cent. in a few weeks, can be readily imagined. One house is mentioned, which lost £15 a bale on 30,000 bales—a bagatelle of £450,000 sterling. One after another the great houses and banks which grew up on the outbreak of our war are going down upon the suppression of the rebellion, and are carrying down with them their British correspondents.

As to the limited liability banks of London, they seem to have done business with a looseness which would have horrified even GEORGE SMITH of Chicago. They received money on deposit subject to call after a given notice (10 to 30 days), and allowed 3 @ 5 per cent. interest. With the money they speculated in miscellaneous securities—rebel cotton bonds, Peruvian mines, Mexican scrip, Turkish debentures, Atlantic and West Western bonds, Erie debentures, railroads in Europe, Australia, and Africa, telegraphs in India, blockade-runners running to Charleston or Wilmington, plantations on the banks of La Plata, and copper-mines in New Zealand. Nothing came amiss to them. The more prudent among them did not actually buy these securities, but lent money on them—which, as the case turned out, amounted to the same thing. Any bank clerk in New York could have foretold the result. A day came when the depositors wanted their money. As always happens, at that particular time there was no market for the miscellaneous securities in which these banks had invested their capital and their depositors' money, and they went down one after another. If such a thing had happened here what homilies our British friends would read us on the unsoundness of American banking, and the criminal misappropriation of other people's money!

A banker in Paris writes to a friend on this side to say that the recent bank failures in London have checked the flow of Continental capital to that centre, and that were our financial system on a sounder basis much more would come here. We commend the observation to the notice of the Secretary of the Treasury. Were a United States bank at the present time really worth a dollar, instead of sixty-five cents, we should now be receiving a steady flow of capital from Europe, and the movement would have begun which, sooner or later, will render New York the financial centre of the world. But how can we expect capital to come here while we refuse to take no measures to rehabilitate our depreciated currency, but actually prohibit by statute the only process by which it can be restored to its full value? It would be folly for Europeans to send money to us just now. What is money with them is merchandise with us; a European capitalist sending money here to be invested in trade or industry necessarily takes the risk of a further depreciation of the currency; when he wants his money back he may find that 25 per cent. have been lost by the exchange in gold which he could neither foresee nor prevent. How can we expect sagacious capitalists to invest their money in a country whose legislators know so little of political economy that they try to limit its importations by imposing heavy duties on foreign manufactures, and at the same time offer every facility for the coordinate bank expansion?

A careful study of the commercial crisis in Europe may not be without benefit to the Secretary of the Treasury warned us, in his annual report, that we had the option of what measures which do not seem in the least likely to be adopted, a financial crash was inevitable within a given period. That opinion is shared by all reflecting persons in commercial circles. And there are not wanting superstitious people to remind us that by some strange accident we have had a panic of late in this country every ten years: in 1827, in 1837, in 1847, and in 1857. These fatalists warn us to set our houses in order for the coming year—1867.

The public is entitled to the more weight than Mr. MILLER'S announcements of the approaching end of the world, for the simple reason that every one knows that we can not go on trading and speculating on a paper currency basis for many years without a crash. If every body expects it to come off next year and prepares accordingly, it will be postponed. If Mr. M'CULLOCH uses the powers invested in him, and locks up currency enough to bring gold down and check importations and speculation, it may be averted altogether. But if Mr. M'CULLOCH continues to keep money easy, and people generally act as though the crisis were a thing in the indefinite future, it is quite likely that the commercial history of the coming year may prove as momentous and as full of disaster as that of any of the past ill-omened "sevens."

FREE SPEECH.

WE have a letter from an esteemed correspondent in a Southern city, informing us that the public sentiment of the community in which he lives is so intolerant as to be selling Harper's Weekly that his business has sustained serious injury. We are sorry to hear it, both for the sake of our friend and of the people of his neighborhood. A year or two before the war there was a silly fellow named HAMBLETON, or BUMBLETON, who came all the way from Montgomery to New York to get a library on a black-list of the merchants in this city who were not friendly to "the South"—meaning those who did not believe in slavery and support it by their votes and acts. Is there a race of HAMBLETONS or BUMBLETONS who suppose such folly can result advantageously for any body?

We do not suppose that the views which are advanced in this and pen in this paper are approved by all who buy and read it any more than we approve the opinions or the method or the tone of scores of papers that reach us from the South, West, and East. But what then? We ask any sensible Southern man, however heartily he may have supported the rebellion, and however ready he may be to assert our opinions, whether he does not know that henceforward the only safety for all of us lies in the open and constructive discussion of. He may not choose to read books and papers and magazines whose sentiments he dislikes, but does he seriously believe it advisable that they should be suppressed? Is it safe for him or for any one that only a literature favorable to what are called "Southern" interests and views and principles shall be known in his neighborhood? This policy is but a lingering relic of the old despotism of slavery, which hung and burned and tarred and feathered those who said what it did not like to hear, and succeeded in keeping the mass of the Southern people in that profound ignorance which alone made the rebellion possible. It is the absurd old attempt to ostracize opinion which can have but one result, and that is general disaster.

There are very profound differences of opinion in this country upon the most important questions. We have our own convictions, and we are very sure that our fellow-citizens at the South and elsewhere have theirs. When we differ, we propose to use every honorable means at our command to expose the weakness or the danger of our adversary's opinion. By wit, satire, argument, ridicule, and appeal—by faithful picture and allegory and caricature we intend to bombard and harass whatever seems to us opposed to the public welfare. And we expect and invite an equal opposition, which we have not failed steadily to receive for a twelvemonth past from those who do not like our views or our methods of enforcing them. But what could be more exquisitely ludicrous than for us gravely to advise our friends not to buy the Atlantic, or the Examiner, or the New Era, or whatever the paper may be, which abuses us and the "North," and to invite all loyal Union people not to buy their books of Mr. JOHN P. MC. SMITH, for instance, because they sell those naughty papers?

If those at the South who do not like certain views refuse to have them discussed, they will be beaten again and again, and remain forever impotent and ridiculous. Wake up, gentlemen! It is no longer yesterday. Read the papers. Find out what people are thinking of and talking about. Stand your ground bravely. Don't give us who oppose you a triumph by trying to gag instead of argue. Let every man among you at the South, as here at the North, say and hear and write and read what he will, and we shall all be the gainers. But make up your minds, after all, that the great questions which divide us are to be settled, and to be settled only by the most serious and intense discussion. You have never had it in your part of the country. No man dared to call his soul his own, for instance, in talking about slavery. Those who went from other quarters to discuss the subject you shot, or hung, or rode on rails, or tarred and feathered, or sent off by Vigilance Committees. You had it your own way. Your opponents in speech upon the point must yield to your own interests and to ours. And you have learned, what will be always true in this country wherever a similar experience is had, that your words were merely stirring on the safety-valve. It is a process which may postpone the explosion, but it can not prevent it, and it multiplies the havoc a thousandfold. And all that you are now invited because injustice and a false political philosophy are zealously attacked, and by every kind of weapon, to think the attack unfair, prove it to be so. If you think the philosophy true, defend it. Stand to your guns! But don't pout and sulk and spite yourselves, like foolish children.

THE OTHER PHILADELPHIA CONVENTION.

THE importance of the call of a Convention of Southern loyal Union men issued by General A. J. HAMILTON of TEXAS and others can not be overlooked. It is one of the most promising signs of the times, for it reveals the existence of two parties in that region. It shows that there is a body of citizens there who intend to contest the political supremacy of the late rebel chiefs, who, since the surrender of LEE, have controled political action in their States.

Thus the manly and heroic call, which is echoed from all the ancient dominion of slavery in favor of equal rights, is not only full of hope in itself, but it immediately defines the RANDALL-BROWNLOW Philadelphia Convention to be merely a movement, as we stated last week, for the reorganization of the Democratic party. Governor ORR, an old Democratic and Secession leader of South Carolina, Mayor MONROE, of New Orleans, who, on the Fourth of July, called the Declaration of Independence a lie, and other gentlemen of the same principles and of similar record will be present at that Convention. But those whom neither Governor ORR nor Mayor MONROE nor Judge SEMMES nor Governor HENDERSON will introduce into secession—those whose properties were destroyed, whose families were hunted, whose friends and neighbors and children were hung and shot and tortured and exiled by the followers of ORR, MONROE, SEMMES, and HUMPHREYS—these are the men who will be represented in the other Convention.

And it is with them and their friends, with the voters against THROCKMORTON in Texas, and the supporters of free papers in the Southern States, that the political alliance of the Union party must be made, so that the party may have an efficient organization in every State. Whether the Republican party has done its work or not, it is very clear that the Union party has not. For it must not be forgotten that those who will send delegates from the late rebel States to the RANDALL-HENDRICKS Convention—that is to say, the Southern and the controlling wing of the Democratic party—still maintain the sovereignty of States, and the consequent constitutional right of secession. Whatever individuals may have said, the ordinance conclusively proves that, while the mass acquiesce in the superior power, they deny the superior right of the Union. Indeed, they ask, and their friends echo, whether we suppose they have changed their views?

Certainly we do not; and certainly men who have not changed the views which, in their minds, justified what we hold to be so senseless a war upon the Union can not wisely be trusted with the control of the Union. Men very arguments they use incontestibly prove that the most stringent political opposition to them is essential to the national welfare. We hope, therefore, that the Philadelphia Committee will take every step necessary to secure the active organized co-operation of that large body of American citizens who are represented in the Convention of the Southern loyal Unionists.

THE CASE OF THE "METEOR."

THE decision of Judge BETTS condemning the Meteor is a declaration that United States ship-owners can not sell them to belligerents with whom we are at peace. The Neutrality Laws of 1818 denounce the "fitting out and arming" vessels in our ports against such powers. But do they, by implication, forbid certainly do not expressly, forbid such trade? This is the point which Mr. BOUTWELL of Massachusetts proposes shall be made perfectly plain in our laws.

The Meteor was seized on the 21st of January last on a charge of being "fitted out" in defiance of law. It was not alleged that this was being done directly by the owners or agents, but that there was an understanding between them and certain Fenian agents that the ship should be set to Panama and there transferred. Of this intention no evidence was offered at the trial; but even had it been conclusively proved, it is not plain in law, to precedent, and good policy that such traffic with belligerents should condemn the ship?

The earlier decision did not deny the legality of the trade. The Supreme Court of the United States in 1822 declared, in the case of the Santissima Trinidad, "There is nothing in our laws or in the law of nations that forbids our citizens from sending armed vessels, as well as munitions of war, to foreign ports for sale. It is a commercial adventure which a nation is bound to prohibit, and which only exposes the persons engaged in it to the penalty of confiscation," of course, by one of the belligerents. As lately as 1863 Judge BETTS held in his annual Message, said, "The laws of the United States do not forbid their citizens to sell to either of the belligerent powers articles contraband of war, or to fit out armed ships of war or soldiers on board their private ships for transportation." If this be lawful, can the law be infringed by selling the vessel when a ship before it is fully armed or equipped?

Judge BETTS reverses the decision of Judge STORY in the case of the Santissima Trinidad. Doubtless the Attorney-General of the Department, which may wish to urge in an Alabama controversy our neutral superiority. But the strength of such unquestioned precedents is not to be lightly regarded, and it can only be weakened by manufactured precedents. It is, however, clearly desirable that the point shall no longer be open to doubt. Let Congress determine whether an American citizen may sell a ship adaptable to war to a belligerent with whom we are at peace.

The fullest and much the ablest review of the case of the Meteor was lately communicated to the Boston Advertiser by GEORGE BEMIS, one of our most accomplished and patient students of international law.

A DANGEROUS ARGUMENT.

IN his closing speech upon the tariff we observe that MR. MORRILL spoke of "hired hack writers" as "particularly active in defaming the motives of the tariff men." Surely Mr. MORRILL should choose so to describe the papers which support free trade; and why "hired hack writers?" Suppose that we should say that the free trade papers are bought by foreigners, and particularly active in defaming the advocates of free trade. It would be following a very bad example, but it would surely be a very good argument.

A writer who expresses the conclusions of the most acute thinkers upon political economy, because his clear-sighted mind sees the reasons of them, and who has no pecuniary interest which could affect his views, ought surely to be safe from aspersion of his motives. Such a writer might be tempted to retort. If the question were of "hired" advocacy, he might inquire whether Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS or Mr. GREELEY were interested in the iron manufactures, whether Mr. GRINNELL were a wool-grower, whether Mr. RICE were interested in paper, and whether Mr. MORRILL held any stock in marble quarries or works. This kind of argument is a two-edged sword. It cuts before and behind. It is quite as likely to wound the assailant as the assailed.

In the same style the tariff papers call the free trade journals "hired presses," "purchased journalists," "political hacks," "interested politicians," "pecuniary interest," "dumb dogs of free trade," while the free traders retaliate by calling the tariff "monstrous," "plunder," "robbery," "swindling compromise," "atrocious swindle." This is absurd. The impression conveyed by each side is that the other is venal, and the argument is consequently incalculably weakened. We have no doubt that Mr. MORRILL is sincerely persuaded that protection is the true policy for this country. But if, upon that abstract question, this journal or any other disagrees with him, is it necessarily because the writers are "hired hacks," or "paltry pettifoggers," or "liars," or "dogs?" May it not be because they are just as competent to have and able to maintain an opinion as Mr. MORRILL? Good manners never hurt a good cause.

INTERESTING INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

July 19:—

In the Senate, Mr. Trumbull called up the House bill defining the number of Judges of the Supreme Court and changing the judicial districts, and moved an amendment, which was agreed to, reducing the number of Associate Judges to six. The bill provides:

Sec. 1. That hereafter the Supreme Court of the United States shall consist of one Chief Justice and eight Associate Justices.

Sec. 3. That the First and Second Circuits shall remain as now established; that the districts of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware shall constitute the Third circuit; that the districts of Maryland, Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina shall constitute the Fourth circuit; that the districts of Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas shall constitute the Fifth circuit; that the districts of Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky, and Tennessee shall constitute the Sixth circuit; that the districts of Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin shall constitute the Seventh circuit; that the districts of Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, and Arkansas shall constitute the Eighth circuit; and the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada shall constitute the Ninth circuit.

The amendment which Mr. Trumbull was instructed by the Judicial Committee to offer provides: "That no vacancy in the office of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court shall be filled by appointment until the number of associate justices shall be reduced to six; and the said Supreme Court shall consist of the Chief Justice of the United States and six associate justices, any four of whom shall constitute a quorum, and the said court shall hold one term annually at the seat of government, and such additional special terms as they may find necessary for the dispatch of business." Mr. Trumbull called up the bill to change the public grounds surrounding the Capitol, which was passed. Its provisions are as follows:

That the public grounds surrounding the Capitol shall be enlarged according to the plan approved by the committee on Public Buildings of the Senate and House of Representatives, submitted to Congress at this session, and to be deposited in the custody of the Secretary of the Interior, by extending the same from Sixth and First Street West, in the following manner: Northwardly, to the south side of B Street North, and southwardly to the north side of South B Street, including, in addition to the ninth of the square now occupied, such other as are necessary for such extension, the two square designated on the plan of the city of Washington as Nos. 637 and 638 respectively.

Sec. 2. Provides that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to purchase from the owner or owners thereof, at such price as, according to the actual cash value as may be mutually agreed on between the Secretary and such owner or owners, or ascertained by the appraisement made by the commission of him in their report to Robert Todd, United States Attorney for the District of Columbia, on the twenty-first day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, all the private grounds as are necessary for carrying the act into effect, the value of the property so purchased to be paid to the owner or owners thereof out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, on the delivery of the deed thereof, provided that before such payment shall be made the owner or owners of such property shall execute, duly, good and sufficient deed or deeds, in due form of law, and approved by the Attorney-General of the United States, releases and convey to the United States all their and each of their several and respective rights in and title to such land and property as aforesaid.

The third section authorizes the appraisement of such property, if the Secretary of the Interior and the owners shall be unable to agree as to price.

The seventh section appropriates fifty thousand dollars to carry the act into effect, and requires grounds so purchased.

In the House, the Tariff bill was passed, 84 to 53.

July 11:

In the Senate, the bill regulating the time and manner of electing United States Senators was passed, 25 to 11. The bill does not affect the present choice by ballot, and requires an open or viva voce vote in all cases.—A resolution vesting the right and privilege of using the Washington Atlantic telegraph cable in the American Atlantic Company of New York was passed.

July 12:

In the Senate, the Tariff bill was received from the House, and referred to the Committee on Finance.—A report next December.

July 13:

In the Senate, the Niagara Ship Canal bill was postponed until December next, by a vote of 24 against 13.

In the House, the bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year ending June 30, 1867, and other amendments passed was one appropriating $10,000 for additional light-houses and light-boats along the coast of New Jersey, between Sandy Hook and Little Egg Harbor, and $5,000 for repairing the light-house and light-boat at Tucker's Beach, on the coast of New Jersey. The bill was then passed.—Mr. Morrill, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a new tariff bill, which is a revision of the one lately passed and committed.—The Pennsylvania contested election case being under consideration, a resolution retaining Mr. Dawson in his seat was adopted.

July 14:

In the Senate, the House resolution to appoint a joint committee on the subject of retrenchment, to sit during the recess, was adopted, with amendments so as to apply to the military and naval as well as civil service, and charging the committee to inquire into the expediency of changing the method of appointment to civil office so that it shall be by election instead of by.

In the House, the bill authorizing the construction of a railroad bridge over the Mississippi was passed.

July 16:—

In both Houses, the President's Message, vetoing the Freedmen's Bureau Bill, was read, and with most precipitancy both bodies assembled in the room over the rotunda.

July 14 to 23; in the Senate, 23 to 12.

RETURN IN THE CABINET.

Postmaster-General Randall has resigned his position in the Cabinet July 11. Three days afterward his resignation was accepted, and the First Assistant-Postmaster, A. W. Randall, was nominated to succeed him. Attorney-General Speed has followed Dennison's example. The following is the correspondence between Mr. Dennison and the President:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., July 21, 1866.

"SIR,—I have the honor to tender you herewith my resignation of the office of Postmaster-General, to take effect upon the appointment of my successor. In thus withdrawing from the Cabinet it is proper to say that I do so chiefly because the difference of opinion between us in regard to the proposed amendment of the Constitution, which I approve, and the movement for the Convention to be held at Philadelphia on the 14th proximo, to which I am opposed. My relations, as the representative of the Union Republican Party, and conviction that upon the permanent control of the Government depend, in a large measure, the peace and happiness of the country, will not permit of my holding an equivocal attitude in respect to it.

"Assuring you of my personal regard and appreciation of the uniform courtesy I have received from you, I am, "Very respectfully, yours, etc.,

"W. DENNISON.

"To the President."

"EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, D. C., July 14, 1866.

"SIR,—Your resignation of the office of Postmaster-General, tendered in your letter of this date, I have hereby accepted. Thanking you for the kind assurances of personal regard, I am, very truly yours,

"ANDREW JOHNSON.

"To Hon. William Dennison, Washington, D. C."

General Dix has written a letter to Senator Doolittle, fully indorsing the Philadelphia Convention.

The vote on the Virginia ordinance of the amendment to the State Constitution has been officially declared as follows: For ratification, 23,794; for rejection, 19,361.—Majority for the amendment, 4,433.

General Steedman and Fullerton were to leave Washington on the 24th for New Orleans. They have visited portions of the District of Columbia on two days previous with the former and present management of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Southern papers exhibit a very general disposition on the part of the people to respond to the address for the Philadelphia Convention. State mid Democratic meetings have been called in Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, and other States.

Senator-elect Patterson, and Representatives-elect Cooper, Campbell, Lehlbach, Taylor, and Thomas have issued an address to the people of Tennessee, urging them to send delegates to the Philadelphia Union Convention to assemble in Philadelphia on the 14th of August.

The Seventh District of Alabama has adopted an ordinance prohibiting colored persons from entering the public lands. Persons having white families may settle them. Policemen at the gates will enforce the order.

The army organization of the Revolution, from 1775 to 1778, amounted to 231,791, the militia adding one-half to that force, and the navy consisted of seventy-five ships. In 1812 the regulars numbered 29,360, the volunteers 6000, the militia 30,000, and the navy consisted of 8 frigates and 170 gunboats. In 1815 we had 578 vessels, with 1056 guns. In March, 1865, we had 671 vessels, with 4477 guns; and the aggregate number of men raised for the Union armies, by the close of the rebellion, was 2,859,132. It is the above to added the quotas constituting the Confederate armies, and the total number of men in arms approaches nearly 4,000,000 of men at arms—the largest force ever put on a war footing in any one country, in any age of the world.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE WAR IN GERMANY.

THE Prussians on the 24 of July gained a signal and decisive victory over the Austrian army at Sadowa. During the last three days of June there appears to have been some pretty severe fighting between the two armies in the northeastern corner of Bohemia in the neighborhood of Gitschin and Nachod. On the 27th there was a slight advance of the Prussian army, headed Bohemia on the 28th of June. The Crown Royal, Frederick Charles, Steenbeck, Steadily the Prussians gained ground, forcing Austrians back on the Austrian fortress of Josephstadt. The following official dispatch from the Crown Prince bears date July 28:

"The result of the three days' fighting in which the Army of Bohemia has now been engaged is to be unhighly estimated. On the 27th it was opposed by the Sixth Austrian Corps, under General Ramming. A letter was found addressed by the latter to General Benedek, the Commander-in-Chief, in which he says that the fire of forces since his command were thoroughly exhausted. He therein requested General Benedek to put into ten fresh Brigade in order that his troops might likewise enjoy the necessary rest. Benedek replied that they would not be able to fight on the following day. The Fifth Prussian Corps was the first to oppose on the 28th and 29th by the Corps of the Archduke Leopold and General Festetics. The Austrians were defeated with considerable loss with much greater line than on the 27th. The Austrian Corps under General Leichtenstein was completely broken up. Here innumerable prisoners, 59 guns, five colors, and two standards belonging to the Corps of Count Leichtenstein, fell into the hands of the Prussian troops."

On the 29th the Prussians stormed the town of Gitschin, and compelled the Austrians to fall back to Josephstadt and Koniggratz. They subsequently effected a junction of the two Prussian armies, against which Benedek concentrated his forces, and the Austrian army was driven. Four days afterward, on the 3d of July, a great and decisive battle was fought at Sadowa, in which the Austrians were totally defeated, losing no less than 14,000 prisoners. Besides the loss in men, the American loss was estimated at 40,000 men. Austria, after this crushing defeat, agreed to the terms of Napoleon and Emperor of France, during his mediation. Napoleon at once communicated with the belligerents and proposed an armistice. The terms of Italy and Prussia to this proposition have not yet been received.

The London Times of July 23 has the news of the battle at Sadowa, written as follows: "The war in Bohemia is awful work. The Austrians, we are told, lost 15,000 men in their various encounters with the army under the Crown Prince of Prussia; they had 20,000 more for combat in their vain attempts to arrest the progress of the army under Prince Frederic Charles—altogether 40,000 men in five days. The prisoners are computed at 20,000, and the guns at 100. Whole regiments, whole battalions have been annihilated; whole corps—the Clam-Gallas, the Festetics, and the Saxon corps—have been the Kaiser Franz—are so utterly broken up as to be unable to make a stand for some time. Benedek's army has fallen back behind the Elbe, taking up its position between the towns of Josephstadt and Koniggratz, greatly disheartened and disorganized, according to the accounts of the prisoners and the fugitives from inside. The desertion of Italian soldiers from the Austrian ranks is on the increase."

SPAIN.

The late insurrection in Madrid was unusually extensive and sanguinary. The soldiers massacred their officers, and distributed arms to the people, who threw up barricades. Several officers of high rank were executed.—many of a lower grade were killed. There was artillery firing in the streets for several hours. Five killed and wounded are said to have amounted to 100 or 200. The insurrection was put down by prompt energetic, and the shooting of the leaders in the insurrection. Thirty of the insurgent officers were shot and their graves dug, and thirty or forty more, including some of the non-entries of the privates to follow. The Progressive papers have been suppressed.

GENERAL DELLA MARMORA.

THE CROWN PRINCE OF PRUSSIA.

FREDERIC WILLIAM NICHOLAS CHARLES, the Crown Prince and heir-apparent to the throne of Prussia, is the son of King WILLIAM I., who ascended the throne in 1861, succeeding his insane brother FREDERIC WILLIAM IV. The present King was born in 1797, and is consequently 69 years old. The Crown Prince is 35 years old, having been born in 1831. At the age of 17 he was sent to the University of Bonn. His University career being ended, he was recalled to Berlin and commenced his military career as a private in the Guards. The Prussian princes must serve from the pike up. He soon received the command of a company. After a while he was sent on his travels, and spent some time in Italy. Going to England, he married the Princess Royal in 1858. About this time King FREDERIC WILLIAM having become incapacitated, the father of the Crown Prince became Regent. As Lieutenant-General and Commander of the Second Army Corps, the Crown Prince made the Schleswig-Holstein campaign, but was not engaged in any action. He, however, shared in all the hardships of his troops during that winter campaign, and achieved in consequence a great popularity with his troops, and acquired the reputation of being an accomplished soldier. Upon the conclusion of this war he returned to his post as Stadtholder of Pomerania. When the present war was determined upon he was appointed General and Governor of Silesia, and commander of the Second Army Corps.

ITALIAN GENERALS.

WE give on this page portraits of the principal Italian Generals belonging to the army under the more immediate supervision of King VICTOR EMANUEL.

General DURANDO commands the First Corps, which did the fighting at the battle of Custozza. This army corps is composed of the first division, commanded by the Piedmontese General CERALE; of the second, by General PIANELLE, a Neapolitan, of great military skill, and the last Minister of War of FRANCIS II. The third division is commanded by General BRIGNONE (head-quarters at Castiglione della Stiviere). BRIGNONE is a member of the Italian Parliament, and has the well-deserved reputation of being one of the ablest Generals in this army. The fourth division is under the leadership of a famous Garibaldian General—Medici, because he was a Roman Catholic priest, and still more so for the courage he displayed in the defense of Venice in 1848–49, and in the Neapolitan campaign of 1860. DURANDO was a comrade of CIALDINI in Portugal and Spain.

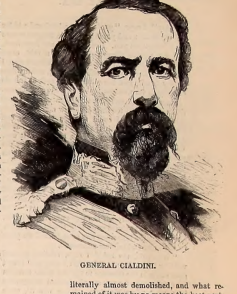
The Second Corps is commanded by General CUCCHIARI, whose portrait is not given.

General DELLA ROCCA commands the Third Corps. He is a man of great military and scientific talents. Four divisions belong to this army corps: The seventh, under the command of BIXIO, the well-known and audacious General of GARIBALDI; the eighth, under General CUGIA, formerly Minister of the Marine in MINGHETTI's Cabinet; the ninth, under GOVONE, the able General who was the negotiator of the Prussian-Italian treaty at Berlin; and the sixteenth and last division, under the leadership of Prince HUMBERT of Savoy, the eldest son of VICTOR EMANUEL.

The strongest and most powerful Corps of all is the Fourth, under the command of CIALDINI. This corps seems destined to accomplish great deeds, and it may be almost considered as an independent one. CIALDINI is to the regular army what GARIBALDI is to the volunteers. General PROLA, a very able officer indeed, acts as CIALDINI's chief of the staff; while Prince COLONNA, Count MOSTI D'ESTE, Count SERBISTORI, Count MICHEL, and Count BORROMEO—five of the most illustrious noblemen of Italy—are among his staff-officers and aids-de-camp. Five divisions, and perhaps the most brilliant, form this corps. They are the eleventh, under General Count CASANOVA; the twelfth, commanded by General RICOTTI, undoubtedly one of the most distinguished artillery generals of Europe; the thirteenth, under General MEZZACAPO, a Neapolitan; the fourteenth, under General CHIABRERA; the fifteenth, under MEDICI, a Garibaldian General of great repute. General Count MAURICE DE SONNAZ, the hero of Montebello, commands the reserve of cavalry, and General MATTEI that of the artillery.

The following detailed sketch of General DELLA MARMORA, VICTOR EMANUEL's chief of staff, is from the Pall Mall Gazette of June 27:

"ALPHONSE FERRERO DELLA MARMORA, whose family belongs to the Piedmontese branch of the ACCIAJOLI of Florence, is the youngest but one of the sixteen children of the Marquis CELESTIN DELLA MARMORA, whose wife was a Mdlle. DE BEREZE. He was born in November, 1804, and is now in his sixty-second year. At twelve years of age, an orphan, he entered the military school of Turin, left it in 1823 as commissioned officer in the artillery; in 1831 he became Captain, and soon afterward Major, and from that time began zealously to work in the remodeling and reconstruction of the branch of the service to which he belonged. He visited most of the European and other military schools, and returned to Piedmont to give a decisive and profitable impulse to reform in the Sardinian army. In 1848 he proved himself an able and trust-worthy officer. CHARLES ALBERT dispatched him to Venice in order to support MANIN, but between the latter and LA MARMORA there was but small cordiality and confidence, and the Sardinian soldier was recalled to command a division under DURANDO, and was replaced at Venice by General PEPE. On the heights of Pastrengo, April 2, 1848, he attacked very unexpectedly the Austrian rear-guard, and by this happy stroke enabled the Piedmontese to recover themselves. This latter feat brought him some favor with CHARLES ALBERT, who up to that time had been rather bored, and even irritated, by the unremitting exertions of this military reformer. After the reverses of the Piedmontese arms the revulsion of feeling at Milan raised by an excitable populace was very great. The King's person was in danger; he was, as it were, a prisoner in the Palazzo Greppi, and it is not too much to say that the agitation was chiefly conquered by the faithful and resolute courage displayed on that occasion by LA MARMORA. He was immediately made Brigadier-General and chief of the staff under CHIZZANOWSKI, who was then under the King and commanded the army.



"LA MARMORA soon resigned, and while on a mission in Tuscany received intelligence of the disasters in Lombardy, with orders to return instantly. He arrived too late to witness Novaro. The abdication of CHARLES ALBERT quickly followed, and as soon as VICTOR EMANUEL succeeded he made LA MARMORA Lieutenant-General and Minister of the War Department. The latter post he had already twice filled, the first time for about three weeks, the second for about as many days; and now he saw before him a task which nature had qualified him to perform well. The army was literally almost demolished, and what remained of it was by no means the best part. It was necessary to purge it of all that swarm of refugees who, poor, discontented, and in debt, resorted to the army from the least creditable of motives. The Hungarian, Polish, and French soldiers formed an extremely explosive and untrustworthy element, and in time of peace demoralized the regular troops not a little. 'Discipline was lax, and habits of irregularity, insubordination, and a great confusion of ideas on the subject of property prevailed; the men were ill clothed, ill armed, and there was little money with which to mend matters. All this did not deter LA MARMORA; he performed his work with a severity, resolution, and industry which was expected from him, but also with a patience and caution in giving needless offence which had hardly been hoped for. As soon as Piedmont embarked in the Crimean war LA MARMORA enjoyed the legitimate fruits of his labor. He resigned his port-folio and received the command of the contingent forces. His services at that period will to recent in the public mind, as also his exploits, which were not less considerable, in 1859. It is somewhat suggestive that LA MARMORA was in 1861 charged with a special mission to Berlin as embassador extraordinary, and was immediately afterward selected to notify the proclamation of VICTOR EMANUEL as King of Italy to the Court of the CZAR. He afterward took the command of the 2d corps of the army, but he and General FANTI could not come to an amicable understanding on military matters, and LA MARMORA abruptly resigned. It was not without much difficulty that he was prevailed on to become Prefect of Naples, the population of which was at that time in a state of transition so-called, but in reality utter disorder, anarchy, and reactionary conspiracies. His best friends do not accuse him of a too suave, easy, and politic temper: it can not be said that he was successful in this office, and to judge by results his two years there were a distinct failure. The camp and the barracks, not the town, are the proper field for his capabilities. He assisted in the repression of the riots in September, 1864, which arose on account of the change of capital to Florence, and has since then generally held a place in the Italian Cabinet. He has now once more resigned his post to follow his king to battle. He is understood to be a sincere admirer of LOUIS NAPOLEON, to whom his appointment was ascertained to be acceptable. M. RICASOLI, who replaces him in the Ministry, is supposed to have more English tendencies. In person General MARMORA is tall and slight, remarkably florid for an Italian in complexion.

FAR AT SEA.

I.

"AH!" I says, "you've been a hard and a bitter mother to me; and yet it goes again the grit to turn one's back upon you. I've toiled on, and lived hard, and yet you've always showed me a cold, cruel face;" and as I said that, feeling quite heart-sick, I leans my elbows on the side o' the ship, and my chin on my hands, and has a long, long look at the old country as we was leaving—perhaps to see no more.

I looked round, and there stood plenty, tearful-eyed and sad, with all the lines of sorrow marked in their foreheads, while I could see lips trembling and breasts working with the pain they could hardly keep down. And then I don't know how it was, but it seemed to me that we thought together the same sad things, and that I knew their thoughts and they knew mine. There was all the old life—plain as could be; and then came the long, long struggle with sickness, and death, and want; and I knew that people said such poor folk should not marry, and many another bitter word, as if it was wrongful to love and try to be happy. The wind whistled through the ropes above our heads, and the clouds seemed gathering, too, in sorrow for though the bitterness was gone I could see plenty of sorrow and sadness all round.

"Won't do, my lad!" I says, rousing up, and wetting both hands as if I meant work; and then I goes down in the steerage to try and make things a bit comfortable, for you see all the poor fellows had to put up with a miserable state. Some was ill, some down-hearted, some drunk and foolish, some drunk and noisy, some drunk and quarrelsome, and there was children crying, and women scolding, and altogether it was any thing but a cheering prospect for the night—for, as you may say, we were "locked down into shape yet.

"Good time coming!" says I, cheerily, and having my own notions of my own, I set to to help them as had. I got hold of a young shaver—about two and a half, I should think—and he was a-letting go right away, as if he'd got all the troubles in the world in his precious young head. But he soon turned quiet, playing with my knife, and all at once I finds as he'd made a hammock o' me, and had gone off as sound as a church. During the next three days its mother was very ill, poor thing, and I had to regularly mind the little one; and I did, too.

Well, 'tisn't a very pleasant life in the steerage of an emigrant ship bound for New Zealand, 'specially if the weather's a bit rough; and we was in for it. For the next morning, when I went on deck, there was a stiff breeze blowing, the ship heeling over; and as I thought the night before as it was, there was nothing in sight but waves all round. One sailor did point to something which he said was home, but I couldn't have been a cloud.

The fourth night had come, and as I lay in my berth listening to the "wash, wash" of the water past the side of the ship, the creaking and groaning of the timbers, and every now and then the heavy bump of a wave against the side, I considered to myself that what the ship was that between us and death; and somehow or other the serious thoughts that came kept me wide awake.

It was two bells, I think they call it—for they don't count time as we do ashore—when all at once I could hear as there was a great bustle on the deck, where all through the watches of the night every thing is mostly very quiet. Then there came a good deal of trampling about and running to and fro; and I got out of my berth, slips on one or two things, and goes cautiously up the ladder and gets my head above the hatchway, and then in a moment I saw what was up, and it gave me such a shock that I nearly let go my hold and fell back into the steerage. There was a thick cloud of smoke issuing out from between the hatches, right in the centre of the ship; and almost before I could thoroughly realize it all, or make myself believe as it was true, a woman ran shrieking along the deck in her night-dress, and calling out those fearful words as heard ship:

"Fire! fire! fire!"

Hundreds of miles from land, standing on a few inches-deep pieces of wood, and then burning beneath your feet.

I couldn't help it: all my bitter feelings of being ill-used came back, and I says to myself:

"Your usual luck, mate; wouldn't be you if you weren't unfortunate. But never mind; you have your choice—fire or water." And then I thought of the danger, and I catches hold of a shroud to jump in the chest, and rolling up my sleeves, and goes up to the captain as was busy giving his orders.

"What shall I do?" I says.

"Pump!" he shouts; "and fetch a dozen more up!"

Lord bless you! I had 'em up in no time from among the young women; and I found plenty to get the women and children up on deck in the poop, which was furthest from the hatches, where the smoke kept pouring out; besides which the wind took it away from them.

There was plenty of shrieking and screaming at first; but they had got the right man to the right place when they chose that captain, for he runs to the poop, where all the shivering things was a-standing, some with a few words to keep them. Then he runs to the men as was scuffling about, here, there, and every where, and gets them all together; and then at last he gets a line of buckets with buckets, a lot more at the pumps, and some more at the little engine as was there; and then, when all was ready, and every man standing at his post, he goes with some more to the hatches and drags up a couple, when up rose a regular pillar of fire and smoke, with a murky, quiet movement, and in a moment every face was lit up, and there was quite a glare spreading far out to sea. Sails, cordage, masts, every thing seemed turned into gold. For a moment I couldn't help forgetting the danger, and thinking what a beautiful sight it was; and directly after there was a regular ringing cheer, the engine and pumps went "clang-chang," and the water was poured into the burning hold from bucket and engine-nozzle.

How the water hissed and sputtered! while volumes of smoke and steam rushed up where it had been all flame but a moment before, and as we saw this we cheered; but we'd nothing to cheer for; it was only the fire gathering strength; and then, as though laughing at the water we poured in, it came dashing, and crawling, and running up, licking the edges of the hatchway, and setting on fire the tarpaulins at the sides, and then it began to shoot and leap up as if to catch at the cordage and sails.

"Pour it in, my lads," says the captain.

"Don't be afraid; we sha'n't run short of water, like they do at your London fires."

"No," says a chap on deck; "and there ain't no running away into the next street."

Then I saw the captain run to the man at the wheel, and he changed the course of the ship, so that all the smoke and flame went over the side; and then at it we went, sending in the water as fast as regular splash as far as I could every time; and the captain nodded at me every now and then, and, "Well done!" he says, when it was him as ought to have had the praise.

It was like locking down into the mouth of a furnace; and, as far as I could see, the fire had got well have been playing with a couple of loy's squirts; but I knew enough of duty to feel what I ought to do; and though I'd been a-fighting the hose aside the wife to comfort her, my thoughts was then start a pouring in that there water till I couldn't do it no longer; and the more I did, the more no good, the more I warmed up—obstinate like—and meant to try; for I didn't see any fun in being beaten off by a few flames and sparks when I'd got such a lot on 'em and then from the captain went right through me, and in went the water.

All at once a lot of the sailors stops pumping, and one shouts out:

"Ain't no good, mates. Boats out!"

But he hadn't hardly said it before I saw the captain dart back; and then there was a bright light as the copper branch of the hose-pipe flashed through the air, and then down it went, and I got hold of it and struck it right off him by the scruff of the neck and strap of his trowsers, and afore he knew where he was I had him by the collar, and was a-shoving him where the flames were pouring up, and so close, too, that he could feel the scorching; and then—I ain't much given to swearing, 'specially before such-like thing fierce, that if he didn't work I'd hurt him in.

Lord, you should have heard what a shriek there was as the fellow struggled and fought to get away, and then I put him a little nearer; when he begged and prayed to be put down, and he'd work till he dropped; and the captain—I believe as he'd bolted off into the cabin, but now rushed out again with a revolver in each hand.

"Well done, my man," he shouts to me, for he saw what I did; and then he gives me one of the pistols, and swore like fury the first man as disobeyed, and I'm blessed if I didn't believe he would, if they'd have tried it; but they didn't, but began pumping away like mad, and I went back to mine, and instead of a quiet crawling flame now there was a regular roar, and the wind set toward the great fiery tongues, which leaped up higher.

"Stick to it, my man," says the captain, in a low voice. "It's our only chance."

"Ain't I wouldn't give much for it, Sir," I says, in the same tone.

"Hush!" he says; and then to the men, "Pump away, my lads!"

They pumped away hearty enough, and kept trying on a cheer; but it soon could be seen with half an eye that the fire was gaining. Presently it burst up, and, almost before you knew it, the rigging was on fire, and the tongues like leaping from rope to rope, till the heat was terrific. Presently I looks up to the mainmast-head, and little fiery drops of burning tar kept falling on to the deck, or issuing into the sea; while just above my head into the night sky, the great flaky sparks went flying along, for all the world like a beautiful golden snow-storm.

"There," says the captain, throwing down the copper branch with which he had played on the fire, and shaking his fist right in the flames, so that they seemed to dance with it, "there," he says, savagely, "I've fought it out with you, and you've beat! Now for the long-boat."

And then, quietly and coolly, he had one boat lowered down, with the first mate in and a crew of sailors, and the shrieking women and children lowered in, while the quiet ones he kept back. Then there was a water-cask and a lot of biscuit-bags thrown in, and that boat, well loaded, pushed off on the calm sea, and lay to, watching us. Then the second mate was ordered into the second boat, with a crew of sailors; water and bags of biscuit were thrust in; and then, well loaded with women and children, and one or two of the men passengers, that was carefully lowered down, unhooked, and pushed off.

The other two boats were not swung over the sides, but lay between the masts of the ship, right in the middle of the deck, and were full of stores and odd things, and the rest of the way; but the captain and men left soon had tackling fastened to the boat that was right in front of the fire, and it was hauled up, swung over the side, and lowered in a couple of men in, and they rowed it back to the hinder part of the ship, while we who had been thumping it down with regular dash through the flames, which now extended nearly across the deck. One man, however, did not dare come through, but plunged overboard and swam after the boat till he was took in.

"Now then," said the captain; and the rest of the women were hauled down.

I did not mean to go as long as I could help the captain; and then half a dozen of the men passengers were hooked down, and they were just going to shove off, when I shouts out:

"Stop!" and the captain turns round angrily at me; and I says, "Any more in wife?"

Sure enough they had none, and a little cask that stood on the deck was being down, and they were going to shove off, when I heard a shriek as I went through and through me, and saw a bright glare; the man at the rudder leaned over, while at the same moment there was a rent and a flash as fearful light, and the great mainmast blazing from top to bottom, and covered with rope and tar and pitch, flaring over toward where the boat lay, for the fire had been eating into it below deck for long enough. It was a fearful sight, and I felt as though my eyes of some great sheet of lightning, as in the midst of a wild and fearful cry it fell right toward the boat.

II.

THAT was a fearful moment, that was, and we held our breath with terror; and I—I could not help it—I covered my face with my hands, and would not look, till I heard a loud cheer, and saw the boat safely floating within a very few yards of the halfextinct mast as had narrowly missed falling upon the little haven of safety.

And now they were going to get the last boat out, and the three others lay off at a little distance, while above the hoarse orders of the captain there was the crackling and roar of the flames, now leaping up at a fearful rate, and as it was a splendid night, in spite of the horror; for every now and then pieces of the copper wire rope used in the rigging forgetting he caught fire, and went with a most beautiful blue light, brighter than in any fire-work I ever saw; while now the foremast had taken fire, and the flames were leaping from it to the bowsprit, and then running and glowing into the sea, to send up little columns of hissing steam. The whole of the centre of the ship was now one mass of the flames rose prodigiously, floating off, and flashing amidst the clouds of smoke; while far away, still lightly tilted and quiet stood the gallant ship, now evidently among fire and smoke, and darting far on high, in the most beautiful way imaginable.

I think I forget before how the tremendous heat caused a regular draught to set toward the fire, so that as you were almost scorched before, the wind came with such force from behind; but this, as it made the flames roar again, and burn more fiercely than ever! It was a sickening sight; for every now and then, as the ship lunged, the tongues would keep lapping at and threatening us, and then dancing and licking every thing up, as if in devilish joy at their success, and wanting us poor sinners, too.

It was a horrible sight, and though I didn't show it, yet I could feel my heart sink every time I was idle for a few moments, when I went at it again like a savage. "I don't go down without a struggle, my boy!" I says. I don't know—I think I prayed earnestly in my heart then, and though I would gladly have been with the rest of the crew in the other boat, yet I couldn't feel as it was suited with a fellow's duty to leave such a man as that captain had showed himself all in the time of danger and trouble.

"Bo a man, too, Phil;" and I did try to, any how.

All at once the flames seemed to veer round, and began blowing toward us, while the position of the boats was changed; and I couldn't understand it, till I saw the captain from helping to get the last boat—the one as was on the deck close to the mizzenmast—over the side; and then I found it was the man had left the steering-wheel, and had run up toward the boat.

"Back!" I heard the captain say; "back, or I'll fire!"

"Fire away, cap," says the man, sulkily; "one may just as well die by fire one way as another, and it won't stand to be burnt by the flames darned the breeze; and at length, panting and exhausted, he hung on motionless, and said we must risk it now.

Then we were both silent, and watched the boats never further away from us, and the blazing ship seeming to be the centre of a glorious ring of light, on the outside of which like sparks we all lay waiting for the end we knew was soon to come. Every where else was dark as pitch, not even a star to be seen, while the waves just rose and curled a little over as they washed against our raft.

For a good piece the silence was as deep as the darkness, and then the captain was the first to break it in quite a cheerful voice:

"Can you lay your hand on the rope?" he says; and I pushed to him, and then I could hear him in the dark busily at work tying and fastening; and at last he says: "Now crawl on again; it will bear you better;" and faint and weakly I managed to crawl on and lay with my legs in the water and my head on the bag of biscuit; and directly after I felt him come to me, and we took hold of hands and lay there in the deep darkness while he said that prayer out aloud in such a soft, deep voice—that prayer as we first learned kneeling down years ago by our mother's knee. When he came to "Deliver us from evil" he stopped short; and soon, worn out there in the great ocean, floating on a few pieces of wood, we both felt in Whose hands we were, and slept till the warm bright sun shone upon us and told us that another day was here.

The first thing the captain did was to stand up and look round, and then he said he could see only one boat; but he hoisted up one of the pieces of wood and wedged it in the coop with a handkerchief flying at the top, after which we made a hearty meal of the biscuit, raw bacon, and water. After this the captain got one of the coops on the other, and by bobbing and lashing he made a much safer and better raft, so that we could keep our biscuit and bacon out of the water and sit dry ourselves.

And so we lay all that day till toward evening, when we found that the boat was coming toward us, and just at dusk it was within hail; and if ever I'd felt hopeful or cyeful before in my life, it was then. They had no room for us, but they took us in tow, and the weather keeping calm, we all roved and worked in turns, steering according to the proper direction for the nearest land; for when our turn came we two went into the boat, and two others came out on to the raft, and so we took on for days, when one morning there was a joyful cry:

"A sail! a sail!"

And it was, too, within a mile of us, plainer and plainer as that glorious sun rose; and then some laughed, some cried, and one or two seemed half mad with joy, for after a while she ran down toward us, picked us up, and proved to be a British man-of-war, homeward bound.

In seven week I was back in the port I left without clothes, without money, but with as good and true a friend in Captain Ellis as ever walked. I had life, and with it came hope; and somehow since then things have prospered with me in the old country—the old home that I once left to go far at sea.

CHAPTER X.

I THINK it will not do to follow the three children to Chestnut Hill on this occasion—another day, perhaps; but really the season is running on so fast a rate that it is more than time our readers were in the ground.

It was so late when Sam got home that night that Mrs. May would not let the children sit up to table a bit, but sent them all off to bed at once; and even the watering-pots were left but up till morning. But as soon as the birds were fairly astir, and the sunbeams gleaming across the brown fields and wind-frisked, the house, too, was filled with a little hum of business and pleasure. Not too quiet a hum either; for it does now and then happen that wide-awake children disturb other people's slumbers; and Lily and Clover and Primrose ran about the hall, and laughed and talked and sang, in happy unconsciousness that there was such a thing as sleep in the whole world. It was a pleasant disturbance after all; Mrs. May found no fault with it at all mines; and though the door stood open into the breakfast-room, where Sam sat with his books, nobody got up to shut it. Indeed, you could even see upon the student's face now and then a smile which was certainly called forth by no treatise on astronomy that ever was printed.

Jack was on the hall, helping the confusion, and making himself, as Lily said, "generally useless;" though, indeed, there was little to do but unpack the watering-pots and scatter the garden-seeds about in every direction.

"So you had a grand time yesterday?" said Jack, looking critically with one eye through the long nose of Clover's watering-pot.

"Splendid!" said Lily. "Only I wish we had gone there before we sent for our seeds, then we could have got something worth while—air-plants and things."

"But those air-plants wouldn't grow in our gardens," said Clover.

"Yes, they would; they must like fresh air, child. The wonder is, how they can live in that close place. It almost smothered me."

"I didn't mind it," said Clover, "it was so very interesting. I suppose that was meant for the natural climate of the plants."

"I'm sure I don't know what it was meant for, but I know it was suffocating," said Lily. "Jack, just think—Maria Jarvis's sister has a gold bracelet made just like a snake, with green enamel scales and two diamond eyes."

"Has she, indeed?" said Jack. "Ha!"

"Yes," said Lily, "and you needn't say 'ha!' either, for you never saw any thing so splendid."

"Haven't I, though?" said Jack. "Why, I've seen the real thing."

"What's the real thing?" said Lily, slightly offended.

"You just tell Maria Jarvis, with my compliments," said Jack, screwing up his eyes as before, "that next summer you'll beat her sister all to nothing; for you'll have real snakes in your garden."

"Jack! how horrid!" said Lily. "What do you mean?"

"Yes, put down my watering-pot, and talk and look like a rational boy," said Clover. "What do you mean?"

"Just that," said Jack, coolly. "Real snakes, with real scales, and shining eyes, and a tongue that'll run out and in at you so—!" And Jack made his little mouth very small, and drew about in a way that was very unruly indeed. The three children stood aghast!

"Jack, there'll be earth-worms," continued Jack, seeing the impression he had made; "long, slimy, wriggling red things, coming right up out of the ground before you know where you are. And it's no sort of use to cut 'em in two with your spade, for each piece just grows out into a new earth-worm, and so you only have more to manage."

There was another minute of dismayed silence, and then Primrose darted away up stairs to her mother.

"Jack," said Clover, "you ought not to frighten Primrose. She's such a little thing! and you know she can't bear even the sight of a caterpillar."

"She'd better quit gardening, then, before she begins," said Jack, decisively. "I say, Clover, how much did you give a yard for the nose of this watering-pot?"

"Oh, here's mamma!" said Lily. "Mamma, I was only telling Jack about Sarah Jarvis's beautiful bracelet—made just like a snake, mamma, with scales and all."

"I am glad it is not mine," said Mrs. May, with a slight shiver. "And was Jack quite lost in admiration?"

"No, indeed, mamma," said Clover; "but he told us some very unpleasant things about what we should have in our gardens if we cultivated."

"Snakes, mamma!" said little Primrose, clasping her mother's hand, and looking up appealingly. "And other horrors!"

"They are not very pretty things, certainly, to my eyes," said Mrs. May, with a smile, as she sat down and took the little girl on her lap; "but to a robin, Prim, the earth-worms are extremely attractive—quite as much so as oysters are to you! And I shall leave it to you to say, when in your garden, will be to eat up a leaf now and then. You can bear that, I hope?"

"Mamma," said Prim, with a long sigh; "but I didn't want to have any thing in my garden that wasn't beautiful."

"Beautiful they are, in one sense," said her mother, "with the beauty of perfect fitness for their place—the wonderful make and adjusting of every part."

"And the snakes, mamma?" said Prim.

"They have their own perfection and finish, like every one of God's creatures," said Mrs. May, "and they have often, too, great beauty of color. Still, I do not like snakes, Prim, I must confess, but I would much rather see a real one than wear such a snake bracelet on my arm, if that is any comfort."

"Mamma, mamma!" said Lily.

"Jack, what have you been telling these children?" said his mother.

"A little possible truth, mamma—slightly highcolored."

"Ah, please to tell them nothing but positive truth for the future; and remember, young eyes are not skilled in colors."

"I don't believe there'll be a snake seen in your garden all summer," said Jack, with his mouth full of breakfast-room; "and if there is, I'll show you how fast he can run!"

"Oh, have they got feet?" said Primrose.

"You'll see, if one comes," said her brother. "And then we can study it all out, and learn how a snake can do without feet, and all about it; and you'll see why, Prim, they're ten times as curious as your Chinese puzzle. I dare say we shall see some of 'em to-day, for I mean to begin digging this very morning."

"In our gardens?" cried Lily.

"To be sure. I've tried the ground, and it will work."

There was nothing to do after that but dispatch breakfast as soon as possible, to be ready for digging; and all disturbed thoughts were brushed away. Sam went off to the tool-house and came back with a great spade on his shoulder nearly as big as the three little spades put together, and Lily followed, dragging a rake of corresponding size.

"Why don't you take our tools, Sam," she said, "and not these great ugly things? These aren't pleasant."

"Yes, and suppose I came against a stone and broke one of them," said Sam, "how pleasant that would be! I don't know what's in this ground yet; I haven't proved it."

And Sam threw off his coat as if he meant the spading should be an earnest one.

"You'll catch cold," said Clover.

"Not I! What with exploring the ground, and giving you a lecture on digging, I shall be warm enough. But where am I to begin?"

"I think you had better begin with mine," said Lily, promptly. "It's the largest, you know, and so you can give us a good long lecture."

Sam laughed a little, and shook his head.

"It's high time your garden was dug, Lily," he said; "that hedge wants planting badly!"

But he strode away down the hill toward Lily's patch as he spoke, with his spade on his shoulder, and the young ones trooped after him. Jack mounted the fence, and the others stood here and there on the gravel-walk to look on. Jack, and Sam began his work and his lecture together.

"The object of digging the ground, young ladies," he said, "is to bring it all to a fine, soft state, free from lumps and hard places, so that the light and air can make their way down into it, and the smallest roots of your plants can wander just which way they like best."

"Do roots wander?" said Clover.

"They're the greatest travelers I know, for their size," said Sam; "finding their way all about, after water, and food, and whatever else the pretty plant above ground may need. But then you must give 'em a fair chance, you know, to go its own road."

"What queer things you do talk!" said Lily.

"All true," said her brother, measuring off the little patch and dividing it carefully in two. "Some of the fortunes, like to grow straight down into the ground; these are called tap-roots. And unless the ground is dug very deep, they have a poor time of it. The tap-root sets off on its travels and presently comes to a stone; well, it either crooks round the stone, or else it forks and goes both sides of it. Or it wrought hard and tried, and the beauty is gone. I have seen radishes that were shaped as much like a breakfast-fork as any thing. The poor root wanders again, and by and by meets a great clod of unbroken earth, and then is gives up, discouraged. No use to try any further, no use to think of growing any more; it just stands still till the end of the season, and comes out of the ground at last a little, ugly, crooked thing, and good for nothing. Just because the ground was not half dug."

"I guess ours will be dug!" said Prim.

"Sam, what do you divide the patch so for?" said Lily.

"I will tell you presently," said Sam, going on with his measuring. "Then other roots are fibrous, like a bunch of little delicate threads; and they like to dig about, near the surface but out of sight; and if you wall them in with stones or hard ground the plant will be sickly and miserable all its life, or else die outright. And as Prim would if I should put her in a cage and never let her stir more than three inches from home."

Prim nestled herself about as if the very idea was uncomfortable.

"I'd like to dig too," she said.

"And so you shall," said her brother. "I'll go over the three gardens first, to break up the ground once thoroughly, and then whoever likes may dig it after me. And now to begin."

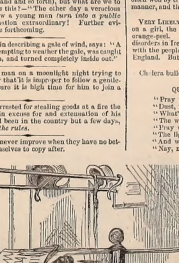
THE ROSE AND THE TOMB.

FROM VICTOR HUGO.

"SWEET flower of love, gayly garden and field adorning,
What mak'st thou of those dewy tears of morning
That on thy glistening leaves repose?"
So spake the Tomb, and thus replied the Rose:
"What should they be, but sweet-weeping Tomb!
Of all that falls into thy gulf of gloom?
I of these tears can fabricate a scent
Of sweetest odors all together blent;
But thou"—" Reproach me not, O plaintive Flower!
But learn that, by a deep mysterious power,
The forms which hastening to my charge are given,
I change to glorious angels, meet for Heaven."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

BEING "BACK."—Sheet trousers.



MAGNETISM.—We do not believe in spiritualism or magic (except a delight in hard and so forth), but what are we to say to a fact such as this?—"The other day a vexatious witness attended on a young man turn into a public house."—Transformation extraordinary! Further evidence will shortly be forthcoming.

An Illinois chap, in describing a gale of wind, says: "A whizzing, while attempting to weather the gale, was caught with his mouth open, and turned completely inside out."

When you see a man on a moonlight night trying to convince his shadow that it is impolite to follow a gentleman, you may be sure it is high time for him to join a temperance society.

A man who was arrested for stealing goods at a fire the other day, pleaded in excuse for and extenuation of his conduct, that he had been in the country but a few days, and hadn't learned the rules.

MODELS.—People never improve when they have no better model than themselves to copy after.

MAKING THEM LOOK SHEEPISH.

RATHER PRETTY.

A pretty little maiden had a pretty little dream,
A pretty little wedding was the pretty little theme,
A pretty little bachelor to win her fower tried,
And asked her how she'd like to be his pretty little bride.

With some pretty little blushes, and a pretty little sigh,
And some pretty little glances from the pretty little eye,
With a pretty little face bedined a pretty little fan,
She smiled on the proposals of this pretty little man.

Some pretty little "terms," and some pretty little "dears,"
Some pretty little smiles, and some pretty little tears,
Some pretty little promises, and some pretty little kiss,
Were the pretty little troubles to some pretty little bliss.

This pretty little lady and her pretty little spark
Met the pretty little parson and his pretty little clerk;
A pretty little wedding-ring united them for life,
A pretty little husband and a pretty little wife.

The husband of a pious woman having occasion to make a voyage, his wife sent a written request to the minister of the parish; but instead of spelling and pronouncing properly, viz.: "A person having gone to sea, his wife desires the prayers of the congregation," she spelled and printed it as follows: "A person, having gone to sea his wife, desires the prayers of the congregation."

Different sounds travel with different degrees of velocity. A salt fur dinner will run over a ten-acre lot in a minute and a half, while a summons to work will take from five to ten minutes.

A quaint writer says: "I have seen women so delicate that they were afraid to ride for fear the horse running away; afraid to sail, for fear the boat might upset; afraid to walk, for fear the day might be hot; but I never saw one afraid to be married, which is far more fearful than all the others put together."

The best case of indigestion is related in one of our exchanges. It is that of a man who had eaten his wife. He was to say that, in writing his name, he simply used the letter "I," and that proved a bone to choke him.

RECIPE FOR CHOOSING A GOOD WIFE.

As much of beauty as preserves affection,
Of modest diffidence as wards off contempt;
A docile mind subservient to correction,
A temper led by reason and virtuous love,
And every passion kept in due subjection,
And faithful energy to tame and form her action:
Find this, my friend, and then make your selection.

The following is a copy of a bill posted on the wall of a country village: "A lecture on total abstinence will be delivered in the open air, and a collection will be made at the door to defray expenses."

In reasoning, if you wish inferences that will not follow, draw them.

Want less than you have, and you will always have more than you want.

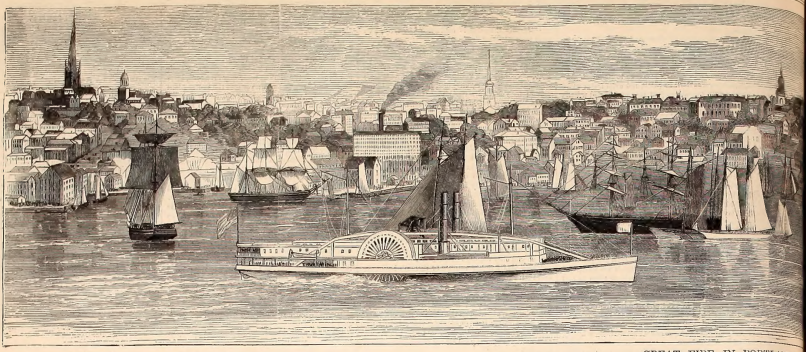
EPITAPH ON A MINER.

Beneath this crooked stomp is laid
A widdow and a brider of the trade;
Called J. A. Miner, from Bonkelde;
He lived to manage till he died.
Provoked one day, Death, in a rage,
At fifty stopped the mining race,
With chills and fever made him sick,
Called at the stomp and took his place.

A muscle dignitary of great eminence in t'w order lately left Edinburgh to attend a celebration of the laying of a cornerstone, forgetting the cockade hat. He discerned his omission presently and telegraphed from the first station, "Send me a cockade hat by express immediate." His disgust may be imagined on receiving the next day a parcel containing cocked hats, on account of the operators having made a mistake in two of the letters of his message.

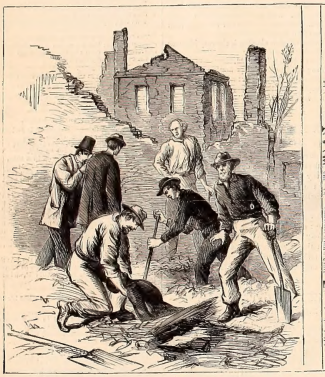
A miller, in giving a testimonial to the proprietor of a powder for destroying vermin, certified that it was excellent. A fortnight since I was full of rats, and now I don't think I have one!"

When is a prince not a gudgeon? When it's one pound two—at sixes!



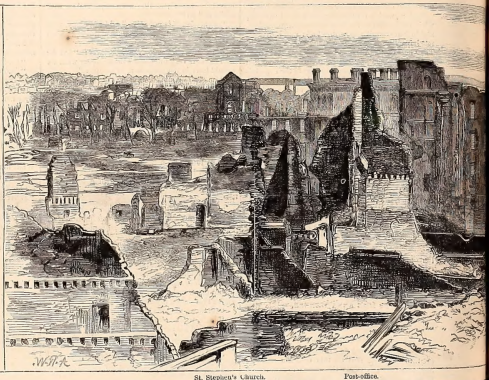
The "heart" is the best card in the chance game of matrimony—sometimes overcome by diamonds and knaves, often won by clubs, and occasionally treated in a shuffling manner, and then cut altogether.

VERY LIKELY.—The Gordon Sentinel reports an inquest on a young man who died from the effects of eating orange-peel. The Orange has caused many dangerous disorders in Ireland; and we know the Pats did not peel with the people, in fact it is not confined wholesome in England. But we never expected such fatal effects.



Oh, lera bullets—green apples.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.



"Pray what is lighter than a feather?"
"Dust, my friend, in direct weather."
"What's lighter than the dust, I pray?"
"The wind which wafts it far away."
"Pray what is lighter than the wind?"
"The lightness of a woman's mind."
"And what is lighter than the lass?"
"Nay, now, my friend, you have me fast."

LOTTA SCHMIDT.

On an evening of September, when there was still something left of daylight at eight o'clock, two girls were walking together in the Burgplatz in Vienna, a large open space which lies between the city palace of the Emperor and the gate which passes thence from the old town out to the new town. Here at present stand two bronze equestrian statues, one of the Archduke Charles, and the other of Prince Eugene. And they were standing there also, both of them, when these two girls were walking round them; but that of the Prince had not as yet been uncovered for the public. There was coming a great gala day in the city. Emperors and empresses, archdukes and archduchesses, with their archduchesses and grand-duchesses, and princes and ministers were to be there, and the new statue of Prince Eugene was to be uncovered by the art critics of the world. There was very much thought at Vienna of the statue in those days. Well; since that statue has been submitted to the art critics, and henceforward it will be thought of as little as any other huge bronze figure of a prince on horseback. A very proper prince he is poised in an impossible position on an enormous dray horse. But yet the thing is grand, and Vienna is so far a finer city in that it possesses the new equestrian statue of Eugene.

"There will be such a crowd, Lotta," said the elder of the two girls, "that I will not attempt it. Besides, we shall have plenty of time for seeing it afterward."

"Oh yes," said the younger girl, whose name was Lotta Schmidt; "of course we shall all have enough of the old prince for the rest of our lives; but I should like to see the grand people sitting up there on the benches; and there will be something nice in seeing the cannon fired, and all that kind of small come. Herr Crippel has said that he would bring me, and got me a place."

"I thought, Lotta, you had determined to have nothing more to say to Herr Crippel."

"I don't know what you mean by that. I like Herr Crippel very much, and he plays beautifully. Surely a girl may know a man old enough to be her father without having him thrown in her teeth as her lover."

"Not when the man old enough to be her father has asked her to be his wife twenty times, as Herr Crippel has asked you. Then you ought to have given up his holiday afternoon to you if he thought it was to be for nothing."

"Then I think you are wrong, Marie. I believe Herr Crippel likes to have me with him simply because every gentleman likes to have a lady on such a day as that. Of course it is better to walk there alone. I don't suppose he will say a word to me except to tell me who the people are, and to give me a glass of beer when it is over."

It may be as well to explain at once, before we go any further, that Herr Crippel was a player on the violin, and that he led the music every night in the orchestra of the great beer-hall in the Volksgarten. Let it not be thought that because Herr Crippel exercised his art in a beer-hall therefore he was a musician of no account. No one will think so who has once gone to a Vienna beer-hall and been attracted by such music as is there provided for the visitors.

The two girls, Marie Weber and Lotta Schmidt, belonged to an establishment in which gloves were sold in the Graben, and now, having finished their hard work for the day—and indeed their work for the week, for it was Saturday evening—they were going for such recreation as the evening might afford them.

Marie Weber was elder, and not so tall, and less attractive than her friend; but as her lot in life was fixed, and as she was engaged to marry a cutler of thousands, I will not endeavour to introduce her reader specially in her personal appearance. Lotta Schmidt was essentially a Viennese pretty girl of the spoiled Viennese type. She was not a tall slender, but still had none of that appearance of feminine weakness which is so common among us with girls who are tall and slim. Her face was full, black and very plentiful, and was worn in long curls, which were brought round from the back of her head over her shoulders. Her eyes were dark—very dark blue—and were clear and deep rather than bright. Her nose was well-formed, but somewhat prominent, and made you think at the first glance of the tribes of Israel. But yet no observer of the physiognomy of races would believe for half a moment that Lotta Schmidt was a Jewess. But, overriding every thing in her personal appearance, in her form, countenance, and gait, was that singular fearlessness of independence, as to which we were constantly asserting that she would never submit herself to the inconvenience of feminine softness. And yet Lotta Schmidt was a simple-hearted, true girl's heart, looking forward to find all that she was to have of human happiness in the love of some man, and expecting and hoping to do her duty in life as a married woman and the mother of a family.

When the two girls had walked round and round, hoarding within which stood all those tons of bronze which were intended to represent Prince Eugene, they crossed over the centre of the Burgplatz, and under the other equestrian statue, and came to the gate leading into the Volksgarten. There, just at the entrance, they were overtaken by a man with a fiddle-case under his arm, who raised his hat to them and then shook hands with both of them.

"Lotta," he said, "are you coming in to hear a little music? We will do our best."

"Herr Crippel always does well," said Marie Weber. "There is never any doubt when one comes to hear him."

"Marie, why do you flatter him?" said Lotta.

"I do not say half to his face that you said just now behind his back," said Marie.

"And what did she say of me behind my back?" said Herr Crippel. He smiled as he asked the question, or attempted to smile, but it was easy to see that he was much in earnest. He blushed up to his eyes, and there was a slight trembling motion in his hands as he stood with one of them pressed upon the other.

As Marie did not answer at the moment, Lotta replied for her.

"I will tell you what I said behind your back. I said that Herr Crippel had the finest hand upon a bow, and the surest fingers among the strings in all Vienna—when his mind was not wool-gathering. Marie, is not that true?"

"I do not remember any thing about the wool-gathering," said Marie.

"I hope I shall not be wool-gathering to-night; but I shall doubtless—I shall doubtless—for I shall be thinking of your judgment. Shall I get you seats at once? There, you are just before me. You see I am not coward enough to fly from my critics." And he placed them to sit at a little marble table, not far from the front of the orchestra in the foremost place in which he would have to take his stand.

"Lotta dear thanks, Herr Crippel," said Lotta. "I will make sure of a third chair, as a friend is coming."

"Oh, a friend!" said he; and he looked sad, and all his sprightliness was gone.

"Marie's friend," said Lotta, laughing. "If you are not knowing I will tell you."

Then the musician became bright and happy again. "I would have got two more chairs if you would have let me; one for the fraulein's friend, and one for his own. And I will come down presently, and you shall present me, if you will be so very kind."

Marie Weber smiled and thanked him, and declared that she should be very glad—and the leader of the band went up into his place.

"I wish he had not placed us here," said Lotta.

"And why so?"

"Because Fritz is coming."

"No?"

"But he is."

"And why did you not tell me?"

"Because I did not wish to be speaking of him. Of course you understand that I did not tell you. I would rather it should seem that he came of his own account—with Carl. Ha, ha!" Carl Stobel was the dismal-countenanced man whom Marie was betrothed. "I should not have told you now—only that I am disarranged by what Herr Crippel has done."

Then the music began, and, suddenly, as the first note of a fiddle was heard, every voice in the great room was hushed and the waiters ceased to talk, to sit smoking, with their long beer-glasses before them, and women sat knitting, with their beer-glasses also before them. Every one was quiet, except us. The waiters went about with silent feet, but even orders for beer were not given, and money was not received. It is better than the best, working up with his wand as carefully—and I may say as accurately—as a leader in a fashionable opera-house in London or Paris. And he knows it well. But in the course of the piece, he would place his fiddle to his shoulder and join in the performance. There he was hardly one of the band, but rather a conductor or girl, who did not know, from personal knowledge and judgment, that Herr Crippel was doing his work very well.

"Excellent, was it not?" said Marie.

"Yes; he is a musician. Is it not a pity it should be so bald?" said Lotta.

"He is not so very bald," said Marie.

"I should not mind his being bald so much, if he did not try to cover his old head with the side hairs. If he would cut off those loose, straggling locks, and declare himself bald at once, he would be ever so much better. He would look to be fifty then. He looks sixty now."

"What matters his age? He is forty-five, just for I know. And he is a good man."

"What has his goodness to do with it?"

"A great deal, I think. It matters for nothing, and he makes two hundred florins a month. He has two shares in the summer theatre. I know it."

"Bah! what is all that when he will plaster his hair over his old bald head?"

"Lotta, I am ashamed of you!" But at this moment the further expression of Marie's anger was stopped by the entrance of the diamond-cutter, and as he was about to be introduced he entered, not pleasantly. We must give Lotta her due, and declare that, as things had gone, she would much prefer that he should not have come there at all. Herr Planken was as handsome a young fellow as there was in Vienna, and one who dressed with the best taste, and danced with the most graceful agility, and could speak French, and was confidential clerk at one of the largest hotels in Vienna, and was a young man acknowledged to have a good social importance—and had, moreover, in plain language declared his love for Lotta Schmidt. But Lotta would not be ashamed of her acquaintance with Carl Crippel, and she was generously glad when Carl Stobel, the diamond-cutter, came by himself. Then there was a second and a third chair to be found, and that Herr Crippel came down, according to promise, and was introduced to Carl Stobel.

"Ladies," said he, "I hope I have not gathered wool."

"You have surpassed yourself," said Lotta.

"At wool-gathering?" said Herr Crippel.

"At sending us out of this world into another," said Lotta.

"Ah! go into no other world but this," said Herr Crippel, "lest I should not be able to follow you." And he shook his head and looked big.

Before another piece had been commenced Lotta saw Frix Planken enter the door. He stood for a moment against the end of the hall, with his cane in his hand and his hat on his head, looking for the party which he intended to join. Lotta did not say a word, nor would she turn her eyes toward him. She would not recognise him if it were possible to avoid it. But he soon saw her, and came up to the table at which they were sitting. When Lotta was getting the third chair for Marie's lover Herr Crippel, in his gallantry, had brought a fourth, and now Fritz occupied the seat which the musician had placed there. Lotta, as she perceived this, was sorry that it should be so. She could not even dare to look up to see what effect this new arrival would have upon the leader of the band.

The new-comer was certainly a handsome young man—such a one as inflicts unutterable agonies on the hearts of the Herr Crippels of the world. His boots shone like mirrors, and fitted his feet like gloves. There was something in the make and sit of his trowsers which Herr Crippel, looking at them as he could not help looking at them, was quite unable to understand. Only twenty years ago Herr Crippel's trowsers, as Herr Crippel very well knew, had never looked like that. And Fritz Planken wore a black-and-white silk lining to his waistcoat, which seemed to have come from some tailor among the gods. And if the waistcoat-lining were not enough, he had a bright pink satin handkerchief, joined by a ring, which gave a richness of coloring to the whole thing which nearly killed Herr Crippel, because he could not but acknowledge that the coloring was good. And then the hat! And when the hat was taken off for a moment, then the hair—perfectly black, and silky as a raven's wing, just waving with one curl! And when Fritz put up his hand, and ran his fingers through his locks, their richness and plenty and beauty were conspicuous to all beholders. Herr Crippel, as he saw it, involuntarily flushed his hand up to his own pate, and scratched his straggling lanky hairs from off his head.

"You are coming to Sperl's to-morrow, of course?" said Fritz to Lotta. Now Sperl's is a great establishment for dancing in the Leopoldstadt, which is always open of a Sunday evening, and which Lotta Schmidt was in the habit of attending with much regularity. It was here she had become acquainted with Fritz. And certainly to dance with Fritz was to dance indeed! Lotta too was a beautiful dancer. To a Viennese such as Lotta Schmidt dancing was a thing of serious importance. It was a misfortune to her to have to dance with a bad dancer, as it is to a great whist-player among us to sit down with a bad partner. Oh, what she had suffered more than once when Herr Planken had induced her to stand up with him!

"Yes, I shall be there, you will go?"

"I do not know," said Marie.

"You will make her go, Carl, will you not?" said Lotta.

"She promised me yesterday, as I understood," said Carl.

"Of course we will all be there," said Fritz, somewhat grandly; "and I will give a supper for four."

Then the music began again, and the eyes of all of them became fixed upon Herr Crippel. It was unfortunate that they should have been placed so fully before him, as it was impossible that he should avoid seeing them. He stood up with his fiddle close to his shoulders his eyes were fixed on Fritz Planken, and Fritz Planken's boots, and coat, and hat, and hair. He knew that Lotta's face was over against him, was thinking of his own boots and of his own hair. Fritz was sitting, leaning forward in his chair, so that he could speak to Lotta's face, and to Lotta's face only, playing with a little amber-headed cane, and every now and then he dropped a word which Herr Crippel could hardly play a note. In very truth he was wool-gathering. His head became unsteady, and every instant he would draw a wrong bow.

"Your old friend is making a mess of it to-night," said Fritz to Lotta. "I hope he has not taken a glass too much of beer."

"He never does any thing of the kind!" said Lotta, angrily. "He never did such a thing in his life."

"He is playing awful badly," said Fritz.

"I never heard him play better in my life than he has played this evening," said Lotta.

"His hand is tired. He is getting old," said Fritz. Then Lotta moved her chair and drew herself back, and was conscious that Fritz at the table should see that she was angry with her young lover. In the mean time the piece of music had been finished, and the musicians had thrown their energy in performers' inferiority by withdrawing those pluralis which they were so ready to give when they were played.

After this some other musician led for a while, and then Herr Crippel had to come forward to play a solo. It was on the occasion the violin was to be to his instrument. He was a great favorite among the lovers of music in Vienna, not only because he played, and that in a high way, those airs which by his hand he could keep a band of musicians together, but also as a player on the zither. It was not often he would play in the hall which he filled in the concert-hall in the Volksgarten; for he would say that he had given up that instrument; that he now played as only in private, and that it was not fit for the concert-hall, as a single voice, the scraping of a foot, would destroy its music. And Herr Crippel was a man who had his own fantasies, and whose wishes were always yield to entreaty. But occasionally he would send his zither down to the public hall; and in the beginning of the evening it had been put forth that Herr Crippel's zither would be there, and that Herr Crippel would perform. And now the zither was brought forward, and a chair was put for the zitherist, and Herr Crippel stood for a moment behind his instrument. Lotta glanced up at him and could see that he was very pale. She could even see that the perspiration stood upon his brow. She saw his hand trembling, and that he would have given almost his zither itself to be quit of his promised performance for that night. But she knew also that he would make the attempt.

"What, the zither?" said Fritz. "He will break down as sure as he is a living man."

"Let us have no more," said Carl Stobel.

"I love to hear him play the zither better than any thing," said Lotta.

"It used to be very good," said Fritz; "but every body says he has lost his touch. When a man has the slightest feeling of nervousness he is done for the zither."

"Ih—sh; let him have his chance at any rate," said Marie.

"Heaven did you ever hear the zither? When played, as it is sometimes played in Vienna, it combines all the softest notes of the human voice. It sings to you of love, and then wails to you of departed love, till it fills you with a melancholy from which there is no escaping, from which you never wish to escape. It speaks to you as no other instrument ever speaks, and reveals to you with a wonderful eloquence the sadness in which it delights. It produces a luxury of anguish, a fullness of the satisfaction of imaginary woe, a realization of its mysterious delights of romance, which no words can ever thoroughly supply. When Herr Crippel began, while the music is still in the air, the ear seems to covet greedily every atom of tone which the instrument will yield, the slightest and most evanescent sound becomes an offense. The noted ear and sink so low and be heard no more. Herr Crippel was not the slightest fear of such a thing. He knew well that in the struggle of listening. There seemed to come upon the large on his sense of hearing, which he fears will shut out from his brain the last, breathe, sweetest strain, the very pearl of the music, for which he has been watching with all the intensity of prolonged desire. And then the zither is silent, and there remains a fond memory together with a deep regret.

Herr Crippel seated himself on his stool and looked once or twice round about upon the room almost with dismay. Then he struck his zither, very, mainly, weakly, and commenced the melody of his piece. But Lotta thought that she had never heard so sweet a sound. When he passed from the strokes there was a sound of applause in the room, of applause intended to encourage by commencement of the great trinkets. The musician looked again away from his music to his audience, and his eye caught the eyes of the girl he loved; and his gaze and also upon the face of the young man who was young Adonis who was by her side. He, Herr Crippel the musician, could never make himself believe that that young man could ever think of approach that outward triumph. But then, he could play the zither, and Fritz Planken could only play with a cane! He would do what he could. He would play his best! He had once almost resolved to put up and declare that he was too tired that evening to do justice to his instrument. But there was an insolence of success about his rival's hat and trowsers which spirited him on to the fight. He struck in zither again, and they who understood him and his zither knew that he was in earnest.

The old men who had listened to him for the last twenty years declared that he had never played as he played on that night. At first he was somewhat bolder, somewhat louder than was his wont; as though he were resolved to go through the necessary track; but, after a while, he gave that up; that was simply the effect of nervousness, and was conquered only by the fullness of his strength to prove with him. But he soon forgot every thing but his zither and his desire to do it justice. The stirring of all performers was over him, and he was mild have heard a pin fall. Even Fritz sat perfectly still, with his mouth open, and forgot to play with his cane. Lotta grew pale, and trembled, and sighed, and before long they were rolling down her cheeks. Herr Crippel, though he did not look at her, knew that she was aware that it was so. The cause upon them all there an ecstasy of delicious sense. All the musicians around him were standing that no softest sound might escape unheard. And then at last the zither was silent, and no one said a word, but all knew that the moment when it had ceased to sing.

For a few moments there was perfect silence in the room, and then the musician rose from his seat, his face turned upon his instrument. He knew well that he had succeeded, that his triumph had been complete, and every consciousness that applause was suspended was an added jewel to his crown. But it soon came, the loud shouts of praise, the cry of bravos, the clapping of hands, the stamping of feet upon the floor, and the applause of the hall, the clapping of hands, the sweet sound of women's voices, and the waving of white handkerchiefs. The applause stood up, bowed thrice, wiped his face with a handkerchief, and then sat down on a stool in the corner of the orchestra.

"I don't know much about his being so old," said Carl Stobel.

"Nor I either," said Lotta.

"That is what I call music," said Marie Weber.

"He can play the zither, certainly," said Fritz; "but as to the rest, he is most absolutely."

"He is excellent with both—with both," said Lotta, angrily.

Soon after that the party got up to leave the hall, and as they went out they encountered Herr Crippel.

"You have gone beyond yourself to-night," said Marie, "and we wish you joy."

"Oh no. It was pretty good, was it? With the zither I do not know where on the atmosphere; whether it is hot, or cold, or wet, or dry, or of Good-night Sir!" And he took off his hat, and bowed—bowed, as it were, expressly to Fritz.

"Herr Crippel," said Lotta, "one word with you." And she dropped behind from Fritz, and returned to the musician. "Herr Crippel, will you meet us at Sperl's to-morrow night?"

"At Sperl's? No. I do not go to Sperl's any longer, Lotta. You told me that Marie's friend was coming to-night; but you did not tell me of your own."

"Never mind what I told you, or did not tell you. Herr Crippel, will you come to Sperl's to-morrow?"

"No; you would not dance with me, and I should not care to see you dance with any one else."

"But I will dance with you."

"And Planken will be there?"

"Yes; Fritz will be there. He is always there. I can not help that."

"No, Lotta; I will not go to Sperl's. I will tell you a little secret. At forty-five one is too old for Sperl's."

"There are men there every Sunday over fifty—over sixty, I am sure."

"They are men different in their ways of life from me, my dear. No, I will not go to Sperl's. When will you come and see my mother?"

Lotta promised that she would go and see the Frau Crippel before long, and then tripped off and joined her party.

Student and Marie had walked on, while Fritz remained a little behind for Lotta.

"Did you ask him to come to Sperl's to-morrow?" he said.

"To be sure I did."

"Was that nice of you, Lotta?"

"Why not nice? Nice or not, I did it. Why should not I ask him, if I please?"

"Because I thought I was to have the pleasure of entertaining you—that it was a little party of my own."

"Very well, Herr Planken," said Lotta, drawing herself a little away from him; if a friend of mine is not welcome at your little party I certainly shall not join it myself."

"But, Lotta, does not every one know what it is that Crippel values at you?"

"There is no harm in his wishing. My friends tell me that I am very foolish not to give him what he wishes. But I still have the chance."

"Oh yes; no doubt you still have the chance."

"Herr Crippel is a very good man. He is the best son in the world, and he makes two hundred florins a month."

"Oh, if that is to count!"

"Of course it is to count. Why should it not count? Would the Princess Theresa have married the other day if the young Prince had had no income to support her upon?"

"You can do as you please, Lotta."

"Yes, I can do as I please, certainly. I suppose Adela Brühl will be at Sperl's to-morrow?"

"I should say so, certainly. I hardly ever knew her to miss her Sunday evening."

"Not I. I am fond of dancing—very. It delight in dancing. But I am not a slave to Sperl's, and then I do not care to dance with every one."

"Adela Brühl dances very well," said Fritz.

"That is as one may think. She ought to; for she begins at ten, and goes on till two, always. If there is no one nice for dancing she puts up with some one that is not nice. But all that is nothing to me."

"Nothing, I should say, Lotta."

"Nothing in the world. But this is something; last Sunday you danced three times with Adela."

"Did I? I did not count."

"I counted. Fritz, if you dance to-morrow with Adela you will not dance with me again—either then or ever."

And having uttered this threat she ran on and found Marie, who had just reached the door of the house in which they both lived.

Fritz, as he walked home by himself, was in doubt as to the course which it would be his duty as a man to pursue in reference to the lady whom he loved. He had distinctly heard that lady ask an old admirer of hers to go to Sperl's and dance with her; and yet, within ten minutes afterward, she had peremptorily commanded him not to dance with another girl! Now, Fritz Planken had a very good opinion of himself, as he was well entitled to have, and was quite aware that other pretty girls besides Lotta Schmidt were within his reach. He did not receive two hundred florins a month as did Herr Crippel, but then he was five-and-twenty instead of five-and-forty; and, in the matter of money, too, he was doing pretty well. He did love Lotta Schmidt. It would not be easy for him to part with her. But she, too, loved him—as he told himself, she would hardly push matters to extremities. At any rate he would not submit to a threat. He would dance with Adela Brühl at Sperl's.

At about half past ten the next evening Marie and Lotta entered Sperl's dancing-saloon, and paid their footing, and set themselves down on seats in the further saloon, from which, through open archways, they could see the dancers. Neither Carl nor Fritz was there as yet, and the girls were quite content to wait. It was to be presumed that they would be there before the men, and they both understood that the real dancing was not commenced early in the evening. It might be all very well for such as Adela Brühl to dance with any one who came in the way; but Lotta Schmidt would not care to amuse herself after that fashion. As to Marie, she was to be married after another week, and of course she would dance with no one but Carl Stobel.

Soon after this Carl and Fritz came together, and Fritz, as he passed across the end of the first saloon, spoke a word or two to Adela. Lotta saw this, but determined that she would take no offense at so small a matter. Within two minutes Carl and Marie were dancing, and Fritz had asked Lotta to stand up.

"I will wait a little," said she; "I never like to begin much before eleven."

"As you please," said Fritz; and he sat down in the chair which Marie had occupied. Then he played with his cane, and as he did so his eyes followed the steps of Adela Brühl.

"She dances very well," said Lotta.

"H—m—m, yes." Fritz did not choose to be now any strong praise on Adela's dancing.

"Yes, Fritz, she does dance well—very well indeed. And she is never tired. If you ask me whether I like her style I can not quite say that I do. It is not what we do here—not exactly."

"She has lived in Vienna since she was a child."

"It is a pity she has, then, I suppose. Look at her fair hair, all blowing about. She is not like one of us."

"No no, she is not."

"That she is very pretty I quite admit," said Lotta. "Those soft gray eyes are delicious. Is it a pity she has no eyebrows?"

"But she has eyebrows."

"Ah, you have been closer than I, and you have seen them. I have never danced with her, and I can not see them. Of course they are there—more or less."

After a while the dancing ceased, and Adela Brühl came up into the supper-room, passing the seats on which Fritz and Lotta were sitting.

"Are you not going to dance, Fritz?" she said, with a smile, as she passed them.

"Go, go," said Lotta; "why do you not go? She has invited you."

"No; she has not invited me. She spoke to us both."

"She did not speak to me, for my name is not Fritz. I do not see how you can help going when she asked you so prettily."

"I shall be in plenty of time presently. Will you dance now, Lotta? They are going to begin a waltz, and we will have a quadrille afterward."

"No, Herr Planken, I will not dance just now."

"Herr Planken, is it? You want to quarrel with me then, Lotta."

"I do not want to be one of two. I will not be one of two. Adela Brühl is very pretty, and I do not wish you to go to her. I was told nicely yesterday her father can give her fifteen hundred florins of fortune! For me—I have no father."

"But you must dance with me to-morrow."

"Yes, that is true, and a good one. Oh, such a good one!"

"What do you mean by that?"

"You go and dance with Adela Brühl and you shall see what I mean."

Fritz had some idea in his own mind, more or less clearly developed, that his fate, as regarded Lotta Schmidt, now lay in his own hands. He undoubtedly desired to have Lotta for his own. He would have married her there and then—at that moment, had it been possible. He had quite made up his mind that he preferred her much to Adela Brühl, though Adela Brühl had fifteen hundred florins. But he did not like to endure tyranny, even from Lotta, and he did not know how to escape the tyranny otherwise than by dancing with Adela. He paused a moment, swinging his cane, unbeknown to him, by his side, and lost not his manhood and yet not offend the girl he loved. But he found that to assert his manhood was now his first duty.

"Well, Lotta," he said, "since you are so cross with me, I will ask Adela to dance." And in two minutes he was spinning round the room with Adela Brühl in his arms.

"Certainly she dances very well," said Lotta, smiling, to Marie, who had now come back to her seat.

"Very well," said Marie, who was out of breath. "And so does he."

"Beautifully," said Marie.

"Is it not a pity that I should have lost such a partner forever?"

"Lotta!"

"It is true. Look here, Marie, there is my hand upon it. I will never dance with him again—never—never. Why was he so hard upon Herr Crippel last night?"

"Was he hard upon Herr Crippel?"

"He said that Herr Crippel was too old to play the zither. Well! Some people are too young to understand. I shall go home, I shall not stay to sup with you to-night."

"Lotta, you must stay for supper."

"I will not sup at his table. I have quarrelled with him. It is all over. Fritz Planken is as free as the air to me."

"Lotta, do not say any thing in a hurry. At any rate do not do any thing in a hurry."

"I do not mean to do any thing at all. It is simply this—I do not care very much for Fritz after all. I don't think I ever did. It is all very well to be engaged to a man nicely, but if that is all, what does it come to? If he could play the zither, now!"

"There are other things except playing the zither. They say he is a good dancer."

"I don't like book-keeping. He has to be at his hotel from eight in the morning till eleven at night."

"You know best."

"I am not so sure of that. I wish I did know best. But I have now such a girl as you are. How you change! It was only yesterday you were not to me because I did not wish to be the wife of your dear friend Crippel."

"Herr Crippel is a very good man."

"You go away with your good man! you have got a good man for yourself. I do not think there was waiting for you like a gander on one leg. He wants you to dance, go away." Then Marie did go away, and Lotta was left alone by herself. At last Fritz returned to her and bade her come to supper. He was resolved to see how far his new mode of casting off tyranny might be successful, so he approached her with a smile, and offered to take her to his table as though nothing had occurred.

"My friend," she said, "your table is laid for four, and the places will all be filled."

"The table is laid for me," said Fritz.

"It is one too many. I shall sup with my friend, Herr Crippel."

"Herr Crippel is not here."

"Is he not? Ah me! then I shall be alone, and I must go to bed supperless. Good-by, Herr Planken."

"And what will Marie say?"

"I hope she will enjoy the nice dainties you will give her. Marie is all right. Marie's fortune is made. Woe is me! my fortune is to seek. There is one thing certain, it is not to be found here in this room."

Then Fritz turned on his heel and went away; and as he went Lotta saw the figure of a man, as he made his way out, straightway into the saloon from the outer passage. He was dressed in a close frock-coat, and had on a hat of which she knew the shape as well as she did the make of her own gloves. "If he has not come after all!" she said to herself. Then she turned herself a little round, and drew her chair somewhat into an archway, so that Herr Crippel should not see her readily.

The other four had settled themselves at their table, Marie having said a word of reproach to Lotta as she passed. Now, on a sudden, she got up from her seat and crossed to her friend.

"Herr Crippel is here," she said.

"Of course he is here," said Lotta.

"But you did not expect him?"

"Ask Fritz if I did not say I would sup with Herr Crippel. You ask him. But I shall not all the same. Do not say a word. I shall steal away when nobody is looking."

The musicians came wandering up the room, and had looked into every corner before he had even found the couple at which the four were sitting. And then he did not see Lotta. He took off his hat as he addressed Marie, and asked some question as to the absence of Lotta.

"She is waiting for you somewhere, Herr Crippel," said Fritz as he filled Adela's glass with wine.

"For me! Herr Crippel, as he looked round. "No, she does not expect me." And in the mean time Lotta had left her seat and was hurrying away by the door.

"There! there!" said Marie; "you will be too late if you do not run." Then Herr Crippel did run, and caught Lotta as she was taking her hat from the old woman who had the girls' hats and shawls in charge near the door.

"What, Herr Crippel, you at Sperl's? When you told me expressly, in so many words, that you would not come! That is not behaving well to me, certainly."

"What, my coming? Is that behaving bad?"

"No; but why did you say you would not come when I asked you? You have come to meet some one. Who is it?"

"Yes, Lotta, you."

"And yet you refused me when I asked you! Well, and now you are here, what are you going to do? You will dance with me?"

"I will dance with you if you will put up with me."

"No, I will not dance. I am too old. I have given it up. I shall come to Sperl's no more after this. Dancing is a folly."

"Lotta, you are looking at me now."

"Very well; if you like you may have it so. By this time he has brought her back into the room, and was sitting down by her side at the table as the saloon with her. "But it is no use our walking about here," she said. "I was just going home; and now, if you please, Herr Crippel, I will go."

"Not yet, Lotta."

"Yes; now, if you please."

"But why are you not supping with them?"

"Because it did not suit me. You see there are four. Five is a foolish number for a supper-party."

"Will you sup with me, Lotta?" he did not answer him at once. "Lotta," he said, "if you sup with me now you must sup with me always. You know what I mean."

"Always? no. I am very hungry now, but I do not want supper always. I can not sup with you always, Herr Crippel."

"But you will to-night?"

"Yes, to-night."

"Then it shall be always." And the musician marched up to a table, and threw his hat down, and ordered supper for two. And that evening—Herr Crippel bowed courteously to the diamond-cutter, and asked him when he was to be married.

"Marie says I shall be married," said Carl.

"And I will be married the Sunday afterward," said Herr Crippel. "Yes; and there is my wife, I declare!" and across the table with both his hands to Lotta Schmidt.

Herr Crippel, how can you say that?" said Lotta.

"Is it not true, my dear?"

"In fourteen days' so, certainly not. It is out of the question." But nevertheless what Herr Crippel said came true, and on the next Sunday but one he took Lotta Schmidt home to his house as his wife.

"It was all because of the zither," Lotta said to her old mother-in-law. "If he had not played the zither that night I should not have been here now."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

EVERY summer the weather—as if it were an impertinent lawyer employed by our editors—is the stated recipient of the most vituperative abuse. Every summer brings an excess of heat to which there has hitherto been no parallel, and every summer is conspicuous. So many degrees hotter than has been known within the memory of the oldest inhabitant! The mercury is declared to have gone up out of sight; and eighty-seven degrees of Fahrenheit, following some more "fearful temperature," is pronounced "awful weather." "Fierce." "Fervid," "awful," "terrible," "infernal," are the terms used, and language is exhausted, and new epithets coined, in the apparently vain attempt to depict the sufferings of dissolving humanity.

In truth, we have had a couple or so of excessively hot "heated terms;" and, according to well-established rule, the quicksilver has shot up higher than in many years before. Consequently there is much more suffering, especially among the laboring classes, who are exposed to the intense rays of the sun, and who, when they rest, have no low, oven-like shanties. But those who have shelter in large, high, comparatively airy rooms, would do well to bate their complaints, and think of those who have no such accommodations. The truth is, that half the discomfort we experience is due to our own unsatisfied. We fret, and fume, and worry, and scold, and fan ourselves, until the hot blood boils! The only way to endure a hot day is to keep cool! "Keep cool!" somebody sarcastically remarks, "and how, pray?" Shall we take a bath in an ice-house? Why, no; but how many millions of times have I been told that the way to endure a hot day is to keep cool! He had fired two hundred rounds of bad shot.

It seems that the war does not altogether prevent people resorting to the German watering-places even thus early in the season. Ems already reckons more than a thousand visitors—Germans, Swedes, Russians, and English. The French will arrive in large numbers, according to custom, in July. The bains des folâtries, we are told, is very conspicuous at Ems; and the rivalry carried on between the two bathing establishments is something astonishing. The elegancies of les gentlemen Baigneuses at the fashionable watering-place will not fail to claim their full share of admiration.

Outside of our own latitude it brings a sort of cooling breeze to hear that a short time ago there was a fall of snow three feet deep on the mountains in Utah, covering them down to their base. The snow-storm was preceded by a terrific hail-storm in the lowlands.

It also has a wonderfully refrigerating effect to read the recent announcement of an "Excursion among the Icebergs" in the vicinity of "Labrador," even down to, "For particulars address Franklin Dane & Co.," etc.

A happy individual writing from Savannah, Georgia, a short time since, declares that "for ten days past outside winter clothing has been comfortable, and at night a blanket;" and he grows rhapsodic about the "delightful sea-breeze blowing through his windows." However, we do not think that even this will tempt many to exchange New York for Georgia just now.

Saratoga in a cool urban thus was quite a contrast to the Saratoga of our day. A visitor to that place in 1797 gives the following account:

"We mounted our horses one day and rode seven or eight miles through the pine forest, with its delightful fragrance, and arrived at a place where they said there were some mineral springs. There was not even a village, but only two or three log-houses standing among the pinetrees. The people were civil, and provided hay for our horses and some bread and cheese and eggs. They piloted us into a morass where Nature was unsubdued, and stepping cautiously from bog to bog, we soon arrived at a spring which they called the Congress Spring, which tasted as it does now."

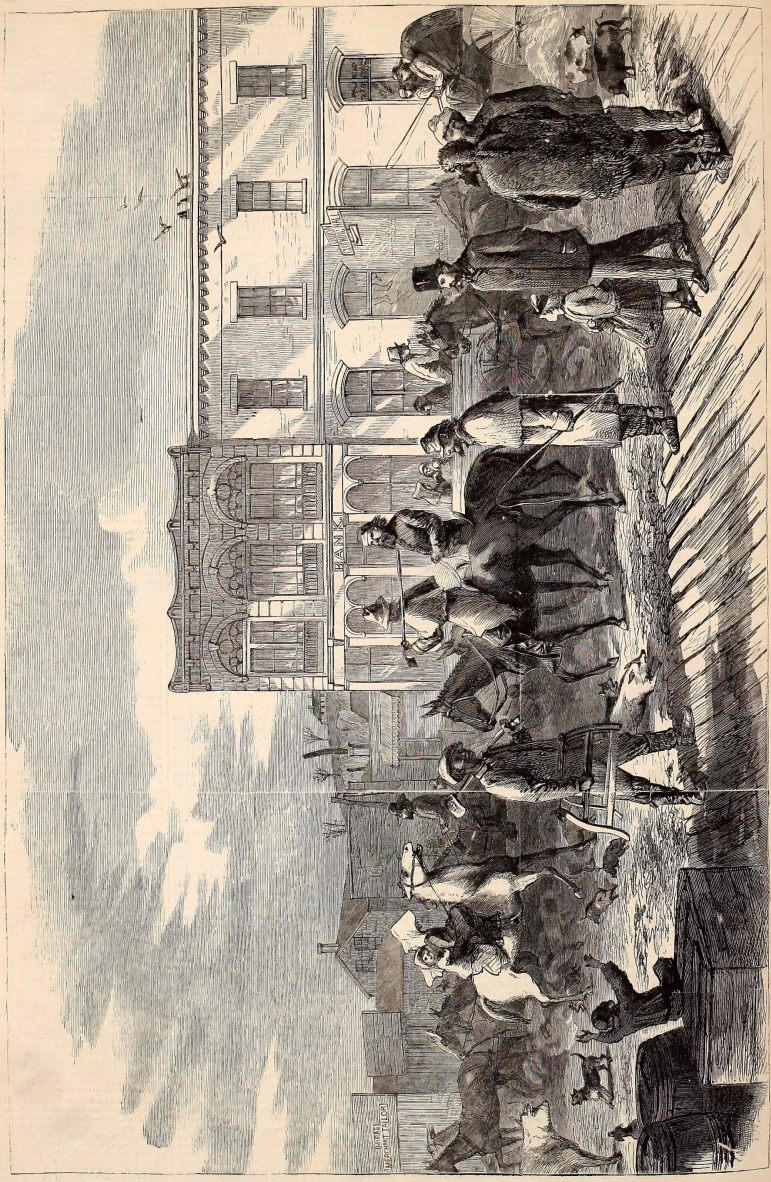
Now the resident population is numbered by thousands, to say nothing of the annual throng that deluges the place in the months of July and August. The "season" there is now fully inaugurated, and thirty mortals are freely quaffing their several libations of health. A new spring has been discovered this season near the "High Rock," and the old ones have not lost their parks. Many will be interested to know that a movement has been started toward the rebuilding of Congress Hall, with the intention of having it in readiness for the next season. It is expected that at least $100,000 will be secured at once. Assurances are given that large subscriptions will be made in New York, Boston, and other cities, among those who were patrons of that hotel.

There is something exceedingly pleasant in the substantial and unostentatious way in which New York, and all the larger cities have rendered aid to Portland in hour of need. But it is really touching to hear of little towns in Maine and other States—towns that have an wealthy men with pockets full of money—calling meeting, and with earnest sympathy contributing their mite for the sufferers. It is good to see the hearts of people opening to such a call on their benevolence and sympathy.

There are thousands all over the country interested in the prosperity of Amherst College who will be glad to know that it is the intention of the trustees to erect immediately a new building, for which purpose a son of President Stearns, a wealthy merchant of Bombay, has donated thirty thousand dollars. Also there is to be erected a new Library building, for which nearly forty thousand dollars has been subscribed; and a new building to be devoted to the International and Philosophical apparatus. This latter will be the finest building, and will cost two hundred thousand dollars, a gift from Dr. Walker, late of Newport, who has during his life gave to the College another hundred thousand dollars. The associates of the College have contributed those buildings and the land, et al once. It is intended to convert the present Library building into an Art Gallery, for which it is admirably adapted, and all of the College have already promised valuable contributions to it.

Not many months ago sundry communications appeared in the columns of the London English Journal in which, in English schools, girls, and even young ladies, were frequently subjected to degrading corporeal punishment. The facts were evident, and a good deal of indignation was manifested in regard to the matter. But recently an open discussion has taken place in the best conference in one of our most enlightened New England cities. In one of the public schools of the city of Cambridge, Hyperas—or was, indeed, the report runs false—that a young lady, now in her seventeenth year, was detected in whispering in a class called up for punishment by one of the assistant-teachers. To this she refused to submit. The principal was consulted, and it was determined to whip the delinquent. Two assistants undertook to administer the blows. A struggle ensued, and the principal came to the aid of his subordinates. The young lady was held until a dozen or twenty blows were inflicted upon her person with a leather strap. The parents of the young lady appeared on the scene of action, but they contented the course of the teachers; and the case has been laid before the General Court of the county. Undoubtedly the authority should be maintained in schools; but if a young lady of sixteen does not yield to it willingly, she better be expelled. Such degrading punishments as this stain the noble system of public education in America.

A Richmond paper warns with indignation because a certain number of colored ladies and gentlemen were recently seen, on a Sunday, riding in all the style that the livery stables could furnish, with fashionable dresses and drivers worn upon the box and the negroes upon the cushions behind—a strange reversal of former situations.



The following quaint words of old Robert Southwell are worthy of being committed to memory:

"Sloth delays, they breed remorse:
Take time while time is lent thee.
Creeping snails have weakest force;
Fly their fault, lest you repent them.
Good is best when soonest wrought;
Lingering labors come to nought;
Hoist up sail while gale doth last—
Wind and tide stay no man's pleasure.
Seek not time when time is past,
Sober speed is wisdom's leisure.
After wits are dearly bought:
Let the world guide thy knowledge."

The European war, which will cause such misery to thousands who have had no hand in bringing it about, rebuilds us of a few more wardens, old, but good.

"What are you thinking, my man?" said Lord Hill, as he approached a soldier, who was leaning in a gloomy mood upon his firelock, after the second long day of hard thousands of French and English; it was a few hours after the battle of Inkermann, and the soldier was a Highlander. The soldier started, and after saluting his General, answered: "I was thinking, my lord, how many widows' cruses I have this day made for one shilling." He had fired two hundred rounds of ball that day.

It seems that the war does not altogether prevent people resorting to the German watering-places even thus early in the season. Ems already reckons more than a thousand visitors—Germans, Swedes, Russians, and English. The French will arrive in large numbers, according to custom, in July. The bains des folâtries, we are told, is very conspicuous at Ems; and the rivalry carried on between the two bathing establishments is something astonishing. The elegancies of les gentlemen Baigneuses at the fashionable watering-place will not fail to claim their full share of admiration.

THE HEROINE OF FREDERICK.

WHEN "STONEWALL" JACKSON invaded Maryland in 1862 there was found in Frederick, through which his troops marched, one fearless Unionist, an aged lady, whose name was BARBARA FRIETCHIE. Faithful among the faithless she held out the "Stars and Stripes" from her window in the very faces of the rebel raiders. The story is well told in WHITTIER'S beautiful poem, which we have taken the liberty of copying below. The portrait is from a photograph sent us by Mr. BRADY of Washington, to whom we were indebted for the photograph from which "The Andersonville Relics," given in our last Number, was engraved.

BARBARA FRIETCHIE.

Up from the meadows rich with corn,
Clear in the cool September morn,

The clustered spires of Frederick stand
Green-walled by the hills of Maryland.

Round about them orchards sweep,
Apple and peach tree fruited deep,

Fair as a garden of the Lord
To the eyes of the famished rebel horde,

On that pleasant morn of the early fall
When Lee marched over the mountain-wall—

Over the mountains winding down,
Horse and foot, into Frederick town.

Forty flags with their silver stars,
Forty flags with their crimson bars,

Flapped in the morning wind: the sun
Of noon looked down, and saw not one.

Up rose old Barbara Frietchie then,
Bowed with her fourscore years and ten;

Bravest of all in Frederick town,
She took up the flag the men hauled down;

In her attic-window the staff she set,
To show that one heart was loyal yet.

Up the street came the rebel tread,
Stonewall Jackson riding ahead.

Under his slouched hat left and right
He glanced; the old flag met his sight.

"Halt!"—the dust-brown ranks stood fast.
"Fire!"—out blazed the rifle-blast.

It shivered the window, pane and sash;
It rent the banner with seam and gash.

Quick, as it fell, from the broken staff
Dame Barbara snatched the silken scarf;

She leaned far out on the window-sill,
And shook it forth with a royal will.

"Shoot, if you must, this old gray head,
But spare your country's flag," she said.

A shade of sadness, a blush of shame,
Over the face of the leader came;

The noble nature within him stirred
To life at that woman's deed and word:

"Who touches a hair of yon gray head
Dies like a dog! March on!" he said.

All day long through Frederick street
Sounded the tread of marching feet:

All day long that free flag tost
Over the heads of the rebel host.

Ever its torn folds rose and fell
On the loyal winds that loved it well;

And through the hill-gaps sunset light
Shone over it with a warm good-night.

Barbara Frietchie's work is o'er,
And the Rebel rides on his raids no more.

Honor to her! and let a tear
Fall, for her sake, on Stonewall's bier.

Over Barbara Frietchie's grave,
Flag of Freedom and Union, wave!

Peace and order and beauty draw
Round thy symbol of light and law;

And ever the stars above look down
On thy stars below in Frederick town!

A CRUEL PUNISHMENT.

THE letter which we give below is from a gentleman in Richmond, Virginia, who sends us the photograph from which our illustration is engraved. The case stands on unquestionable authority, and the time is now gone by when things of this nature are to be hidden from the public:

"RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, July 5, 1866.

"Editor Harper's Weekly:

"Inclosed I send you a photograph showing in part the effects of a punishment by a hot iron on the back of a negro girl about 13 years of age, inflicted by a virago by the name of Mrs. A——, living in King William County in this State, a few weeks ago. The case is at present under investigation by the President's Bureau of this Department. The negroes who lived on the place all testify to the cruelty and fiendishness of this woman while they were her slaves and since they were liberated. This girl was locked up in a private room, for some trivial offence, and kept in there over a week, during which time the burning was inflicted upon her. Her screams were frequently heard by the servants. Live coals were laid upon her back and the back of her head, and the flesh on her back and limbs was burned so that when she was released she could scarcely stand and was nearly crazy. The case was reported, the girl brought to this city, and Mrs. A—— arrested.

"The papers of this city all with one accord sang out against the Bureau for its interference, and Mrs. A—— instead of the fiend that she is, was a martyred and chivalrous Southern lady. She was required to give bail in $2000. All the counsel of the city tendered her their services. The Judge-Advocate of this Department, Captain LAYTON, Eleventh United States Infantry, conducted the examination. If the evidence were all published it would present one of the most cruel and heartless episodes of history that have disgraced civilization."

A BATHING COSTUME.

HAPPILY the days have gone by when lady bathers made frights of themselves when enjoying that most healthful and invigorating of recreations—a dip in salt water. Ugly blue flannel gowns, cut so scantily that it was difficult to squeeze into them, and which never fulfilled the object for which they were intended, as they generally rose to the surface of the water directly after their wearers plunged into it—these ungraceful garments, with the hideous oilskin cap which crowned them, may now be looked upon as things of the past. They have been succeeded by a far superior style of dress, which, in fact, is a picturesque costume, consisting of tunic and knickerbockers. We give an illustration of one of the most approved and convenient forms of bathing dress which has yet been introduced. It answers its mission, for it conceals the figure without impeding in the slightest degree the actions of its wearer when either bathing or swimming, and, added to these advantages, it looks well. The tunic fastens at the left side, and the knickerbockers in front. There are various opinions as to the best material for bathing costumes. For summer wear we recommend the stout brown holland. This does not cling to the figure when wetted, neither does it hold the water, as flannel, and so become cumbersome and heavy. It should be trimmed, as in our illustration, with scarlet worsted braid of two sizes. The binding of the knickerbockers and tunic, and the trimming on the shoulder seam, consist of strips of brown holland cut on the cross, and two rows of narrow scarlet braid run upon them; the box pleatings round the arm-holes and ankles are of scarlet worsted braid, from an inch to one inch and a half in width. The waistband and sash are likewise of brown holland bound with braid, two waved lines of narrow braid being added as an ornamentation. The buttons are black horn. The cap is black oilskin, bound with scarlet. French ladies wear small black glazed hats to protect their complexions when swimming, as they do not deem it imperative to dip their heads under water when they bathe. Dark blue serge, similar to that worn by sailors in the British navy, we also recommend as a suitable material for this costume. It likewise can be trimmed with either white or scarlet worsted braid, according to our engraving.

STREET SCENE IN ATCHISON.

THE picture which we give on page 476 illustrates an everyday scene in Atchison, Kansas. The locality which our artist has chosen is Commercial Street, and he has faithfully depicted the style of buildings in the business part of the city. These buildings are a medley of brick structures and cotton-wood shanties. The figures are drawn from life. Here in the fore-ground we have a Kan-ses farmer; the shaggy cronies on horseback are returning to their homes in Missouri after a hunt, which it would seem has not been very successful. The woman and girl riding "double" is a common sight, though to Eastern eyes it may appear strange and somewhat ludicrous.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE PORTLAND FIRE.

PORTLAND, July 16, 1866.

You would like "a stereoscopic view of the burned district." Well, to see the burned district you had better come in at the Boston depôt—for best that is what I did—and take a walk. The fire broke out not far from the point where we start and burned over a broad swath, as the mower's say diagonally across the city. How it caught, how it burned, and how it stopped, you will have learned from the papers of the time. How it looks to-day is what is best learned now. The extent of the fire is the first thing that impresses the mind. It is built-ings—not as in the New York—a few burned out what we often see in New York—a few burned buildings—but it is a good many burned buildings merely; but a long, broad track of ruined chimneys, demolished walls, and rubbish—buried streets.

The topographyness of the burning is what you next notice. Several things illustrate this. First, the buildings are entirely in ruins. They are not standing gap in shape, with blackened windows and charred interiors, as is commonly the case when a house is burned—but demolished. As a rule the chimney stands; but the walls of each building have fallen entirely in, so that only a vague notion of the general ground-plan is all that one can form respecting the edifice. In a two-hours' walk through the district we find, perhaps, ten spots where we get a show somewhat of the size, shape, architecture, and uses of what has been destroyed. But these are the rare exceptions: for nearly every where one can not guess whether the buildings, by whose ruins we are passing, were high or low, round or square, old or new, big or little, many or few.

Then again, all wood and wood-work is destroyed, excepting here and there large beams have left a fragment of charcoal. There is nothing to show where of door or rafters for the owner to save for rebuilding; nothing even for ragged children to carry away for fire-wood. Then, again, there is no trace any where of any goods, wares, merchandise, or furniture saved. What the affrighted inhabitants may have snatched away from the advancing flame we can not tell from any thing we see to-day. but the fire has left them nothing of all they left to it. Iron safes have preserved their shape, as you can see, their contents. Ironware, pipes, rods, kettles, tools of various kinds, can be distinguished, half melted, half twisted up, wholly ruined, but still substance; but of nothing else do we see characteristic traces.

Yes, here is one thing saved! One stock of goods has resisted the fire and remains in its shape and substance. In the very heart of the burned district was an ice-house. The wooden shell was burned away, the thick lump of stone-work was singed and burned outside, but workmen are digging through the blackened top, and underneath all is cool and cut away great blocks of ice, as good as new. In all our two hours' walk we see nothing unspoiled but this. Still more we realize how the green freshness of this fire when we observe how the green trees were burned. In all the region over which the fire spread we do not see one tree left alive. Those of the largest size, elms of twenty inches thick and fifty feet in height, are standing in their shape, smoked and shriveled, dead but not destroyed. The trees of the second size are burned to a short charcoal stump. Leaves, boughs, and branches are gone; a few feet of the main trunk of the stem, with perhaps stubs of the main branches surmounting it, only remain.

The activity of fire-fighters impresses the mind before one advances far up the burned district. On the outskirts, and in all the region formerly occupied by dwelling-houses, the ruins remain in a quasi untouched. But in what were business streets are many signs of energy and activity in repair. In many lots workmen are picking out of the unbroken brick, chipping the calcined mortar from them, and piling them up for use. Carts and wagons are traversing their embarassed course through the choked streets, carrying off rubbish, or bringing on materials for new erections. Here and there wooden buildings are being rapidly put up; in all already there are some of good size standing with frames completed, and partly boarded. Here and there—in the site of what was once a large dry-goods shop, or perchance a bank, a knot of men are digging in the ashes for melted fragments of metal, or trying to open the safe. Additional to the numerous squads of workmen, are throngs of persons strolling back and forth to see what they can see; and these heighten the apparent activity of the scene. Working our way gradually through this region—turning aside to see a more extended ruin, to avoid an impassable street there—we come upon what was a region of dwellings, and where reconstruction is here advanced; and beyond this we come upon a camp.

Destitution and suffering have now been measurably relieved. The outward tokens of them, to the casual visitor, are chiefly gathered at this spot. We are at the northeasterly end of the city, where there has a broad slope of land ascending somewhat sharply, and culminating in a bold terrace or brow of land. Upon this terrace are many substantial buildings, but on the slope below very few, and in this slope the fire stopped for want of fuel. On this slope are thickly scattered the tents, which are the temporary homes of many houseless families.

That Portland is not quite all burned is what we see at the very last; for now, returning to the depôt, and turning aside from burned streets to avoid ourselves of unobstructed ones, we find we have a long and weary walk through streets of intact shops and dwellings, beyond all sight and suspicion of the GREAT FIRE.

REPUBLICAN CONGRESSIONAL CAUCUSES.

On the evening of July 11 a caucus of the Republican members of Congress was held in the hall of the House of Representatives. General Banks was elected chairman. Only eight Senators were present. Mr. Hendricks, of New York, said that the meeting was called at the request of himself and others, and its object was to have an interchange of views as to the best course to be pursued in regard to the removed removal of office-holders by the President. He had no doubt that such removal was intended as soon as Congress should adjourn. He deemed it the duty of Congress to stand by the law, and to make any sacrifice necessary to keep them in office. He thought Congress should remain in session so as to prevent removals.

Mr. Farnsworth, of Illinois, offered a resolution, declaring that Congress would remain in session until December, and that no appointments should be made by the President without the consent of the Senate. Mr. Hendricks said he was not sure that he could vote for the resolution, but he was ready for any action that would keep the Government into the hands of friends.

Mr. Churchill, of Ohio, indorsed what had been said about the treachery of the President, and the necessity of adopting some measures of prevention. But he thought adopting some measures of prevention. But he thought adopting some measures of prevention. But he thought it important that members should go to their homes and counsel with the people. He was glad to hear the assurance to say, was already broken up. He had resigned, and that Postmaster-General Dennison, if not dismissed, would have nothing more to do with the Administration. He was glad that other members of the Cabinet would follow his example. He thought they should strip to the naked and fight like Spartans.

Mr. Ingersoll, of Illinois, denounced President Johnson as a traitor, and declared that he was rebels and Copperheads, and insisted on measures of pre. ution against Copperheads.

Mr. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, denounced the President. His Convention as a conspiracy to destroy, and said he believed the President had got it up for the purpose of defeating the Union party in the Congressional and City periods into power. The rebel newspapers North and South were for it. The New York Herald, the New York News and World advocated it as a means of destroying the Union party. He had his eye on the New York Tribune, the New York Times, although it had not yet gone quite as far as the others, also upholds and favors the Convention. The President, as is well known, regards every bill passed by Congress, while absent, as unconstitutional, and as void, so that nothing short of the admission of the rebel members will satisfy him.

Mr. Raymond, of New York, said Mr. Kelley had not been aware of a right to meet in caucus for any such purpose or motive as breaking up the Union party. He (Raymond) thought that the Union party was safe, and was most unusually way of making an injurious and unjust attack. He had his own opinions of the Philadelphia Convention, and he had not, thus far, considered it to be the duty of Congress to interfere with it. He believed that, properly managed, the Convention would strengthen the Union party. He thought the Union party would be had reason to think so, he should continue to advocate it. He was opposed to any resolution that was calculated to destroy the Union party, neither the Times nor his editorials would do it.

Mr. Broomall, of Pennsylvania, offered a resolution declaring it to be the duty of every Union man to denounce the Philadelphia Convention, and under it citizen to the people.

Mr. Bromwell, of Illinois, followed in favor of this resolution—denouncing the President, and saying we ought to stand with the laws under the Constitution, and sustain it. the President can fill—and that salaries should be abolished, and appointments be made by the people of appointment unless in his hands. Congress could sit all winter—we were paid by the day, and it was no object to us.

Mr. Hale, of New York, objected to the resolution as unjust to true Union men.

Mr. Raymond again took the floor. When the Philadelphia Convention was first announced he believed it would prove a failure. He had no apprehension that the party, and in placing its action upon a broader and safer basis. He had never entertained the opinion that because the party was thus nationalized and liberalized, it would have a short duration. Congress could do little to relieve those of its opponents; and he had therefore looked with favor on the call for the Philadelphia Convention. He had no reason to change his opinion so as to object and effect he should not support the resolution.

The resolution was then adopted. Mr. Hale, of New York, voting against it. Mr. Raymond moved that the appointment of the Committee of Nine—Senators Morrill, of Maine; Fessenden, of Michigan; Ryan, of Kansas; Grimes, of Iowa; Doolittle, of Wisconsin; Farnsworth, of Illinois; Hotchkiss, of New York; Brown, of Pennsylvania; Garfield, of Ohio; Boutwell, of Massachusetts.

Governor Hamilton, of Texas, then addressed the meeting, by its invitation, on motion of Mr. Stevens, after which the caucus adjourned, to meet at the call of the Committee.

A second caucus was held on the evening of the 16th. The proceedings of which are reported in the following letter to those of the first caucus.

The report of the Committee, in spite of the efforts of Speaker Colfax, Mr. Stevens, Mr. Farnsworth, Mr. Hotchkiss, and others, was not received. The report of the caucus received, by a vote of 64 to 40, to adjourn on the 23d.

THE PROMISE REDEEMED.

My friend, Mrs. H., recounted to me the following remarkable incident in her life:

She was married at a somewhat early age, and, shortly thereafter, accompanied her husband to India, where she remained until delicate health compelled her, after the birth of her second child, to return to England.

A deep despondency seized her at the idea of the approaching painful separation from her husband; but there was no alternative, and, at the appointed time, the latter accompanied her to the ship, doing his utmost to cheer and reassure her with the hope of a happy reunion.

"It is in vain, William," was her pathetic rejoinder, "I feel convinced that, in this world, I shall never see you again."

"You shall see me, love," replied H. "I feel that I can not, and will not, part. Nothing—no, not death itself—shall prevent your seeing me again. Be comforted with that assurance."

On her arrival in England Mrs. H. joined her father and sisters at Brighton, where the salubrious air quickly restored her health and strength. A twelvemonth passed away, which period the accounts from India were regular and satisfactory, and Mr. H., in his later letters, expressed his joy at his recovery, and his hope that she would return to him at the first moment her health permitted.

Her father was an early riser, and somewhat imperative on that subject with his household. His daughters, consequently, were sometimes compelled to defer the more elaborate duties of their toilet until after the matutinal meal, and it was upon one of those occasions that all three had returned to their dressing-rooms—Mrs. H. and one of her sisters in a large apartment looking to the front, the other lady in a room adjoining.

Mrs. H., in her dressing-robe, was walking about, brushing her hair, when she happened to approach the window. The house was situated in the crescent of Kemp-town, and, facing the sea, commanded both approaches—right and left. Her eye fell upon a mail-phaeton, rapidly approaching, that seemed to attract her attention. It contained no one but the driver—a gentleman. As he came nearer she uttered a cry of delight that brought her sisters to her side.

"It is William! It is William!" was all she could say.

Her sisters recognized the familiar face as well as herself. Mr. H., as the carriage drew near, looked up at the window, inclined his head, and smiled. Much excited at this sudden arrival, his wife hurriedly completed her dressing, and ran down stairs into the drawing-room. Her father was then alone.

"Why—where is he? Where is William?" she hastily asked.

"William!" repeated her father. "Why, in India, my dear. Where should he be?"

"No, no, papa! He is here! We have seen him! Perhaps he has gone round to the stables. He might have spoken to me first," sobbed the disappointed wife.

After remaining silent, in pique, for a minute or two, she could brook the delay no longer, and, throwing the room in which the servants were dining, she hastened to the rear round to the stables and bring word who was there.

The messenger returned. Nobody had been seen. On the contrary, the policeman and road-sweeper in the crescent both denied that any private carriage had passed through that morning.

Mrs. H. was now in a state of the most distressing uncertainty. At that time the three sisters had seen Mr. H.; and the news which, shortly after, reached them of his death proved that he had, indeed, kept his promise—his latest words expressing an intense desire to see once more the face of the wife he loved so well.

CHILDREN.

CHILDREN and childhood have been surrounded with an atmosphere of poetry, and have been invested with all the charms of poetic fancy:

"Angels are talking to them in their dreams—
A sight to make a stranger gaze and stare."

They are supposed to hold some intercourse with the world of spirits, and their very smiles are interpreted to mean communion with a world unseen. Their gestures, and broken sentences are the constant theme of poets, and moralists take them for their text. For ordinary mortals like ourselves they possess a fascination which we can not but accord to the man of business or the student, who can unbend to them, when to all the world besides they are but children. Many have written them his study, and they have been among his most successful works. Rings and baby sayings become household words, and their elders learn to speak a language which they have caught from children. They are, indeed, early years, a source of the greatest amusement and interest. The old grow young again in their presence. They are to them like the green leaves of a second summer. Even they who profess dislike or indifference toward them have been known to betray a love for children by stealth, almost ashamed of a weakness to which nature has prompted them. The affection of a little child is almost the only thing that a suspicious world does not distrust. There is something in the simple, untutored, spontaneous return with which a child will meet your advances that is at once a test that reserve with which more or less it surrounds itself in all its intercourse with the world. But there is another side to the question which, in all fairness, ought not to be attributed so much to the children themselves as to those who are their natural protectors. What do we mean when we meant by an infant terrible? and who that has suffered from it can be blamed for rolling against children as a nuisance? A child of quick intelligence and much observation, who has a certain faculty of putting one and one together—who hears and listens attentively to all that is passing around, both in the nursery and in the drawing-room—who is suffered to live on too familiar terms with its elders—who has but little reserve, and less self-control—who blurts out all that comes into its little mind without regard to time or place, and says the most outrageous things that are to be found in nursery—who is allowed to engross all the attention with its stories and its questions, to the evident annoyance of others who are prattle, to the evident annoyance of others who are no charm to it—such a child is indeed one of the greatest nests of society.

But it is, we repeat, more the fault of others than of the child. Amused by the smartness of its sayings, or by the quickness of its perceptions, parents encourage it for their own amusement, and laugh at it; while in the nursery it finds favor, because it is one of the means by which nurses and nursery-maids know what is going on in "grown-up" rooms. But this is a two-edged sword, which cuts both ways, for if it reveals the tactics of the drawing-room, those of the nursery and housekeeper's room do not escape. With eyes and ears well open, ready tongue, and a retentive memory, children become dangerous to friend and foe. What is more detestable than a child divested of every particle of nauseuse honte, who obtrudes its remarks and its nursery news upon every one, and forces itself upon all people alike? It rears perhaps in the nursery some comments that have been made upon a dinner-party, or the conversation that has passed between Jane and her cousin, who have, in the innocence of their hearts, imagined that it had escaped the ears of all who have no particular wish that the attention of the authorities should be directed to it at that moment. The infant terrible announces, in its own sweet way, to her dear grandmamma, in the hearing of her grandpapa, that her aunt and cousin are fond of each other, and, with a certain amount of self-importance, attracts attention to the existing state of things. The nurse has been sparing—the murder is out—and Miss has been dismissed in a severely reprimanded, while the latter is dismissed, and the former is never suffered to stir beyond the watchful eye of the grim Cerberus that is placed on guard. It is vain to hope that, in the presence of such inquirers, any thing can remain secret or capable of being withheld from the hostess. The house-maid and her "follower" suffer equally from the same penetrating eye, listening ear, and garrulous tongue of "mamma" in daily intercourse of the conversation which took place between the under nursemaid and the young man on the other side of the silk. Such mischiefs may be these when to know the minutest details of their household, and therefore they are not corrected.

No bland amenities can be successful while one of these "sweet little pets" is at hand with its revelations, its explanations, and its glosses, for it was but the remember how mamma said she was glad to hear that Mrs. Scand-so was going away. An amusing story is told of a baby who once penned a friend's letter in the country. On his arrival at —— he was at once shown to his room, the dressing-bell, as it was believed, having already rung. On entering the room in which the company assembled before dinner, he found himself alone with a little girl about three years old, as the event proved, who quite up the occasion. He spoke to her in language which he supposed to be suited to her years, but the little lady was not even very forthcoming, when she presently bethought herself that she would like to know the name of her new friend. He at once replied that he was Mr. Somebody, and told her name, to which she instantly replied, with the utmost naiveté:——"Oh, then, you are the man that mamma says has a wonderful appetite for a joke!" Such announcement in the first moments of an arrival at a strange house! especially when it suddenly flashed across our friend's mind that it had been a special proviso in the invitation that he should bring all his music with him. But there is no end to the various witty sayings of every one of the bon-mots sayings of these blessed little pests. If a friend is pressed to stay, and regrets his inability to do so, the infant terrible is sure to be glad of it. It is in vain to be to dissemble your love or your aversion, if in a unguarded moment, no matter how long before or either. "Little pitcher have long ears," and people are apt to forget this when they talk over the things which most deeply interest them, forgetful that the tongue of the young and old alike is an unruly member. Precocious children, who have not been kept in proper subjection, and whose tongues have been allowed to run on ad libitum, have not unfrequently been the disturbers of domestic happiness. Such a petted child who was suffered to accompany her father in a round of visits which he proposed to make. His visiting hour arrived, he brought her to her mother, with the evident expectation of some praise for his punctuality. Mamma, in her gladness, drew the child toward her, gave it a kiss, and was on the point of expressing a hope that she had been amused, when she was cut short by the "sweet child" saying, "Oh, that is just what I told papa!" Mrs. ——" It was impossible for her unfortunate father to contradict or explain. There he stood, convicted.

We think that, in connection with this subject, the duty to children is twofold. First, that they should be taught from their earliest childhood that it is both dishonorable and wrong to repeat what they hear; and secondly, that care should be taken not to place upon them a burden too heavy to bear, by talking too openly and indiscriminately before them of things which we do not wish to hear repeated again. If their elders are sufficiently enough to talk rashly before them, let them be taught the virtue of that reserve which prevents tale-bearing; but let it be remembered that it is unfair and wrong to try the temper of children by forcing upon them a habit which is opposed to the free nature of childhood.

THE WORD OF AN EMPEROR.

ONE day, at the parade of his guard, the Emperor Paul I. was excessively indignant with one of his officers, who was not a good horseman.

"Cashier him and send him to his estate!" said he to the commanding general.

"Pardon me, Sire," answered the latter, "he is a poor man and has no estate!"

"Dat jesnit!"—(Then give him one!) exclaimed the Emperor, as he rode away.

This answer not only was original, but imperial; for having once been uttered the Emperor must keep his promise. The officer therefore was made possessor of an estate, in order to live in banishment upon it.

A BRAVE SOLDIER.

It is seldom that those who have passed through a campaign can show more than one wound. Such a case, however, there is now in this city an Italian, named Frederick Guscetti, who fought bravely on the Union side during the rebellion, and received no less than twenty-four wounds, several of them of the most dangerous character. The breast, side, and neck of this unfortunate young man are literally seamed with scars. Besides these certificates of his devotion to the Union cause, he bears written testimonials from Surgeons Packhurst, Sloan, Moore, and Packham, and also from Major-General Ferrero. Broken down in health, and unable to earn a living in this country, he desires to return to his native land, but lacks the means to do so.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters.

MUSHROOM IMITATIONS.

Success is the "prevalent cradle" of innumerable humbugs. No sooner had HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS made their mark in the world than up sprang a host of imitations, and as the fame of the great restorative and preventive became more widely extended, so did the evil multiply and spread, the pestiferous crop of poisonous mushrooms thickened. But the true medicine has lived them down. One by one they have disappeared. When the fires of puffery, which kept alive the false fires of their borrowed reputation, went low, they ceased to live, and they continue to come and go. Meanwhile, HOSTETTER'S BITTERS, the great protective and remedial tonic of the age, have steadily increased in popularity with each succeeding year. Their success as a means of preventing and curing the diseases resulting from malaria, from miasmatic water, and all unhealthy climatic influences, is unprecedented; and as a remedy for Dyspepsia, Liver or Complaint, Fever and Ague, General Weakness and Debility, and all complaints originating in Indigestion, they are now admitted to be superior to any other proprietary medicine ever advertised or prescribed. From the home market, to which a few years ago they were confined, their use has been extended into every State in this Union, over the whole of South and Central America, Mexico, the West Indies, the Sandwich Australia, Madeira and Japan. Home and foreign testimony continues to show that HOSTETTER'S BITTERS are the most remarkable tonic and invigorant now before the world.

Purify the Blood.

If the blood be pure, the body, which is formed from and by the blood, can not be diseased. But if there be in any part of the body any affection, such as a boil or ulcer, or even a bruise, the blood circulating through that part takes up impure matters from the local affection, and carries them into the general system. This is the cause often of sudden death to persons of habits afflicted with boils and ulcers, and who use no medicine; the matter gets into the circulating system, and clogs up the fine blood-vessels which supply the brain with vitality, and life ceases as if

A Wonder-Book of the most delightful Literature.

HARPER & BROTHERS have now ready, complete in One Volume, 8vo, price $4 50, Cloth, Beveled Edges; or, price $6 75, half bound in Morocco:

Homes Without Hands.

HOMES WITHOUT HANDS: Being a Description of the Habitations of Animals, classed according to their Principle of Construction. By J. G. Wood, M.A., F.L.S., Author of "Illustrated Natural History." With about 140 Illustrations engraved on Wood by G. Pearson, from Original Designs made by F. W. Keyl and E. A. Smith, under the Author's Superintendence.

To overpraise "Homes Without Hands" would be difficult, and nearly every page in the volume offers a temptation. It is a wonderful book, the most delightful kind, in which the charm that attaches to zoological observation and discovery is evoked with irresistible effect. —London Review.

"Homes Without Hands" is more interesting than a fairy tale. The author, in a fascinating style, and with a profusion of elegant engravings, illustrates instinctive art in all its departments, from the labors of the smallest insect up to those of the largest animal which builds itself a dwelling. To enumerate the wonders contained in the book we should be compelled to write an abstract of its contents: for each page contains something that will interest and delight the reader. It is a work calculated to bring pleasures of the most refined and elevating kind into many a school-room and many a family circle; and certainly it would be impossible to recommend a more suitable book for a present to a young person.—Daily News.

This work will do much to diffuse and increase an intelligent observation of animal life. It is written with an evident sympathetic feeling for the subject in hand, and is thoroughly entertaining throughout.—Victoria Magazine.

To all who are happy enough to possess the one taste which never leaves the mind—a love of the natural world and its wonders—this volume will be indeed fascinating; and it might well impart the taste to those who never knew before how rich and interesting is the study. We do not know where to find its equal as a gift for boys, as a book to make them observe instead of destroying, and learn in place of merely wondering. But it is a volume for the library also, full of rich facts and interesting parallels.—Daily Telegraph.

One of the most interesting treatises on Natural History which our language possesses. We think that "Homes without Hands" is likely to become the book of reference on the dwellings of animals.—Popular Science Review.

Mr. Wood's classification of the habitations of animals opens up a wide and connected a perspective into the psychology of the animal creation that it possesses quite a peculiar interest and fascination.—Spectator.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 4, 1866.

THE CASE STATED.

THE rupture between the President and Congress is lamentable, but it is decided. As his policy failed to command the approval of the Union party, and it can not be denied that it has, his only alternative was to relinquish it or to await other support. That could come from one quarter only, from the Democratic party. It was not to be expected that the President would relinquish what he deemed the sole constitutional and sagacious policy; and therefore the elected candidate of the Union party of 1864 has no other party support than that of the Democracy.

Regrets and recriminations are equally vain. It is too late to wonder whether, had he worn and patient LINCOLN lived, the party which sustained him and the war would not have settled without serious opposition the great question of reconstruction. It is vain also to blame the action of reunion. Men act from mixed motives, and it is both unmanly and unwise to trace those with whom we profoundly differ, and whom we most steadfastly oppose. The welfare of the country, through the triumph of the fundamental American principle, which Mr. SEWARD well defined in a letter of resignation as "the political liberty and equality on mankind under the law," this is the end which every thoughtful citizen will constantly bear in mind, and it is therefore of very little importance whether the President is influenced by the desire of re-election, by the wish to live his future years peacefully in Tennessee; by unextinguishable hostility to what is called "Radicalism;" by incapacity to comprehend the situation, or by the most conscientious desire to do his duty faithfully. It is vain to turn upon him the fire of his own words when he was military Governor of Tennessee, or when he accepted the Presidency; for a man of ardent temperament and of utterly undisciplined mind says many things under extraordinary excitement for which he can not fairly be held responsible. Whatever the President's motives may be, he has distinctly declared his policy. That policy will be sustained by the Democratic party, and must be estimated not by his personal character, but by its own merits and by the necessities of action which the new coalition will impose upon them.

This is true also of the policy of Congress. Our judgment must be determined not by our opinion of Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS, or of Mr. SUMNER, or of any other ardent or unwise declaimer; not by the ill-humor of debates, or by the occasional folly of certain acts. Neither is it of present importance that Congress has been too slow or too fast in arriving at its conclusions. Congress has been maligned, derided, and denounced as the President has been. It is enough that each has declared its policy of reunion. Upon those policies the country will decide at the autumn elections; and every sensible man will weigh them well.

The exact point, then, is this: The President holds that the States lately in rebellion, having accepted certain amendments to the Constitution without consultation with the representatives of the people, have now the right to be admitted to Congress upon the same terms as the other States. Congress holds that the Legislative and not the Executive department of the Government is the rightful judge of the situation, and that the public safety requires another condition as the necessary complement of those already accepted, and opposes admitting any late insurgent State to an equal share in the Government until it adopts the amendment proportioning representation to voters, and excluding from office at the pleasure of Congress certain conspicuous offenders. The object of this amendment is of vital importance. To state it is to prove it; for it proposes merely that no State which has tried to destroy the Government shall, as a result of its abortive effort, gain increased power in the Government.

There is thus no difference of principle between the President and Congress, although there is that difference between him and the Democratic party which denies the right to impose any conditions whatever. But the President has done it. It was the necessity of the case, and he could not help it. Either South Carolina had the right to demand to possess her old share in the Government without accepting the Emancipation Amendment, or revoking her act of secession, or repudiating her rebel debt, or she has no right to demand it until she has satisfied any other condition which the Government may require for the same purpose of security to the Union. The President, indeed, claims that his conditions are the only constitutional terms that can be asked. But that is merely his opinion. No inaugurated has any system of finance. One of the first men to realize the necessities of the occasion, and to discern the practical methods by which money could be raised for the prosecution of the war, was JAY COOKE. He went to Philadelphia, and opened a little bank there. By degrees he won the confidence of the Secretary, became a subscriber for public loans, bought and sold the various classes of securities issued by Government at the beginning of the war, was frequently, by reason of his early information, enabled to operate without risk in bonds and stocks, and in the course of a couple of years won for himself such a position that he obtained the office of agent for the Five-Twenty and then for the Seven-Thirty loan. With made his fortune. How much he realized from it no one knows; probably not less than five—perhaps ten million dollars. Recently connected with Northern Pacific. As for himself, he was enabled to buy islands, to run churches, to support colleges, to live in a style which extinguished even the ASTORS. All which he deserved his reward. Mr. EDMUNDS tried to negotiate the second series of Seven-Thirties without him, and failed miserably; JAY COOKE took up the moribund scheme, breathed life into it, and it succeeded instantly. Any body might make the egg stand when they learned how; but, you see, nobody chanced to learn learned how at the right time except JAY COOKE.

But now that the war is over, and no further emergency exists for the Treasury Department, it seems to be pretty generally felt, even among those who justify JAY COOKE'S sudden wealth, that his house ought not to engage advantages over other banking houses, or, at all events, that the Treasury officials ought not to throw money into the hands of JAY COOKE & Co. when there is no necessity for throwing money into any one's hands. If the Government desires to exchange Five-Twenties for Seven-Thirties, Mr. VAN DYCK can do it, without communicating the market will push the exchange; if the market will not justify the exchange, MESSRS. JAY COOKE & Co. can not accomplish it. Within the next year or two some $800,000,000 of Seven-Thirty notes will have to be exchanged or disposed of in some way or other. The mercantile community and tax payers generally are most prepared to pay MESSRS. JAY COOKE & Co. a commission on effecting this exchange, and if Secretary M'CULLOCH contemplates throwing this business into their hands, he will not find it easy to justify himself before Congress and the country.

Senator SHERMAN's bill prohibiting further secret sales of gold is a fair indication of the public temper. Mr. SHERMAN is a friend of the Secretary, and the best man in Congress to object, when any policy which affords well-informed people a fair chance of making a little money. But the public disgust at the blunder of May last was too unmistakable not to be discouraging to any kind of secret negotiations, which are always suggestive of fraud. They want the operations of the Treasury Department to be as open and as public as those of the War Department, or the Navy Department, or the Navy Supply agency.

Nothing is ever gained, in the long-run, by secrecy, in the matter of large operations. The idea that the Government could not sell its gold or its bonds if it were generally known to be a seller, is a fallacy which experience contradicts at every point. It sustains but the private opinion of the brokers whose commissions depend on the continuance of secret sales. Suppose Mr. VAN DYCK had, on 22d March, 1865, announced that gold for sale to the highest bidder. Is it not clear he would have got nearer 140 than 135 for it? Certain Treasury officials, in a recently published correspondence, expressed the opinion that if the purposes of Government were known Wall Street would combine to defeat them. This childish sneer does deserve notice. Every adult of sound intellect can see that Government requires to convert $800,000,000 of Seven-Thirty notes within two years. Can this fund be raised without the knowledge of the Seven-Thirty market, and any secret operations which the Government may attempt through JAY COOKE & Co. or any one else, will be denounced at once, and telegraphed throughout the country before sundown, just as the Government sales of gold were detected and telegraphed. A secret operation is one which begot hostile combinations. Let Mr. M'CULLOCH openly advertise that he will give Five-Twenty Bonds for Seven-Thirties on such conditions as he may deem fair and the market may justify—not through this or that pet banking house, but at his own office; and he may rely upon it he need fear no combination. If the market be in a favorable condition he will succeed in effecting the exchange without paying any share; if it be in a favorable condition and he will have to pay more than he would have fared had he placed himself in the hands of one of his pet bankers. If the Five-Twenty Bonds command a premium when the Seven-Thirties mature every one will convert, without the least effort by Government, if they are at a discount every one will want his money, and all the capitalists of Europe and America in the world will not avail to alter one single mind.

We speak of the maturity of the Seven-Thirty notes, because we have no idea that Congress will adopt or the Supreme Court justify the repudiating scheme of Senator JOHN SHERMAN, by which holders of Seven-Thirties would be compelled to elect four months before the maturity of their notes whether they proposed to demand money or bonds. Whatever straits may await the Treasury Department, we are not yet prepared to believe that the Government is going to cheat its creditors, either in the rate of interest on its obligations, or the period of time which its options have to run.

THE WAR IN EUROPE.

THE result of the first campaign in the European war is prodigious, but the problem is not surprising. It has been evident for many months that BISMARCK meant to fight. He had privately consulted LOUIS NAPOLEON in Paris, and had come to an understanding with VICTOR EMANUEL. His object was the overthrow of the imperial power of Austria, and his means were all the resources of an opulent military monarchy. Of course he had not resolved without the most careful information of the available military force of his enemy, a knowledge of his financial condition, and of the disposition of other Powers. The stake was enormous: the risk was that of all wars, and therefore incalculable. But the event shows how masterly was the comprehension of the situation and circumstances, and with what marvelous skill the combinations of the campaign were drawn.

Europe has been so long destitute of a truly efficient and audacious genius that there was no mental preparation for its appearance. It was undoubtedly the general expectation that diplomacy would shrug and grimace indefinitely; that PRUSSIA was blustering and bragging to force results by fright; that LOUIS NAPOLEON had said and written nothing more than he had always said; and that, by-and-by, somewhere and somehow, the business might be bungled into a war. But that BISMARCK would see that the time could only be cut and not untied, and that his sword was not only sharpened but raised, was a fact not easily believed.

But long that profound BISMARCK forced the moves throughout. On the 14th of June he brought the cunabous Diet to a vote which he anticipated. On the 16th the armed war began between Austria and Hanover. Paralyzing the Federal army with one hand, he pushed his own force through Dresden and into Bohemia with the other. Within ten days he seized, or established camp wherever he found him. Steadily advancing, taking point after point, driving the enemy backward and arresting its every movement, he pushed on to the chief of them and crushed the great army of BENEDEK, extinguishing in a moment the fame of the chief Austrian General, and ending at the same time all hope of its extremity and surrender the prey it had so long held in Italy. It was on the battle-ground of FREDERICK THE GREAT, but FREDERICK himself never struck so or with such a blow for Prussia.

The result of this first campaign is the transfer of the treaties of 1815. It abolishes the Austrian Confederation, and leaves Italy to the Italians. Does it also abolish the Austrian empire? That a campaign of a fortnight should achieve such results and such a revolution as these is almost incredible. In the presence of such facts it is idle to speculate. Will FRANCE go to the Rhine, and Germany become a vast confederated empire? Will PRUSSIA permit it, or will Central Britain wish it? Will the great victory of Sadowa, revealing to the people of the various German States the immediate responsibility of a power on the fact of which its name, inspire them with the resistless conviction that it is a war for national deliverance? Or will the hatred between Austrians and Prussians prove to be so intense and vital as to lead to a prolonged and exterminating struggle, to be settled only by external interference?

These and other questions are inevitable. That they are unanswerable. We can see no present reason for supposing that the war is over.

CIVIL WAR.

THE Danville Times, the Richmond Whig, the Richmond Enquirer, the Charleston Courier, the Macon Telegraph, the Savannah Republican, and we know not how many other Democratic newspapers in all the disaffected section, have been suggesting late in some months that the President should call together the Representatives elected from that part of the country, who would be joined by Senators elected from the States, recognize "Conservatives" from the Northern States as the Union, and embark himself by force them as the Union, and embark himself by force of arms. The Democratic Senator GARRETT DAVIS, of Kentucky, suggested the same thing. The Democratic Chicago Times urged him to clear out Congress by military force. A Democratic Representative elected in Virginia, Mr. A. H. H. STUART, in an address before a college some weeks since, informed his audience that they were on the eve of another bloody revolution." Mr. S. S. COX, formerly a Democratic Representative from Ohio, then a delegate to the Chicago Convention, where he said that in his judgment "LINCOLN and DAVIS ought to be brought to the same block togeth-er," and now an eminent "Conservative" of Tammany Hall, announced upon the 4th of July that unless moderate and judicious statesmanship should intervene, by which he meant unless Representatives from the late rebel States were promptly admitted, there will be civil war more terrible and atrocious than that just ended. The Democratic New York World two or three weeks ago, declared that if the votes of the late rebel States for President in 1868 should be refused by the Congress of the United States, when, if admitted, they would elect the Democratic candidate, "this right would be settled by force of arms."

And when, after this plain declaration from all parts of the Democratic party, that in a certain contingency they meant to begin a worse war than that which they have just waged against the Government, Mr. BOUTWELL said a few days since that the loyal country ought to be warned and prepare for the emergency, Mr. HENRY J. RAYMOND announces that the Radicals are plotting civil war; and the New York World piously thanks the gentleman, whom it had said a day or two before had lost all consideration and influence whatever, for the startling information, and begs the President to "stop these revolutionists in their hellish work!"

Is it this declared warlike intention of the Democratic party or the resistance to it which Mr. RAYMOND proposes? If the open declaration of the World and other Democratic authorities that, in a certain contingency, force should be used did not alarm him, why in the so applied by the assertion that such force ought to be resisted?

As for the World, it holds that the late rebel States have at least all our rights in the Union. They had then the same right to vote for President in 1864 that they have until Congress recognizes them in their new law. And if the Southern Democrats had stopped fighting loyal men long enough to vote for their most friendly foe, MCCLELLAN, are we to understand that, if enough Southern votes could have been counted in the North to elect him, his right would have been asserted by arms?

The only civil war which this country has ever known was waged against the Government by the Southern wing of the Democratic party, supported, as MR. HENRY J. RAYMOND informed us in the recent speech, by the Northern wing. To save slavery the Democracy plunged the country into war. To save the spirit of slavery they would sink it into Mexican anarchy. They threaten that if they can not have their way in the coming elections there will be war. But they threaten a people who have once shown themselves afraid either of war or the rumor of war—a people who for the last ten years have seen the Democratic party in every light of infamy; who have placed their feet upon the copper land, and will keep it there until the last feeble hiss escapes.

A VERMONT SENATOR.

VERMONT has many sons who would serve her well in the United States Senate; but there is one honorably known to the whole country for varied public service; for remarkable and universal scholarship; for the utmost modesty and purity of life and character; for peculiar familiarity with our political history, and for the soundest and most truly American political principles. He would bring to the Senate knowledge, experience, conviction, and character worthy the representative of the true liberal conservatism of his State; and his presence there at this time, and for the impending questions, would be hailed with sincere pleasure by the most liberal citizens of every State. We speak, of course, of the HON. GEORGE P. MARSH, now minister to Italy.

INFLUENCE OF MENTAL EXERCISE ON HEALTH.

It is a common idea that it is no matter how little the mind is exercised so far as health is concerned, and many go so far as to think that the busier a man is the less labor his intellect has to do, the better is his chance on the whole for long life. For it is supposed that mental culture is always at the expense of physical, and that labor of the mind is dedicated a sacrifice more or less of the development of the lower nature for the benefit of the higher. That idea is scientifically and economically in situation we admit, but we do not admit the necessity of it. On the contrary, we contend that education, that is, mental development, need not be so managed, even in the case of the hard student, as to contribute to physical development—that better health, as a general work, a better organization of the system, may be obtained with an active and cultivated mind than with a boorish one.
